In the early days of the Republic State rights were jealously guarded, and it was only in exceptional cases where any expenditures were made by the Federal Government in the different States. Within the last 25 years the activities of the National Government have greatly increased, as is evidenced by the enlargement of the various bureaus, particularly those of the Department of Agriculture, Department of the Interior, Department of Commerce, and Department of Labor. At each session of Congress it is insisted that new bureaus within these departments be created and that additional work be given them within the various States. In a measure this accounts for the increases in the appropriations within the past 40 years. Let us examine the amounts appropriated, both annually and by administrations:

Hayes:
1878	$88,356,938.13
1879	172,016,809.21
1880	162,404,647.76
1881	155,830,841.32
Total	578,609,236.42

Garfield and Arthur:
1882	$179,578,999.86
1883	251,428,117.57
1884	187,911,566.17
1885	137,451,397.77
Total	756,370,081.37
Increase in the amount of appropriations over the preceding four-year period	177,760,744.95
Cleveland's first term:
1886	170,608,113.60
1887	209,659,382.01
1888	193,035,861.13
1889	245,020,172.89
Total	818,323,530.53
Increase in the amount of appropriations over the preceding four-year period	61,953,449.16
Harrison:
1890	218,115,439.80
1891	287,722,488.96
1892	323,783,079.36
1893	304,710,196.75
Total	1,134,331,204.87

Wilson's first term:
1914	684,757,276.26
1915	674,497,625.16
1916	678,677,858.70
1917	1,178,908,962.99
Total	3,216,841,723.11
Increase in the amount of appropriations over the previous four-year period	652,992,512.27

We must keep in mind that the increase in 1899 was due to the Spanish-American War, and that the increases from 1914 to 1917 were due to preparation for and conduct of the World War.

The figures in the above table are exclusive of the appropriations for the Postal Service paid from postal revenues, where the receipts almost balance the expenditures, and do not include the permanent annual appropriations required for the payment of interest on the public debt and the other standing appropriations.

During Washington's administration the annual appropriations aggregated about $4,000,000, and we did not expend to exceed $75,000,000 annually before the Civil War. During Hayes's administration the annual expenses of the Government first exceeded $100,000,000.

The increase in the population of the United States justifies some of the increases in these appropriations. The creation of new departments within this time explains some of the increases and the enlargement of Federal activities throughout the various States is responsible for other increases.

In addition to the ordinary expenses of the Government it will be necessary in the future to make large expenditures to meet the increased bonded indebtedness of the Government. The gross public debt of the United States on June 30, 1919, amounted to $25,484,506,160.05. With interest at the rate of 4¼ per cent on this indebtedness, it would require, in round numbers, $1,000,000,000 annually to meet the interest charges. A sound financial policy will require that an equal amount be paid into the sinking fund, so that in addition to the ordinary expenses of the Government there will be required an expenditure of $2,000,000,000 annually to meet the public debt and interest on it during this generation. We must not forget that while the armistice is signed and the war is over and the Army is to all intents and purposes demobilized, certain obligations growing out of the war to those who took part in it will remain with us through a long number of years. Approximately $40,000,000,000 in insurance was taken out, part of which is contingent. We enacted a liberal compensation act, and thousands of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines come within its provisions and must be cared for. Large expenditures will also be necessary for vocational training provided for under existing law.

It is difficult to estimate the added expenditures growing out of the present war. No one could estimate the amount that would be paid for pensions when the Civil War ended. For a number of years after the Civil War the special pension acts did not annually exceed 25. During the last Congress there were 3,641 pensioned by special act. Most of them represented increases over pensions previously drawn. The total number of special pension bills enacted since the Civil War up to the present time is 56,924.

Mr. Garfield in 1876 thought that the crest of pension legislation had been reached, when the sum of $29,270,404.76 was appropriated, but the last pension appropriation bill, approved February 25, 1919, carried $215,030,000. From 1866 down to 1919, inclusive, there has been paid for pensions $5,298,915,665.46, and when the last report was made 646,895 pensioners, soldiers or widows, were carried on the pension roll. As no one could foresee the vast expenditures that followed the Civil War, in addition to the cost of the war itself, we may expect many increases in appropriations growing out of our obligations to enlisted men who took part in this last war, their wives and dependents.

Now that our system of taxation has in a large measure been changed and the burdens of maintaining the Federal Government fall more directly upon the people, they will scrutinize with greater care and hold those in office to a stricter accountability for the money expended.

We collect through the customhouse about $250,000,000 annually. The most that was ever collected by means of a tariff under the Payne-Aldrich Act was $320,000,000 in one year, and the average annual collection for a period of four years was $315,000,000. It is admitted by all that a sufficient amount can not be obtained from this source to satisfy the enlarged needs of the Government. Constitutional prohibition has eliminated the revenue from alcoholic beverages, from which it was estimated that $75,000,000 would be received for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. This estimate was made, having in view the legislation then in force, limiting the manufacture and restricting the sale of alcoholic beverages. In arriving at the annual loss of revenue from this source, it can best be estimated by stating the average annual amount received during a five-year period prior to the war, which was about $225,000,000. Therefore, the needs of the Government must be met largely from income—individual and corporation—taxes and excess-profit taxes. The voters with tax receipts in hand will demand economy in expenditures of public money to the barest needs of the Government efficiently managed.

The Treasury estimated that the following amounts of revenue will be collected for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, under the last revenue act, approved February 7, 1919:

Estimated revenue receipts under the existing law and the revenue act of 1918, as agreed to by the conference committee, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Income tax:
Individual	$1,290,000,000
Corporation	510,000,000
Excessive-profit tax	1,250,000,000
Estate tax	110,000,000
Transportation:
Freight	115,000,000
Express	14,000,000
Persons	75,000,000
Oil by pipe lines	5,000,000
Seats and berths	6,000,000
Telegraph and telephone	17,000,000
Insurance	14,000,000
Admissions	50,000,000
Club dues	3,500,000
Excise taxes:
Automobiles, etc	75,000,000
Jewelry, sporting goods, etc	60,000,000
Other taxes on luxuries, at 10 per cent	58,000,000
Other taxes on luxuries, at 20 per cent	85,000,000
Yachts and pleasure boats	1,000,000
Beverages	75,000,000
Stamp taxes	31,000,000
Tobacco:
Cigars	46,500,000
Cigarettes	125,000,000
Tobacco	72,000,000
Snuff, etc	6,300,000
Leaf	100,000
Papers and tubes	1,000,000
Special taxes:
Capital stock	80,000,000
Brokers	1,200,000
Theaters, etc	2,100,000
Bowling alleys, billiard and pool tables	2,500,000
Shooting galleries	400,000
Riding academies	50,000
Manufacturers of tobacco	70,000
Manufacturers of cigars	850,000
Manufacturers of cigarettes	240,000
Automobiles for hire	700,000
Use of motor boats, yachts, etc	1,000,000
Total	4,184,510,000

When this act passed the House in October, 1918, which was before the signing of the armistice, it was estimated that approximately $8,000,000,000 would be collected under it. It passed the Senate after the armistice became effective, and upon the recommendation of the Treasury Department the amount proposed to be collected was reduced to $4,000,000,000. I want to particularly emphasize the amount which will be collected through the income tax, individual and corporation, the excess-profit tax, and the estate tax, all direct taxes, $3,160,000,000 annually.

Most of the European countries have a budget system. The bill we have under consideration follows in a large measure the British system. In Great Britain they have carefully detailed estimates made of expenditures and a balanced statement of the revenues received from all sources, through the treasury, which does not perform the functions of our treasury, but is charged with about the same duties and responsibilities as the present bill confers upon the director of the budget. The expenditures are audited as this bill requires the comptroller to do. However, there is a difference in making the appropriations. The ministry is composed of members of Parliament, who defend the budget presented, and the appropriations are made in lump sums and not in such detail as ours. Little discussion is had upon the individual items. In this respect, our plan is a decided improvement over the British system. With the detailed estimates submitted to Congress, as required by the bill under consideration, there is no reason why the various committees, charged with the responsibility under the present rules, should not take up the estimates, together with a report of the revenues to be received, and carefully go over each item, just like appropriation bills are now considered in the House. I do not favor lump-sum appropriations. The people are entitled through their representatives to have this added supervision over the expenditure of public money, and investigation first by the committees and later by Congress as a whole will not hurt a meritorious appropriation.

There is no reason why the rules should be changed so that the work of all the committees is centered in one large committee of 35, as the proposed rule provides. In fact, I have heard no legitimate argument in its favor. The usual argument is that it will cut out a duplication of work. That is exactly what is expected to be done by the director of the budget in preparing his estimates and by the comptroller in auditing the accounts. They will be charged with the preparing of estimates and the supervision of expenditures, to see that there is no duplication of work and to recommend the cutting down of expenditures in every possible way. These recommendations will be submitted to Congress through the President. Therefore, all duplications will be eliminated before the appropriations are considered by the various committees. If the powers of the present appropriating committees are preserved, when the estimates are submitted by the President to Congress, the estimate for the Postal Service will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the estimate for agriculture will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, the estimate for the Indian Service will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the estimates for the other departments will go to their appropriate committees. These committees are thoroughly familiar with the work of the various departments, having spent years in studying the same. They are familiar with the legislation for which the expenditures are asked and are better qualified to recommend whether any particular branch of the Government should be continued or whether it can be cut down without injury.

Again, from time to time, as legislation is enacted, the various committees must of necessity familiarize themselves with the additional financial burdens the same will place upon the Government. They will, therefore, keep better informed as to the current needs of these particular bureaus or departments. In my opinion there is every argument in favor of the retention of the committees and none in favor of their consolidation. A larger committee would have to divide itself into subcommittees and could not possible give the necessary time to investigate details. It would have to depend upon the information contained in the estimates and such additional information as may be given by the departments and bureaus. It could not make any independent investigation. The old committees have plenty of time to familiarize themselves with every detail of any bureau or department and can be depended upon to see that greater economy is practiced. Many of the old committees have only one department to consider appropriations for.

With the ending of the war we should enact all necessary reconstruction legislation to return to a peace basis as expeditiously as careful consideration will permit. The Army is practically demobilized. The Navy is about on a peace basis. All surplus war materials and supplies not needed for the Government should be sold to the best advantage at once to save deterioration and cost of housing and caring for same, and the proceeds should be placed to the credit of the Government. Railroad legislation should be enacted. We must not hesitate to assume our full responsibility. Let us return as quickly as possible to prewar conditions. This will have a splendid effect in settling the spirit of unrest now pervading the country.

Economy in all expenditures, Federal and State, public and private, is and should be the controlling thought in the mind of every citizen of the Nation.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, to my mind no more important legislation has been presented to Congress during normal times in the last quarter of a century than the present budget bill. The budget system is new to Congress, although it has been discussed for years and been adopted in many of the States of this Union. I have made a careful study of the bill and have read both the report of the committee and the hearings, and will support the same. In my judgment it is wise legislation.

This system consists primarily of three things: First, the formation of the budget; second, action on the budget by Congress; third, supervision and control of the execution of the budget.

In order to thoroughly understand the objects of the proposed bill, it is necessary to consider the provisions of existing law, governing the formation and transmittal of estimates for appropriations to Congress, as well as the supervision and control of expenditures after the appropriations have been made. Under the act of March 3, 1901, Statutes at Large, volume 31, page 1009, section 5, it is made the duty of the heads of the several executive departments and those at the head of the subordinate divisions of these departments, and all officers required to make estimates, to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before the 15th day of October of each year, their annual estimates for the public service, to be included in the Book of Estimates, prepared by direction of law under his direction, and in case of the failure of any of the heads of departments or chiefs of their subordinate divisions, or other officers required to furnish these estimates, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be prepared in the Treasury Department, on or before the 1st day of November of each year, estimates for such appropriations as, in his judgment, shall be requisite and necessary in every such case, which estimates shall be included in the Book of Estimates, prepared by direction of law under his direction for the consideration of Congress.

Section 3669, Revised Statutes, further provides that all annual estimates for public service shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury. Under the act of July 7, 1884, Statutes at Large, volume 23, page 254, section 2, all estimates of appropriations and estimates of deficiencies in appropriations intended for the consideration and seeking the action of any of the committees of Congress, shall be transmitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and in no other manner; and the said Secretary shall first cause the same to be properly classified, compiled, indexed, and printed under the supervision of the Chief of Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants of his department.

Under this method of making estimates great extravagance has resulted. For more than 50 years the estimates have gradually grown, and during the last two years they have increased by leaps and bounds, and, consequently, the appropriations of Congress have increased year after year until the great burden of taxation has become almost unbearable. It was evident to every one concerned that something had to be done to cut down these appropriations. Consequently, on the 31st day of July of this year the House passed a resolution authorizing the Speaker of the House of Representatives to appoint a select committee for the Sixty-sixth Congress, to consist of 12 members, and to be known as the Select Committee on the Budget. The resolution provided for the discharge of the standing committees of the House of the Sixty-sixth Congress from the further consideration of bills and resolutions for the establishment of a national budget system or proposing changes in the present method of dealing with appropriations, estimates, and expenditures, and for the reference of all such bills and resolutions to the Select Committee on the Budget.

In pursuance of that authority the Select Committee on the Budget has held extensive hearings covering a period of several weeks, and have given full opportunity to anyone who desired to present his views on the subject.

This committee is to be congratulated on the splendid manner in which it has discharged its duty. The bill before the House, the report of the committee, and the hearings disclose the fact that this committee shouldered a gigantic task and that it has rendered a great service both to Congress and to the country. It is, indeed, rather strange that a committee so large should make a unanimous report to this House on this important bill. To my mind this is conclusive proof of the sincerity of the members constituting this committee. It indicates to me that they had but one thought in mind, and that was to prepare and present to this House a measure which when enacted into law would insure a great reduction in governmental expenditures. The enactment of this bill into law is one great step toward systematizing in a business way the appropriations to be made by Congress. [Applause.]

The various heads of departments, bureaus, and commissions under the control of the Government have been extremely extravagant as well as careless in many instances in preparing their estimates for submission to Congress. Somehow they do not seem to have taken into account the fact that if these estimates should be enacted into law in the form of appropriations this money must be raised by the Government either through revenue or direct taxation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to my colleague in that connection that our expenses for this year exceed by nearly 30 per cent the total expenditures for all purposes during the entire administrations of President Roosevelt and President Taft?

Mr. RICKETTS. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Certainly.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. You say the expenses are growing greater. Are they growing greater proportionately than the growth and expansion of the bureaus that have been created since? That is the whole secret.

Mr. RICKETTS. I can not answer the gentleman's question right without giving it consideration; but I do want to say to him in that connection that the cost of running this Government to-day is more than it ever was in our history before, and we have to-day in the Government more bureaus and more boards and governmental agencies than any other country on the face of the earth.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Perhaps that is the solution.

Mr. RICKETTS. Perhaps it is. And my judgment is, if the gentleman will indulge me to answer his question, that this bill is a step in the right direction. You will never be able to cut down the number of employees in these departments until you cut down the appropriations. There are 102,000 employees in the departments now, 40 per cent of whom are not needed.

There is a rivalry between the heads of departments, which has resulted in numerous duplications in the estimates presented to this House and to Congress. The chairman of the various committees of the House have been imposed upon by the testimony of experts, who were not concerned in the subject of economy with reference to carrying on the business of the Government, but who were concerned in having the estimates made as large as possible, and consequently many unnecessary appropriations were made.

I think it is well understood by the membership of this House that most of us are very largely controlled in our votes by what the chairman and the members of the committee having charge of the bill have to say with reference to the necessity for the appropriation to be made. In this we are many times misguided, for under the present system we have no way to determine whether the appropriation is reasonable and just, and consequently we depend upon the chairman and the committee, who have been influenced and persuaded to recommend these appropriations by heads of departments and by the testimony of experts, hence the great necessity of this legislation.

I know of no city in the country that has more experts to the square inch than the city of Washington. This city has but very few commercial industries or factories employing its citizens. I have been told on good authority that there are but two factories in this city and they are both engaged in the manufacture of pianos. This city has a population of about 400,000, 100 000 of whom must have employment. Ninety-five per cent of this employment must come from the Government, and consequently the experts are kept busy urging upon the departments and upon Congress the necessity of establishing new bureaus and new commissions and new agencies. The secret purpose of their activities is, of course, to increase the employment capacity of Uncle Sam, and this sort of thing has gone on for a great number of years, until we have more bureaus, more commissions, and more agencies of the Government than any other country in the world. [Applause].

The only way to reduce these bureaus, commissions, and agencies is to reduce the appropriations, and under the budget system this will be the result.

The people of this Nation seem to be out of joint with the times and conditions. They have overlooked the fact that we have been engaged in a World War for the past two years and that no consideration tending to economy has occupied the minds of the people or the attention of the Congress of the United States. Wholesale appropriations were made without questioning them. Every line of business in the country was urged by the President and the present administration and by the people of the country generally to increase production. Labor was scarce because of the fact that 4,000,000 of our boys were in the service of the United States, either at home or abroad, and consequently the productive power of this country was greatly reduced. Wages were higher than ever was known before. Not only so, but we have paid the highest prices for every commodity produced in this country ever before paid in our history, and we are still paying these high prices. The armistice was signed on the 11th of last November, but notwithstanding that fact this Nation has gone on spending its money in a reckless way, regardless of our responsibilities to support and maintain the Government and to meet its just and honest obligations. [Applause.]

The American people should stop, look, and listen. They have apparently gone money mad. They are all standing on tiptoe, all working on a high tension, and very few of us satisfied with conditions. There seems to be a general unrest throughout the country, and it is regrettable that the people do not stop and think. This is a reconstruction period in our national history. It is a time when we must return to normal conditions; when we must stabilize the business of our country. We have gotten away from the fundamentals of our forefathers upon which the basic law of our country is founded. In fact, we have become reckless spendthrifts. We do not look to the future. We seem only to care for the present. The people of the United States need to be rebaptized in pure, unadulterated Americanism. They should be taught the lesson of thrift, frugality, and economy which, of necessity, is the result of industry.

We have an inflated currency as the outgrowth of the war, due in a large measure to the enormous expenditures made in the various activities connected with that war. Money is plentiful and of little value. If we would restore its purchasing power and value, we must restrict the volume of currency, and we must practice in connection therewith the strictest economy if we are to recover from the great burdens this World War has thrust upon us. Our national debt is staggering, but we must meet it and pay it. How are we to do it? Go on making extravagant appropriations? No; curtail them. It is up to Congress to devise ways and means, and this legislation is a step in the right direction.

The legislation proposed in this bill will cure many of our ills. The experts who have been leeches on Uncle Sam's Treasury will be reduced in number and required to secure employment elsewhere or in some other line of trade.

From the statistical figures available, the total expenditures of the Government from the day of the Declaration of Independence down to and until we entered into war with Germany amounted to about $25,600,000,000. During the war appropriations aggregated something like $51,500,000,000. The annual expenditure for the maintenance of all activities of the Government prior to our entrance into the war was $1,500,000,000. Our bonded indebtedness prior to the late war was less than $1,000,000,000, and the interest charge thereon was something like $22,000,000.

When all our present obligations resulting from the war are paid and all the contract obligations are settled in full, the interest-bearing obligations of the United States will amount to about $34,000,000,000 and the average annual interest and sinking-fund charge will approximate something like $1,600,000,000. These figures make it perfectly plain that the interest charges alone of this Government in the future will be equal to, if not greater than, the total cost of maintaining the Government prior to the war.

The chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. GOOD] made a statement on the floor the other day that the appropriations required to defray the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1920 would be something like $5,600,000,000. From whom will Uncle Sam secure this money? From the taxpayers of the country. They will be required to bear this burden; and I am not surprised that the taxpayers everywhere throughout this Nation should be knocking at the doors of Congress requesting it to economize and cut down unnecessary appropriations.

Gentlemen of the House, the old ship of state is drifting to the rocks, and it is the duty of Congress to divert her course and to steer her safely into the business channels of the business world. Uncle Sam must wake up and settle down pretty soon, for if he does not he will not be able to settle up. He can grope in financial blunders no longer. He must change his business system.

The budget system has been tried in many States of this Union relative to State expenditures, and it has been found to be a successful plan. In my own State—the great State of Ohio—this system was adopted in 1913. It provides that the various heads of State departments shall transmit estimates of their financial requirements to the governor on blanks furnished for that purpose, and that the auditor shall report to the governor concerning the condition of the treasury. The governor must submit these estimates, without provision, to the legislature, accompanied by his budget of current expenses of the State.

In 1913 Arkansas, Ohio, and Oregon adopted the budget system. In 1915 Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota, and Washington adopted it. In 1916 Maryland, New Jersey, and New York adopted it. In 1917 Delaware, Kansas, New Mexico, Utah, and West Virginia adopted it. In 1918 Virginia adopted it. In 1919 Alabama, Arizona, Idaho, Indiana, Montana, Nevada, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, and Wyoming adopted it. In 1916 Louisiana adopted it. In 1917 Connecticut, Illinois, South Dakota, Tennessee, Vermont, and Wisconsin adopted it. In 1918 Georgia, Kentucky, Massachusetts, and Mississippi adopted it. In 1919 Maine, Michigan, and New Hampshire adopted it. At the present time there are 43 out of the 48 States that have enacted budget legislation, and of these, I think, two are of the type that was recommended or advocated by that stanch Democrat, Mr. Fitzgerald, of New York, and these two States are New York and Arkansas. There are 19 that are of the type that has come to be known as the commission type; there are 22 that have come to bear the label of executive type.

Last year was not a normal year, but last year our original estimates were $13,504,357,939.64. Supplemental estimates were added, giving us a total of $30,365,463,993.74. The actual appropriations of last year were $25,266,194,173.53. The appropriations, you will observe, were $5,101,259,820.18 less than the estimates submitted to Congress. Five billion dollars difference between the administrative estimates and the congressional appropriations in one year, and for this year the original estimates submitted have been $8,089,667,298.07. We have not gotten the supplemental estimates as yet. Heaven only knows what they will amount to. If there ever was a time in our national history when there should be a league of Americans it is now. The success of this Nation in the future will depend very largely upon the solidity of its citizenship. We must all have a uniform aim, and that aim should be to economize in every way possible, so that the burden of taxation now resting so heavily upon the shoulders of the taxpayers throughout the country may be lessened. As an American deeply interested in American industries, in the stability of our institutions, in the citizenship of our country and the welfare of our people generally, I shall use every faculty that I possess to reduce Government appropriations and to establish an economical business basis in the governmental affairs of the country. [Applause.]

Under our present system of estimating and passing appropriations there is ample opportunity for gross graft and waste, but under the budget system no such opportunity is afforded. Strange, is it not, that a system so faulty as the present one should continue in vogue for so many years, during which time millions of dollars of the people's money have been wasted?

Under the budget system the Chief Executive of the Nation will be charged with the responsibility of presenting to Congress such budget as in his judgment is necessary to the liquidation of the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year thereafter.

Heretofore the estimates submitted have been a guess and not a structure, and this method all will concede is a reckless method of transacting public business and has been astoundingly costly to the Government and the taxpayers of the country.

The responsibility for the future appropriations under this budget bill will rest with the President. He is elected by the people and he should be responsible to them, and should account to them, for the distribution of the public funds. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) there is created in the office of the President a bureau of the budget. There shall be in the bureau a director and an assistant director, who shall be appointed by the President and receive salaries of $10,000 and $7,500 a year, respectively. The assistant director shall perform such duties as the director may designate, and during the absence or incapacity of the director or during a vacancy in the office of director he shall act as director.

(b) The director, with the approval of the President, shall appoint and fix the compensation of such employees and make such expenditures for rent, printing, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, periodicals, stationery, furniture, office equipment, other supplies, and necessary expenses of the office as may from time to time be provided for by Congress. All employees in the bureau whose compensation is less than $5,000 a year shall be appointed from lists of eligibles furnished by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service laws and regulations.

(c) For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $100,000 for the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of the bureau, including the payment of the salaries herein authorized. No person appointed by the director shall be paid a salary in excess of $5,000 a year, and not more than three persons appointed by him shall be paid a salary at that rate.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, commencing with the word "For," in line 12, on page 2, down to and including the word "authorized," in line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 2, beginning with the word "For," in line 12, strike out all down to and including the word "authorized," in line 17.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this is not an appropriation bill, and when the bill was first introduced it contained this provision, on the theory that perhaps it might be passed so that the law could be made available for the making of the estimates for the next fiscal year. Of course, there will be a deficiency bill to later take care of anything of this kind, and there are objections to carrying an appropriation in a legislative bill, and I think the appropriation carried in this bill might as well go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLARK of Missouri: In line 6, page 1, after the word "President," insert the words "who shall be removable at the pleasure of the President."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the way this bill stands, in its original shape, this comptroller general would be appointed for life. I am opposed to any such tenure.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. This does not apply to the comptroller general. This applies to the director of the budget, who is appointed by the President, and as he is the servant of the President, he of course would be removable by the President.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does the gentleman know that? I have heard it asserted here several times.

Mr. MADDEN. If the President appoints him and there is no restriction on removing him, the President will have the power to remove him.

Mr. KITCHIN. Just as he can remove the Register of the Treasury or the Comptroller of the Treasury at present, or a Cabinet member. The gentleman's construction is correct as to the comptroller general, who appears later on.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it not true that shortly after the Civil War Secretary Stanton refused to resign?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. But later on they were proceeding on the theory that the President could remove him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That was at a time when the Republican Party took a somersault that was absolutely astonishing. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. And they have kept up the habit ever since. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Anyhow they had what is called the tenure of office act, and Stanton got so that he would not speak to the President, or the President got so that he would not speak to Stanton. Both of them were very quarrelsome, and, contrary to all common sense, the Republicans insisted on Stanton's staying in the Cabinet, and Johnson undertook to prize him out, which he had a perfect right to do, and that is what he fell out with Gen. Grant about. He removed Stanton and appointed Grant Secretary of War ad interim, and he said with the understanding with Grant that Grant was to hold on to the office simply for the purpose of trying the constitutionality of the tenure of office act, and Grant denied it. Each one of them always said the other lied about it, and they would not ride up to the Capitol together when Grant was inaugurated. Anyhow, Grant——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have long enough to tell this tale.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, the committee will not object provided the gentleman withdraws his amendment and offers it in the right place.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is not in the right place, I will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to have his time extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Anyhow, Grant moved out when the crisis came and Stanton moved in, and I think he slept and took his meals over in the War Department. Anyhow, Stanton held on until after the impeachment trial and Johnson was acquitted by one vote. Then the very minute the Republicans got in possession of the whole thing again, in the first days of March, they repealed the tenure of office act, which showed that it was simply done to hold things down and to bedevil Andrew Johnson.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that in order to prevent Johnson from removing Stanton the tenure of office act was passed in 1867, and passed over his veto, and afterwards he was removed anyway, in spite of the tenure of office act?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true. He ought to have been removed, simply because he was not on good terms with the President. It is ridiculous to think that the President can not control his Cabinet. Now, as quick as the Republicans got in they repealed the tenure of office act, and there they were.

Now, I am not in favor of giving any man a life office. I do not care three whoops who he is, where he is, or where he comes from, or whether he is a Democrat or a Republican. They have got too many of them now.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 1, line 6, strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$7,500."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I think that a salary equal to that of a Member of the House or of the Senate is adequate for a director of the budget, and for that reason I think we are fully justified in leveling this matter to the point indicated by the amendment.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman think that the salary of a Member of Congress is adequate at the present time?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Oh, I am not debating that proposition. I do not want to give a bigger salary to the other fellow than we have while we are at the grade we are at now.

Mr. TILSON. We have the power to change that matter and give Congressmen an adequate salary.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That is true, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think the gentleman from Connecticut wants to raise that question now.

Mr. TILSON. I am willing to raise it at any time and to vote for it right now, because my people wish Congressmen to have an adequate and fair salary.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is it the intention of the gentleman to move to reduce the salary of the assistant director in case this amendment is adopted?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I have an amendment for that purpose.

It occurs to me that we have argued strongly enough on many other questions here on other bills to prove the advisability of adopting this amendment.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman desire to speak on this amendment?

Mr. EMERSON. I simply desire to get five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I think in the orderly procedure on this bill we will get a great deal further if we may have the amendments presented just as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] has presented his amendment, and then have the debate confined to the amendment, and then have action taken on the amendment. Quite a number of gentlemen did not get an opportunity to speak in the general debate. I think they ought to have some leeway, but I hope they will select opportunities when a specific amendment is not under consideration, so that we will not get the debate confused.

As to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska, I am as much opposed to high salaries as any Member of this House. I do not believe in them. I do not believe that under our system of government we ought to encourage them; but I want to say that this office and that of the comptroller general will be such important offices, and the duties to be performed will be so important, and the standing of the men who will be called upon to perform those duties will be of such a character that you will be compelled to pay good salaries. If we do not pay fair salaries and fail to get good men, the failure will not be chargeable to the system but to a failure to pay a living wage to the men who are to administer the law.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If this officer performs his duty in accordance with the expectation of Congress, how many times $10,000 will he save to the Government?

Mr. GOOD. A great many times $10,000. I anticipate that the estimates which will come in this year will be more than $5,000,000,000, and we must provide a salary that will at least give a man living expenses here in Washington. Now, it was proposed that we should make the salary of this position the same as that of a Cabinet member. The committee felt that there ought to be some difference, but they did not feel that the President would be able to get the character of man that would be necessary to do this work for less than the amount specified.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman answer this question: What is the salary of the Secretary to the President?

Mr. GOOD. It is $7,500.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. It occurs to me that the salary of the Secretary to the President and his duties are fully as important as those of the director of the budget will be.

Mr. GOOD. I do not think so at all. We have fixed the salaries of the members of the Farm Loan Board, one of the last commissions that Congress established, at $10,000 a year. Yet it is seriously proposed here that we shall reduce the salary of this very important position. I do not believe that in the enactment of a great statute, such as we are about to enact, we should cripple the President and should tie his hands by making the salary so low that he will not be able to get the character of man that he ought to have, when he must intrust to him the collecting of information for him and in giving him advice upon this most important question.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. How much are we now paying the Director General of Railroads?

Mr. GOOD. I think $25,000 a year. Several of the regional directors get $40,000, and I think one or two get $50,000. There are several $25,000 positions, although the Director General himself gets but $25,000 a year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is not a congressional appropriation, though.

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. This kind of a man would be in line with the class of men who are getting these salaries.

Mr. GOOD. The President must have a good man, the best possible to secure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman believe that the President is going to appoint a man to this office who is superior to every man in the House of Representatives and the United States Senate?

Mr. GOOD. No; but I do not believe the Members of the House of Representatives or the Members of the United States Senate who do their work properly are receiving enough money.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but they are receiving a certain amount, and there is no earthly prospect of its being raised, either.

Mr. GOOD. I imagine that with living expenses what they are now, if there was to be a revision of that law there might be some change in the salary.

At any rate, I think the gentleman from Missouri fully understands the tremendous duties that this man will be called upon to perform, and he ought to have a salary commensurate with those duties even if some other persons are not adequately paid.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Iowa says that this man is going to pass upon estimates amounting to so many billion dollars?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do not we have to pass upon the same amount of estimates?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the sense, then, in making the distinction?

Mr. GOOD. What sense was there in fixing the salary of the members of the Cabinet at $12,500, who now make the estimates we pass upon? What sense was there in fixing the salary of the directors of the Farm Loan Board, that went through here without exception, at $10,000?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I never thought there was very much sense in it and do not now. I once heard Senator Bailey make a statement on the floor of this House that ought to be bored into the head of every man in the public service, and that was that he hoped the time would never come when the salary of a public official was the principal inducement to his holding the office.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri and the Members of the House that here is a little bureau that is being established which will cost less than almost any other bureau in the Government and it will perform a great function. It will save money on all of them. If we want to strangle the bill, if we want to defeat the legislation, let us say to the President we will give him a man, but most any old man will do and that we do not propose to give him a salary sufficient to get the kind of a man that he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. ANDREWS.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 7 ayes and 52 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The question of tellers was taken, and tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of some importance, and I think we ought to have a quorum here to pass upon it.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the gentleman from Texas will not insist on that. We have expressed our demand in relation to these matters.

Mr. BLANTON. How many of us have expressed it? I will withdraw it, Mr. Chairman. If the majority is willing to pass on these matters with a handful of Members present, I am willing.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I now offer my other amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "and" strike out the figures $7,500 and insert the figures $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 5 ayes and 48 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers. I may not get but one vote, but I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas requests tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken, and tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for the budget bill and for the rule which is necessary to carry it into operation, and I trust the bill and the rule will pass this House without a dissenting vote. Congress is continually being criticized for extravagance, and Members are continually arising on the floor of this House and denying that accusation. This bill gives Congress an opportunity to fix the responsibility for this extravagance.

This is the most important bill that has been presented to this Congress and one of the most important bills that has ever been presented to any Congress, for it lets the people of this country in on the ground floor and gives them a view of the expenditures of the Government, with an opportunity to fix responsibility. We are eternally charging the departments with duplication and extravagance, and the people of the country blame Congress, because we have provided no way for the public to find out who is to blame.

The responsibility for providing the machinery so that the public may be able to ascertain the truth about these matters is upon Congress, and if we do not do it we should be criticized.

This bill will save the people of this country millions of dollars, will centralize the responsibility, will prevent graft, will keep the purse strings of the Government directly under the control of the people.

This bill will prevent duplication, will prevent irresponsible heads of departments, whose sole object is to get their hands into the Public Treasury, from getting more than that to which they are entitled.

The budget system, wisely administered, is the greatest system to control public and private expenditures. We all practice it in our own private affairs. The opponents of the budget bill are those who would increase public expenditures, not decrease them. The opponents of this bill are those who would conceal responsibility as much as possible and thus enable certain interests to make raids upon the Public Treasury without being caught.

The budget system wipes out the old fossil system that has cursed this country for many years. The budget system takes us from the cobweb financial system of the past, to the modern, sane, and up-to-date system of the best regulated public and private institutions.

I congratulate the chairman of the committee that has reported this bill and the rule. He has taken the good from all budget systems and placed it in this bill.

The great cities of the world have been obliged to adopt this system to save themselves from bankruptcy. Large private concerns adopted the system several years ago. Let Congress delay not another session in passing this wise and fruitful legislation. Put the responsibility for the initiating of expenditures upon the executive branch of the Government and the responsibility for the appropriating upon the legislative branch and you have solved the problem of fixing responsibility for extravagance and that is all the people ask. The people then will be placed directly in touch with public expenditures and will be able to fix the responsibility, and there can be no shifting of this responsibility from one department or subdivison upon another. The people who pay the taxes will know, as they have a right to know, who is to blame, and they then have the remedy in their hands. The people demand this legislation and we must give it to them. Give the people what they want, as they pay the bills.

We are representatives of the people and when we find out what the people want it is our duty to give it to them. The people want this bill, and woe unto him who opposes it. [Applause.]

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On page 2, line 4, strike out the words "law books."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 4, after the word "telephone," strike out the words "law books."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I moved to strike out the words "law books" because we are starting out on an economic system which I heartily indorse. Nearly every appropriation bill we have had, it does not matter for what purpose, has a provision for law books. Whether the money is spent for law books or what I can not say, because I have not made a personal investigation.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman wants to do that, because this provision is carried in every appropriation bill for every bureau and department, and my recollection is that in even the largest department of the Government, except the Department of Justice, the cost is not exceeding $500 a year, and my recollection is that in most cases it amounts to but $100 a year.

Mr. SEARS. Five hundred dollars for law books. The poorest lawyer is the man who never studied law, and when you give him a law book you are doing him an injury. [Laughter.] I do not see why these matters where legal points are involved can not be referred to the Attorney General or some one in his office for an opinion. I do not care to argue it further. We have bought enough law books for departments at $500 a year to have the largest library not only in the city of Washington but in the world. And yet the books do not amount to so very much as they are scattered all over the city and are in most cases, no doubt, mere duplications.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 3 ayes and 45 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 3, after the word "for," I move to strike out the word "rent." I am simply offering these motions, and do not care to take up very much time, to test the sincerity of the majority side as to economy. We know that down at Sixth and B Streets——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SEARS: Page 2, line 3, after the word "for," strike out the word "rent."

Mr. SEARS. As I was saying, down at Sixth and B Streets there are plenty of vacant offices that were built during the war. There are vacant offices all over the city owned by the Government. Until these offices are disposed of and torn down I do not see the necessity for paying out anything for rent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 5, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 5, I move to strike out the words "furniture, office equipment."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS: Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "furniture, office equipment."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the House upon the careful consideration we are giving the most important bill which has ever come before Congress, one with which I am heartily in accord. I believe that it will accomplish great good. The vote just taken developed the fact that 39 Members present voted. Certainly, the country can feel assured. After the committee has refused to strike out law books, although only $500 a year is expended for that purpose, to be used by those who do not understand law, and after having refused to strike out a provision for rent, when we have plenty of buildings and no money should be expended for rent, I can but anticipate a similar fate for the amendment which I now offer. We know that the various departments are now offering for sale throughout the country handsome office furniture and fixtures. You can get them almost at your own price, and the various departments of the Government who bought these fixtures, because they were absolutely necessary during the war, are now trying to dispose of them. Yet with this economical measure before us, we expect to spend a large amount of money for office fixtures. Of course it is nicer to place your heels on a new walnut table than it is on the handsome tables that the Government already owns, but I have just been home and the people are complaining about high taxes. I do not blame them in the least. If the chairman is sincere, knowing as he does the situation, because he labors hard, knowing as he does what the situation is, because of his position as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, realizing that we have all of the office fixtures and equipment absolutely necessary, then I think for once he will not oppose my amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is all right if he could get his bunch to follow him, but when they crack the whip here and cut them loose from him, he can not get a following.

Mr. SEARS. I am not referring either to that or the other, for this is nonpolitical. I do seriously offer this amendment. The chairman of the committee the other day nearly convinced me with his earnest and eloquent appeal for economy that certain salaries should be cut from $5,000 to $4,000, and to-day he has nearly convinced me that a salary should remain at $10,000, and not lowered. Mr. Chairman, am I coming or going? Perhaps, however, this is because no broken-down, dilapidated college professors are involved; whereas the other day, according to his argument, broken-down, dilapidated college professors were involved and, therefore, the salaries should be cut. Professors and teachers need no defense at my hands. Their good work is too well known. I am sure, however, that the chairman, with his ability and winning ways, will argue in favor of a little economy instead of increasing our appropriations, in order that the taxpayers may get some relief.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this is a legislative bill. It is legislation that I believe will remain on the statute books for some years to come. It will no doubt require amendment, but the principle is sound. The gentleman intimates that this is an authorization, and that under it expensive furniture will be purchased. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that we now have acres of furniture belonging to the Government that is stored here in Washington, but no department can get a chair or a desk unless out of its appropriation it pays into the Treasury the value of the chair or that desk, and before it can get the money with which to buy it there must be authority for the appropriation. The gentleman would have the President, therefore, with a budget bureau without a chair for officials or clerks to sit on, without a desk to work over, and there would be no authority of law to buy it. That would be the condition in which we would find ourselves if his amendment should be adopted.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. Is the gentleman speaking for the minority, and does he intend to convey to the country that, although we have acres and acres of desks and the finest furniture in the world, it is impossible for the minority to secure this furniture?

Mr. GOOD. What does the gentleman mean by the minority?

Mr. SEARS. The majority, I intended to say. Does he intend to say that the men on the majority, the minority cooperating with them, can not get the use of the furniture?

Mr. GOOD. No; I am talking about the Bureau of the Budget. I mean to say there is a statute passed, and the gentleman was in Congress when it was passed, to the effect that none of the departments can get this furniture owned by the Government unless payment is made for it.

Mr. SEARS. I know about that, but they got some for me the other day; they sent some down——

Mr. GOOD. That furniture was obtained through the Clerk of the House, and the Clerk of the House had to pay for it. If he got it from the department, he had to pay the department for it. But the gentleman would not have furniture that came from the War Department. He insisted like other Members, I suppose. I am not speaking personally, but I do know that several gentlemen did not want oak but wanted mahogany furniture, so we had to report out an appropriation for mahogany furniture.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield? I have oak furniture and I have not complained.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has oak furniture?

Mr. SEARS. That which was sent me.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no; the gentleman has mahogany furniture.

Mr. SEARS. I only have what has been there for years and years.

Mr. GOOD. That is mahogany.

Mr. SEARS. Yes; but the furniture I am referring to is that which was furnished me under the recent appropriation for additional clerical help, and that is oak, or imitation oak.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no; all the desks in the House Office rooms are of a uniform character, and they are mahogany desks, roll-top desks.

Mr. SEARS. I am not speaking of desks; I am not chairman of a committee any longer, but the gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and if he will make me a visit to my office I will show him the furniture to which I refer, and then he can see whether it is oak or mahogany.

Mr. GOOD. There is probably a little oak stand that the gentleman got in recently, but the furniture is mahogany.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out all after the word "expenditures" in line 3, page 2, down to the end of line 5 and substitute the word "for" for the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEAGALL: Page 2, line 3, after the word "expenditures" strike out all the remainder of lines 3, 4, and 5 down to and including the word "and" and insert the word "for."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, if my amendment is adopted it will still leave in this paragraph a provision that the director of the bureau of the budget shall appoint and fix the compensation of its employees and make such expenditures for the necessary expenses of the office as may from time to time be provided for by Congress. Now, so far as I am concerned that goes far enough, even when viewed from the standpoint of one most friendly to this bill. When we give the director power to appoint his employees and fix their salaries, I think, then, we have gone far enough. I do not like the idea of empowering him to incur any other expenses. We know from ample observation the tendency to expend money unnecessarily when we give this blanket authority. Why, there is a provision here for periodicals, as if the man to be appointed to this job had to have the Government buy him something to read in order that he may inform himself of his duties.

Mr. SEARS. If the gentleman will permit, he takes it too seriously. This is not supposed to be for economy. This is to fool the people.

Mr. STEAGALL. Well, just to be frank about that, I do not know that I agree entirely with the statement made by the gentleman from Florida. I have no doubt that the gentlemen responsible for this bill expect good to come from it and expect it to work a reduction of public expenditures. But, as I have already stated to the committee, I have very little faith in the efficacy of this bill at that point. But, waiving all that, I am merely trying to strike from this paragraph the blanket authority that authorizes the director to go out and rent buildings and buy periodicals and books and stationery and law books, and, in a fashion, establish another spending machine not responsible to the Congress.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. It carries the clause to authorize him to make whatever expenditures are authorized by Congress, and to fix compensation for his employees, and it seems to me that is enough.

I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is not an appropriation bill, but a bill creating and organizing this budget, and the bill expressly states on its face that these expenditures may be made when provided for by Congress. Now, he can not spend a dollar for rent, or a dollar for furniture, or a dollar for any of these purposes set forth, unless Congress gives him money with which to do it.

Mr. HASTINGS. And if you put that on an appropriation bill without its being authorized, it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman, as a lawyer, can not object to my amendment, because my amendment leaves the paragraph to read that the director shall have the power to appoint and fix the compensation of his employees and make such expenditures for necessary expenses in the office as may from time to time be authorized by Congress. So, as amended, it does exactly what the gentleman from Tennessee states.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think it would give greater latitude to the bill than the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That after June 30, 1920, no estimate or request for any appropriation, and no recommendation as to how the revenue needs of the Government should be met, shall be submitted to Congress by any officer of the executive branch of the Government except the President, unless at the request of either House of Congress.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEAGALL: Page 6, line 3, strike out all of section 7.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, this section provides—

That after June 30, 1920, no estimate or request for any appropriation, and no recommendation as to how the revenue needs of the Government should be met, shall be submitted to Congress by any officer of the executive branch of the Government except the President, unless at the request of either House of Congress.

Now, there may be some necessity for this that I do not see, but I can not understand why the various committees of the House, which, at least so far as anything we know at the present is concerned, are to continue to exist and function, should not have the right to the estimates and recommendations of the various departments of the Government just as they have had heretofore. I do not see what harm can come even if everything is done that has been suggested or contemplated in connection with this bill. Even if we have the supercommittee that effort is to be made to create, there is no reason to prohibit the submitting of these estimates to the various committees of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. And certainly so long as those committees are to continue as they are now and to perform the same duties they now perform, there is no reason why they should not have this informattion from the various departments in connection with which they serve.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. In a minute I will yield.

And as this section is drawn the Committee on Naval Affairs would have no right to call upon the Navy Department or the Secretary of the Navy for these estimates or figures or recommendations, or any information; at least no right to require such reports to be submitted. The same as to the Committee on Military Affairs, or any other committee of this House. No committee will under this section be allowed to receive this information, or at least if they may receive it they will not have the right to require it, and the House will not have that information except at its own request or in response to a resolution of the whole House making such request. As I understand, this section would mean that nothing could be done until the House itself took action looking toward obtaining those recommendations and statements from these various departments.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman probably has overlooked the fact that the President under this bill is charged with the responsibility of reporting all the budget appropriations for every branch of the Government.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; that is true, that he is charged with such responsibility.

Mr. MADDEN. And if the President is not made the sole instrumentality through which these reports are to be made, we would have chaos worse than we ever had before.

Mr. STEAGALL. I understand thoroughly that the President is supposed to have the final say on all these matters, but I do not see why the various Members of this House should not still have the right to pursue their inquiries into every department as far as they please, in order to get all the information they can from the departments or from any other source. Unless these various appropriation committees are to be dispensed with, it seems to me no law should be passed preventing the executive heads of the departments from furnishing these estimates and recommendations or any information desired. But the paragraph reads that this "shall not" be done.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. MADDEN. This does not take away from anybody any right of inquiry. It simply gives to the President exclusively the right to make estimates and requests for appropriations and imposes on him the duty of making recommendations as to revenue needs in the budget.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the present law provides for the manner in which the estimates shall be submitted, and then it provides that all the supplementary estimates shall be transmitted to the Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, let us read very carefully section 7, to which the gentleman from Alabama objects. It provides—

That after June 30, 1920, no estimate or request for any appropriation, and no recommendation as to how the revenue needs of the Government should be met, shall be submitted to Congress by any officer of the executive branch of the Government except the President, unless at the request of either House of Congress.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. STEAGALL. Does it not say that no estimate or recommendation or request for any appropriation shall be submitted by any executive head except the President, unless Congress especially requires it?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely, of course.

Mr. STEAGALL. Then how can we get it unless Congress itself as a body requests it, as distinguished from a committee of Congress as heretofore?

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has based his argument on the fact that none of the executive officers could come before committees of Congress. This does not attempt in any way to control the executive departments so far as their appearing before committees for hearings is concerned. This determines the manner in which estimates are to come before the Congress, through the Speaker's desk, for appropriations. If you are going to have a budget and make the President responsible for it, you can not have every Tom, Dick, and Harry coming in every day, sending in requests through the Speaker's desk for an appropriation. The purpose of this bill is to make the President responsible for every request for money that comes to Congress. That is all this bill does. It simply provides that this provision of law that now obtains, which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit estimates from the several departments to the Speaker or to the Vice President, shall be superseded by an act that requires the President himself to send it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It does not prevent Congress from putting an appropriation authorized by law on a bill, even though there is no estimate?

Mr. GOOD. Not at all.

Mr. STEAGALL. I ask the gentleman as a lawyer if this does not say that no estimate or request for an appropriation and no recommendation as to how the revenue needs should be met shall be submitted to Congress by the executive branch of the Government, except through the President, unless Congress requests it?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. None of these things shall be submitted to Congress?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does not the existing law make exactly the same provision about estimates that are now sent through the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. They must be sent in that way, and in no other way. This law will in no way interfere with the committees or Members than does the present law?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. This not only refers to requests for appropriations, but to recommendations as to how the revenue needs of the Government should be met?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Would that preclude the Tariff Commission from recommending to the Committee on Ways and Means methods of raising revenue?

Mr. GOOD. They have not that authority now. All that the Tariff Board has authority to do is to investigate as to the cost of production and things of that kind and to report to Congress. They have no power to make recommendations.

Mr. RAMSEYER. They are all experts. Suppose the committee wants them to make recommendations?

Mr. GOOD. No committee ought to ask them to do that. All the power they have now is to investigate and make findings of fact.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. Every executive officer is the mere agent of the Chief Executive, and this measure merely provides that every recommendation for expenditure should come from the Chief Executive and not through his agents. That is, you do not want his agents to do it, but the President himself?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I simply want to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] to the fact that his fears are not well founded. This does not in any wise prevent any Member of Congress, either in the House or in the Senate, from making any inquiry that he may wish to make or acquiring any information that he may need for the proper discharge of his duties. It simply transfers the power of reporting estimates for appropriations from the Secretary of the Treasury to the President of the United States, and provides that the President shall make his reports; in other words, that the President shall furnish to the Congress of the United States a complete photograph of the annual needs of the Government in advance; and it does away with the piecemeal reports of items of appropriation in the various departments and makes the President supply the information complete as to the needs of the whole Nation.

Now, the question arises, do we want that? If we do not want it we ought to stand where we are. The purpose of this section is to do away with the present slipshod method of doing business and to institute a systematic, scientific mode of supplying information to the Congress, upon which Congress can base intelligent and economical action, and incidentally to supply to the American people information upon which the administration can base its claims for economy or extravagance, as the case may be. That is the whole story. There is no danger in this thing. There is nothing hidden in it. It simply goes to the American people with the statement that we are in favor of a reform that is likely in the long run to help to economize in public expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That after June 30, 1920, special and additional estimates may be transmitted by the President to provide (a) for expenditures under any laws passed since the transmission of the regular estimates contained in the budget and (b) for appropriations which, in his judgment, are necessary for the public service, and he shall accompany such estimates with a statement of the reasons therefor.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When I first came to Congress that able and distinguished jurist, my Democratic colleague, Mr. Fitzgerald, of New York, was urging upon Congress the necessity of passing a budget system. He worked hard for two years to have Congress do just what we are doing to-day. During the last two years the learned gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Sherley, Democrat, was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and on that committee was the present chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman who is now leading the fight for this "Good" bill—I say that with all sincerity—made a hard fight to have a committee appointed in order that some budget system might be adopted. I understand that in a rider on one of the appropriation bills Mr. Sherley succeeded in having passed a resolution providing for a committee to report out a budget system somewhat similar to the present bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SEARS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The thing that the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Sherley, did was to report out a provision on a a deficiency bill which provided for the appointment of a joint commission to study the question of a budget. Now, we have been able to do that, without a dollar of expense, by a committee of the House.

Mr. SEARS. I agree with the gentleman. He is absolutely right. It was for a joint commission to study the subject. But the pioneers, Democrats though they were, had blazed the way, and, therefore, the task was made easier for the present committee. By this, far be it from me to take from the members of the present committee the credit due them. This House provided for a committee to study the subject. The committee has done its work well and has reported out a good bill, to some parts of which I have objected; but that is only human. The bill of the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Sherley, died in the Senate because of the famous filibuster of which we have heard so much.

I am glad that we are all seeing the light, and I sincerely trust that a wave of economy may really come, and that the taxpayers may be relieved of some of their burdens.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so because I failed to give credit to the splendid work of the Select Committee on the Budget, whose members met day after day for two weeks, with every member at his post of duty every morning, and they stayed there until the hearings were concluded, after two weeks of hard work. When that work was done they sat down and commenced to go over the bills and resolutions before them. I never saw more conscientious work done by a body of men than by the men who were on that committee, and they worked in unison for the accomplishment of one thing, which was to correct what they believed to be evils in the statute and in the present system and reported a bill that they thought would correct in full measure all of those evils and present a system bottomed upon a sound and business-like foundation.

That committee worked without the expenditure of a single penny, except to send telegrams and letters to men who appeared before the committee. The clerk of that committee was the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, Marcellus Shield, who volunteered his services without pay. [Applause.] That work was all accomplished, as I said before, without the expenditure of a single penny, except to send a few telegrams and for the printing of the hearings and the reports.

I want to say that I feel, as chairman of that committee, under many obligations for the manner in which every member of the committee, laying aside all political considerations, entering into the work with enthusiasm, and bringing to the work a fund of information that I did not believe was possible in the short length of time the committee had to prepare for the hearings. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Gentlemen of the committee, the question of a budget for many years has been urgent in the minds of the business side of our nationality and has been pressed with more or less vigor by the business world upon Congress. We have had very many suggestions, many of them fugitive in character, coming from various sources, until finally the budget question came to a succinct head by a resolution having come to the Rules Committee looking to the appointment of a special committee to report to Congress a plan for consideration.

There had been a proposal to have a joint committee of the Senate and House. That did not meet with favor. There was a suggestion of a commission. That was the idea I had, speaking for myself. I thought the commission would be the better plan—to have a commission appointed, represented by a majority of experts and a minority by Members of Congress, so that the Members of Congress sitting with the experts in the preparation of a budget plan could make a report of the findings and press that report upon the floor of Congress. This was the plan adopted to secure a scheme of vocational education. However, that proposal did not meet with approval.

The proposal that met with the approbation of the Rules Committee, without a single negative vote, is the one that is now before us; that is, a special committee of this House. There was one concern about it when we were discussing it before the Rules Committee, and that was expedition in gathering the data and to report as soon as possible. There was fear that the committee plan might operate to delay it by way of the pigeonhole. That fear was immediately removed by the Rules Committee adopting an amendment to the resolution fixing the limit of time as March 1 of next year, within which this report must be made. I urged a limitation of time to give assurance to the public that action would be forthcoming. It was first thought that the 1st of January would be the limit, but it was feared by some Members that that might not be long enough. Everyone who appeared before the committee favored budget reform. There was a unanimity on the part of everyone who appeared before the Rules Committee that there was no objection to limiting the time for the report except that they wanted to take what time was necessary.

I simply rose at this time for the purpose of congratulating the country upon the assured success of this fiscal reform, and also to commend the committee upon bringing this report here in October when in the consideration of it it was thought it might not be able to be brought in before the first of the year. The Rules Committee fixed it as the 1st of March. Here in October, after continuous sittings of the committee, it brings in the report and we are about to adopt it six months before the time limit. I believe the recommendations when enacted into law will meet with the approval of the country at large.

As I analyze the bill—and I have tried to study it carefully as a student of the budget—this proposal provides for three things that are much needed. The first is fixing upon a plan which must be based on estimates. Heretofore our confusion was in our inability to know how much confidence we should give to the estimates. As the committee said a while ago, every department wants to appreciate its work and therefore will increase its estimates.

There is another item of human nature in it, and that is that every department is likely to ask for more than it needs in the belief that in order to get what it needs they must ask for more because it will be pared down. I remember that that was a fundamental principle of John Stuart Mill. He said you have to require more than can be gotten in order to get what you need. I think the departments have operated largely on that basis. There is one thing I have feared. I do not know whether it is removed here or not.

While the executive was held responsible for making the estimates, and it has been demonstrated that Congress has invariably reduced the expenditures below the estimates, the question with me is, If the executive heretofore was responsible, are we assured that by now placing the responsibility upon the executive department, and having relieved ourselves very much of responsibility, we can fasten it there with effectiveness? That will have to be worked out to see whether it will operate as we hope it will. I think that the plan to be based upon the estimates coming from the executive department provided in this bill is much better, and it will give us greater assurance of a good business transaction on the part of the Government than heretofore.

The second provision that I see is the examination and criticism of the estimates presented, and that is a function that belongs to us. In addition to this emphasis of responsibility I note that the country will have detailed facts, so that it may know what the budget is, as heretofore the country never has known. Even the Congress could scarcely know what the budget would be, it was so attenuated and broken up into so many different parts. We could not connect the outgo with the income as we did not have either. But the examining and criticizing function of Congress is preserved in this plan, and I think that is extremely important. It insures care on the part of the executive to stay within limits in the expenditure. Then here we provide for the independent audit, which is one of the most far-reaching reforms that could have been made. These three decisive provisions will insure a business administration of our fiscal policy.

I rise to congratulate the committee upon its expedition, and I think effectiveness is not lost because of that expedition. We are seeing a consensus of conviction and sound judgment growing out of a uniform demand throughout the country embodying itself now in legislation, and in a very short time, in my judgment, one of the greatest reforms that our country could work will have become a law. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That there is created a department to be known as the accounting department, which shall be an establishment of the Government independent of the executive departments and under the control and direction of the comptroller general of the United States. The offices of Comptroller of the Treasury and Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury are abolished, to take effect July 1, 1920. All other officers and employees of the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury shall become officers and employees in the accounting department at their grades and salaries on July 1, 1920, and all books, records, documents, papers, furniture, office equipment, and other property of the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury shall become the property of the accounting department.

There shall be in the accounting department a comptroller general of the United States and an assistant comptroller general of the United States, who shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive salaries of $10,000 and $7,500 a year, respectively. The assistant comptroller general shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him by the comptroller general, and during the absence or incapacity of the comptroller general, or during a vacancy in that office, shall act as comptroller general. The comptroller general and the assistant comptroller general shall hold office during good behavior, but may be removed at any time by concurrent resolution of Congress after notice and hearing, when, in their judgment, the comptroller general or assistant comptroller general has been inefficient, or guilty of neglect of duty, or of malfeasance in office, and for no other cause and in no other manner.

Any comptroller general or assistant comptroller general removed in the manner herein provided shall be ineligible for reappointment to that office.

When a comptroller general or assistant comptroller general attains the age of 70 years, he shall be retired from his office, and, if he has held the office from which he is retired during the 10 preceding consecutive years, he shall, during the remainder of his natural life, be entitled to one-half the salary he is receiving at the time of his retirement from the office which he then held.

The provisions of this act relating to the accounting department shall be effective on July 1, 1920.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9783, and had come to no resolution thereon.

OPERATION OF TRANSPORTATION SYSTEMS.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and at the special request of the conferees, I call up the conference report upon bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of the transportation systems under Federal control, for their just compensation, and for other purposes." I do this for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted to the conferees. The necessity for that arises out of this situation: The conferees have agreed and the report has been made to each body but neither House has acted upon it. It is found on examination of a certain amendment put in by the House that it is desirable, in order to clarify it, to add to the amendment the words "by the President."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the conference report upon the bill S. 641 be recommitted to the conferees. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday, October 24, after the reading of the Journal, I be privileged to address the House for 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARMENIA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a communication from the Parliament of Armenia, which he lays before the House and refers to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY, indefinitely, on account of a death requiring his return home.

To Mr. HICKS, for two weeks, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8624. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, and to regulate rents in the District of Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 21, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1216) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States," approved August 27, 1888, as amended March 2, 1889, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 391), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CRAGO: A bill (H. R. 10045) providing for the removal of the remains of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines to the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GARD: A bill (H. R. 10046) to safeguard the health of the people living in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: A bill (H. R. 10047) to establish and maintain a permanent force of United States policemen in the District of Columbia for the protection of the public squares and reservations in said district, including the White House grounds; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. MASON: Resolution (H. Res. 343) calling upon the Department of State for certain information as to origin and value of certain press reports relative to Russian conditions; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ASWELL: Resolution (H. Res. 344) to direct the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department to transmit to the House of Representatives certain facts; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 345) to direct the Select Committee on the United States Shipping Board and the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation to transmit to the House of Representatives certain facts; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 346) to direct the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department to transmit to the House of Representatives certain facts; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 347) to direct the Committee on Military Affairs to transmit to the House of Representatives certain facts; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 348) to direct the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department to transmit to the House of Representatives certain facts; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 349) to direct the Water Power Select Committee to transmit to the House of Representatives certain facts; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 350) to direct the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee to transmit to the House of Representatives certain facts; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 351) to direct the Committee on Ways and Means to transmit to the House of Representatives certain facts; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLACK: A bill (H. R. 10048) granting a pension to Willis C. Stephens; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CHINDBLOM: A bill (H. R. 10049) granting an increase of pension to Stanley L. Chapman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 10050) granting an increase of pension to Sylvester F. Wallace; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GARD: A bill (H. R. 10051) for the relief of James Bartram; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HERSMAN: A bill (H. R. 10052) granting a pension to Mary M. Gunsolus; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HICKEY: A bill (H. R. 10053) granting a pension to Maidora C. Parker; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KEARNS: A bill (H. R. 10054) granting an increase of pension to Robert Hill; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LONERGAN: A bill (H. R. 10055) granting a pension to Harriet R. Palmer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MARTIN: A bill (H. R. 10056) for the relief of Charles Lucius Lasalle; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. NOLAN: A bill (H. R. 10057) authorizing the Commissioner of Navigation to cause the foreign-built steamers Hawk and Port Saunders to be documented as vessels of the United States for certain purposes; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. PADGETT: A bill (H. R. 10058) for the relief of John Jones; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PARKER: A bill (H. R. 10059) granting a pension to Ellen Bridge; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PURNELL: A bill (H. R. 10060) granting an increase of pension to Richard H. Virts; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SANFORD: A bill (H. R. 10061) granting a pension to Mary L. Drake; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SNYDER: A bill (H. R. 10062) granting a pension to Ferdinand Buhler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 10063) granting a pension to William G. Rowland; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of A. Kalajan, of Union Hill, N. J., relating to the barbarian Turks in Armenia; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BARBOUR: Petition of the Stanislaus County Farm Bureau, representing 1,021 farmers of Stanislaus County, Calif., favoring a tariff on foreign-grown beans; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BRIGGS: Petition of Local Camp No. 321, United Confederate Veterans, of Polk County, Tex., favoring the repayment of the taxes collected on cotton in the South during the Civil War; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CASEY: Petition of Paul Rother and 25 other citizens of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., protesting against the Smith-Towner educational bill; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. DALLINGER: Petition of board of aldermen of the city of Medford, favoring restoration of daylight-saving law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DEWALT: Petition of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, protesting against the passage of the Smith-Towner educational bill; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. ELSTON: Petition of Piedmont Parlor, No. 120, Native Sons of the Golden West, Oakland, Calif., urging rigorous measures to restrict oriental immigration and settlement; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. HAMILTON: Petition of J. O. Wells and others, asking that the Coast Guard and Life-Saving Service be retained by and kept under the power and control of and made a part of the United States Navy Department; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. KAHN: Petition of San Francisco Parlor, No. 49, Native Sons of the Golden West, of San Francisco, Calif., in favor of the continued exclusion of Asiatic immigrants and recommending additional legislation to render our present exclusion laws more effective; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Keith Parlor, No. 137, Native Daughters of the Golden West, of San Francisco, Calif., in favor of the continued exclusion of Asiatic immigrants and recommending additional legislation to render our present exclusion laws more effective; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Lompoc Valley Chamber of Commerce and Lompoc Valley Bank, both of Lompoc, Calif., urging tariff on foreign-grown beans; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'CONNELL: Petition of sundry citizens of New York, favoring the immediate passage of a bill giving six months' pay to soldiers and sailors who participated in the great world conflict; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Private Soldiers and Sailors' Legion, asking the Judiciary Committee for the immediate favorable report of the bill incorporating the legion organized by the privates; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SUMMERS of Washington: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Walla Walla, Wash., various churches, Sunday schools, and others of the same city, urging Congress to pass House bill 8063, a bill to punish violation of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution by American citizens in foreign countries; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, October 21, 1919.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in this sacred moment, a moment that has the sanction of the custom of this Nation and the indorsement of the habit of a praying people, we pause to make mention of Thy name and worship Thee. Thou art the God of all the earth. Thou art our God. We commit our way into Thy hands and pray Thee to guide us to the fulfillment of Thine own purpose in us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gerry	McKellar	Sherman
Bankhead	Hale	Nelson	Shields
Brandegee	Harding	New	Smith, Ga.
Capper	Harris	Newberry	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Harrison	Norris	Smoot
Colt	Henderson	Nugent	Spencer
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sterling
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Thomas
Dial	Kenyon	Penrose	Townsend
Dillingham	King	Phelan	Trammell
Edge	La Follette	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Elkins	Lenroot	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Lodge	Pomerene	Warren
France	McCormick	Robinson	Watson
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to announce the absence on official business of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

Mr. KING. The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] are absent in attendance at a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are detained on official business. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are detained from the Senate on public business. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, and to regulate rents in the District of Columbia, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have here a resolution passed by the House of Representatives of the Nebraska Legislature, now in session, which I send to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolution as adopted by the House of Representatives of Nebraska October 17, 1919.

Resolved, That our Senators, Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK and Hon. G. W. NORRIS, are hereby requested to do all in their power to defeat the league of nations as now pending before the United States Senate.

WILL F. HITCHCOCK,
Chief Clerk.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a resolution of a local labor union at Duquoin, Ill., which I ask may be printed at length in the RECORD but not read. It is a very short resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas our Government, the United States of America, is at war with Germany; and

"Whereas we, the peoples hereof, are fighting for the freedom of the whole world from autocratic tyranny; and

"Whereas the honor and virtue of our mothers and sisters are placed in peril by the barbaric methods of our enemies: Therefore be it

"Resolved by Local Union No. 510 of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, That we, the members thereof, tender our loyal support, both at home and abroad, toward the successful conclusion of the war; and be it further

"Resolved, That we most emphatically denounce the propaganda of the 'I. W. W.' (Industrial Workers of the World) as being unpatriotic, un-American, and deserving of no place in the free institutions of our country.

"Signed with our official seal this 19th day of November, 1917.

[SEAL.] "W. R. WRIGHT, Secretary."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have a communication in the nature of a petition from citizens of Wayland, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, urging the ratification of the league of nations covenant. The communication is brief, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

We, the undersigned men and women, citizens of Wayland, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, respectfully urge upon your honorable body the supreme importance for the United States of America and for the whole world of prompt ratification of the covenant of the league of nations.

It may not be perfect any more than the Constitution of the United States was perfect, but we believe that it will be the beginning of a better era for the world, as the Constitution was for the country. Like that, it can be amended, if necessary; but if rejected now we fear so good an opportunity to preserve peace in the world may not return in our lifetime.

Amy F. Haskins, David G. Haskins, jr., Jacob Reeves, Wm. H. Branigan, Eunice W. Branigan, Samuel Russell, Mary A. Heard, Israel A. Lupien, J. Charles Vincent, Henry J. W. Drew, Nathaniel R. Gerald, Warren L. Bishop, Lester R. Gerald, John B. Wight, Geo. Edward Dwight, Shelley Dwight, Amos I. Hadley, James Bolton, Mary Bolton, James Joseph Bolton, Sadie Bolton.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Alanson, Mich., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHIPPS presented a memorial of the Civic and Commercial Association of Denver, Colo., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation which confers upon any governmental department or bureau the power to regulate and restrain legitimate business, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Near East Relief, in convention at New York City, N. Y., praying for the extension of aid to American relief workers, American property, and to the stricken people of Armenia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Alderman of Medford, Mass., praying for the restoration of the so-called daylight-saving law to the extent of making it effective and permanent in that portion of the country in the eastern time zone, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 3263) to authorize the construction of flood control and improvement works in Minnesota River and Big Stone Lake, between the States of Minnesota and South Dakota; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3264) granting an increase of pension to Einer Bjarnson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3265) granting an increase of pension to Fred Myers (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 3266) granting a pension to Allie Bailey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEWBERRY:

A bill (S. 3267) for the relief of the Cornwell Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HARDING:

A bill (S. 3268) for the appointment of Commander Charles W. Moots to the permanent Medical Corps of the Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 3269) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Crow; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 3270) authorizing the superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine claims for damages occasioned by acts for which said survey is responsible in certain cases; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. KENDRICK:

A bill (S. 3271) granting a pension to Annie F. Rountree (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $496,000 for the purchase of a site and the erection of an archives building in the city of Washington, D. C., intended to be proposed by him to the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—ELIZABETH H. MILLS.

On motion of Mr. PHELAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Senate bill No. 3420, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, granting a pension to Elizabeth H. Mills, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CARE OF ARMY TRUCKS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have a letter in the way of a memorial written by the lieutenant governor of Nebraska, who at the time he wrote the letter was acting governor on account of the absence from the State of the governor, in relation to the automobile trucks that have been purchased by the Government and are permitted to stand out in the weather and be destroyed. I think we have all learned of thousands of such instances scattered around over the country, but I had no idea that there were some of them in my State. I send to the Secretary's desk a newspaper clipping from the Nebraska State Journal of October 18, and ask that the Secretary may read that part of the letter written to Representative REAVIS of the State of Nebraska that is not marked out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TRUCKS RUSTING IN RAIN—ACTING GOVERNOR POINTS OUT WHAT HE SAYS IS GOVERNMENT NEGLECT OF PROPERTY.

"DEAR MR. REAVIS: There exists a condition here which I wish to take up with you regarding some automobile trucks in charge of the Government, which are standing unprotected from the elements out on the fair grounds annex north of the city. These trucks are such as can be used by the State in our road-making program, but I am informed by the secretary of the department of public works that he has several times applied to the department at Washington for permission to use these trucks in road work, but can receive no answer to the communications sent.

"I went to the fair grounds this morning and investigated the condition of the trucks, after a man had inquired if it would be possible to purchase one of them for use on his farm. I found the trucks, 12 in number, standing out in a field with absolutely no protection over them. Not even the tops had been raised to protect the cushions on the seats and the engine and other parts, in most instances, rusting.

"I would like to ask if there is any way in which the trucks now standing open to the weather can be secured by the State or be purchased by private individuals, or if there is any system in which letters to the department at Washington having these trucks in charge can receive consideration. There are several mighty good stenographers in Washington from Nebraska whom I am sure would be glad to donate a little overtime service in order that they could see the letters from home receive some consideration, if the department is short of help.

"I would like to ask in conclusion if you know who has the authority to have these trucks looked after, or who can give permission for their use by the State or purchase by private individuals?

"Very sincerely, yours,

"P. A. BARROWS, Acting Governor."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the reply to the query of this correspondent is very simple. The distribution of trucks has been prohibited by an act of Congress. The last deficiency bill, I think, contained a rider to that effect. We, and nobody else, therefore, are to blame.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator, Has there been any act of Congress to prohibit the department from taking care of automobiles; from taking them out of the weather and putting up their tops?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Government officials are compelled to let them stand out in the open unprotected?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. Now, let me elaborate——

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to get that information.

Mr. THOMAS. I have given it to the Senator from Nebraska, but I must explain my answer. That condition is due to the rapid and enforced demobilization of the Army, which, of course, carries with it the discharge of thousands of officers who alone under our laws can be made responsible for Government property, and who are, therefore, the only persons who can be given custody of it. That is the situation, as represented by officials of the War Department before the Committee on Military Affairs time and again, and it has not been followed by peace legislation to provide for the contingency. That, I think, answers the Senator's question.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Committee on Military Affairs will bring in a bill or resolution that will permit the War Department to have the tops of the automobiles raised when the officers go away and abandon them. I might say further to the Senator from Colorado that in other parts of the country I notice the Government is selling automobiles at auction.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; the Government is selling some automobiles.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that being done in defiance of law?

Mr. THOMAS. No; the Senator knows very well that it is being done under the provisions of the law.

So far as raising the tops of machines is concerned in particular places, I do not know. Of course, there may be some local instances of negligence that are absolutely unpardonable, and they ought to be corrected.

Let me say before I take my seat that the Committee on Military Affairs is doing the best it can, and I think the Senate has passed a measure for the relief in that direction, but the other House has not as yet taken action.

INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the statements made by Albert H. Gary and Samuel Gompers appearing in to-day's newspapers be printed in the RECORD. They are short statements, but they present the issues before the industrial conference.

I wish to preface the printing of those statements in the RECORD, if that shall be permitted, by saying that the "collective bargaining" which is in controversy, advocated by Mr. Gompers, is an alias for the "closed shop." There is in it no new question. It is vital; it is not a question of legislation nor of arbitration; it is not a principle that can be compromised. It affects the individual right of an American citizen either to earn a living in a union or out of it; in a "closed shop" or out of it. Those are the underlying principles involved in the pending controversy. For that reason I wish to preserve at length in the RECORD the statements of the two men who voice the conflicting principles.

There being no objection, the statements referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GARY'S STATEMENT FOR CAPITAL; GOMPERS DELIVERS LABOR'S REPLY.

JUDGE GARY SAID.

"I desire to make a brief statement in relation to the question under discussion, as well as others submitted to this conference. Further explanation of any vote I may register will probably be unnecessary.

"Like other members of the conference, I recognize that the public interest must always be considered as of the first importance; that all private interest must be subordinated.

"I am heartily in accord with the desire of the President to firmly establish proper and satisfactory relations between all groups of citizens connected with industry, including, of course, what has been designated as capital and labor.

"I believe in conciliation, cooperation, and arbitration whenever practicable without sacrificing principle.

"I am of the fixed opinion that the pending strike against the steel industry of this country should not be arbitrated or compromised, nor any action taken by the conference which bears upon that subject.

"Also, that there should be maintained in actual practice, without interruption, the open shop as I understand it, namely, that every man, whether he does or does not belong to a labor union, shall have the opportunity to engage in any line of legitimate employment on terms and conditions agreed upon between employee and employer.

"I am opposed to a policy or practice which unnecessarily limits production, increases costs, deprives the workman from receiving the highest wage rates resulting from voluntary and reasonable effort, hinders promotion or advancement in accordance with merit, or otherwise interferes with the freedom of individual action.

"As unorganized labor, which embraces the vast majority of working people, has no special representation in this conference, I deem it appropriate to say that all labor should receive due consideration, and that it is the obligation and ought to be the pleasure of employers at all times and in every respect to treat, justly and liberally, all employees, whether unorganized or organized."

SAMUEL GOMPERS'S REPLY.

"If what has occurred in the United States in industrial labor lately has afforded no opportunity for reason, for a new understanding, then there is no reason for a vote in this conference on this question (collective bargaining).

"You can not improve the superstructure safely until you have strengthened the foundation. And the millions of toilers in the United States are the foundation upon whose shoulders rests the entire superstructure of our industrial building.

"The solicitude of the modern employer, who has that understanding of and that great sympathy for the unorganized worker—well, the unorganized workers know where to come when they are in great stress; they know. They know where they can get sympathy; they know where they can get encouragement; they know where their hope lies—and they come to us to be rid of the domination and injustices of arbitrary employers. They come to us and even though we can not help them, by God!—and I say it with all reverence—we will not hurt them."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, as is well known, the industrial conference in session in Washington is composed of the representatives of three groups—the employers' group, the labor group, and one group which is supposed to represent the general public. I have here an editorial from the Aberdeen (S. Dak.) News, which is entitled "Give farmer square deal." I ask that the editorial may be read, and I trust that it may receive the attention of Mr. Baruch, who is represented as the spokesman of the public group.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Would not a "square deal" to the farmers be revolutionary in this epoch?

Mr. STERLING. I hardly think it would.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps the Senator from South Dakota will permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator have the idea that the gentlemen named to represent the public are in fact representing the public?

Mr. STERLING. I am not so sure about that, I will say to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want definite information. I have been subject to distressing doubts, and I want to be satisfied.

Mr. STERLING. I think, perhaps, I myself share the doubts expressed by the Senator from Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the editorial presented by the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"GIVE FARMER SQUARE DEAL.

"Henry Watterson, in his 'Looking Backward' article in the Saturday Evening Post of this week, tells of a debate he once had with William McKinley, in which the subject was which political party was doing the most for the workingman. In his discourse he claimed that it was advisable to discover first who is a workingman in the United States, and he insisted that every person, except the hobo and the 'dude,' the latter term now practically extinct in the vocabulary of Americans, is a workingman. He said the banker, the educator, the merchant, the farmer, the business man, the laborer, all were workingmen together.

"There was much sound sense in the contention of the old Democratic editor, and it applies as well to-day as it did when he had his debate with McKinley, although there is a tendency in some directions to recognize only a member of organized labor as really and truly a laboring man. This tendency is exemplified at the industrial conference at Washington, where of the 45 members 15 are allotted to labor (organized labor), 15 to employers, and 15 to the general public.

"Now, organized labor is but a very small part of the population compared to the farmer, yet of the whole 45 delegates at the conference but 3 are farmers. Farmers, justly, are complaining of this fact, and attribute it, with a considerable show of reason, to the fact that because organized labor has the strike weapon and exercises it, the President, in organizing the conference, gave union labor more consideration than he gave the farmer. There really is no reason in the world why the conference should not have been divided into four groups, with the farmers of the Nation represented by 15 delegates, as well as the labor unions, the employers, and the public. That would have been just, and would have helped the conference materially in arriving at a correct solution of existing problems.

"For the fact can not be gotten away from that the farmer, the first producer of everything the resident of the city eats or wears, was the first sufferer from the high cost of living, and is by way of becoming the first sufferer from the reduced cost of living, when it comes. For instance, hogs have dropped materially on the live-stock markets within the past few weeks, but town people are paying nearly as much for fresh pork, bacon, and ham as they did before the drop. Corn has slumped on the market, so has barley and other grain. The farmer is the loser. And while farm products are showing a downward tendency, whatever the farmer has to buy persists in advancing. This is shown by the fact that farm hands in some parts of the State are demanding 10 cents a bushel for husking corn, and by the higher price the farmer has to pay for farm machinery, lumber with which he builds his barns, and other material he has to use in his business.

"The industrial conference should have had a larger farmer representation, and it will not accomplish its full purpose if it goes at a solution of the high cost of living, among its other problems, by starting at the farmers' end of the high-cost proposition and seeking to reduce the price of farm products while maintaining war-time profits for manufacturers, organized labor, and other branches of industry."

ADDRESS BY GILBERT H. MONTAGUE.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I should like to request unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD without reading an address by Gilbert H. Montague, a well-known attorney of the New York bar, delivered before the annual convention of the American Manufacturers' Export Association on "Cooperative opportunities for the manufacturer under pending legislation." I may say that just at this time, as all Senators are probably aware, in Atlantic City there is being held a convention attended by representatives of commercial organizations from various countries of the world. The address made in New York is so pertinent to the present situation and to the problems of American export development that I feel it would be of considerable use to have it distributed, and I, therefore, ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COOPERATIVE OPPORTUNITIES FOR THE MANUFACTURER UNDER PENDING LEGISLATION.

[An address delivered before the annual convention of the American Manufacturers' Export Association, Oct. 17, 1919 by Gilbert H. Montague, of the New York bar.]

"Cooperation has its uses, but it is no substitute for a sales organization or for marketing ability or for the singleness of purpose that is essential to successful sales promotion in foreign countries. Cooperative export corporations and associations organized under the Webb-Pomerene Act have, in a number of instances, been conspicuously successful; but they have succeeded only in so far as they have overcome the inherent disintegrating tendencies of cooperative enterprise, and by insistence upon adequate sales organization and experienced marketing ability have attained an efficiency in sales promotion equal to that of their single-headed competitors.

"The Edge bill, and the various other measures to assist the financing of our export trade, which are now pending in Congress, must be regarded, like the Webb-Pomerene Act, as merely machinery without power. Unless power, adequately supplied and above all wisely directed, be applied to this machinery by those attempting to operate it, the results will be disappointing and even disastrous.

"Whenever an American district has been desolated by fire or flood, rehabilitation, as a matter of course, has come through the assistance of every outside financial and commercial interest that has dealt, or thereafter hopes to deal, with the afflicted community. Outside manufacturing interests immediately and thoroughly canvass the financial, material, and moral resources of their customers and also of those whom they desire hereafter to be their customers in the afflicted region, and within the limits of sound commercial credit, these outside commercial interests, with the assistance of the outside banks that serve them, and of the local banks that serve the customers, grant extensions on old credits and open new ones. Outside financial houses, representing nonresident investors in the outstanding securities of governmental bodies or business enterprises that have been prostrated by the disaster, promptly and carefully investigate underlying conditions in the devastated area, and assist in extending or readjusting the existing indebtedness and in arranging new loans upon security which will appeal to an increased circle of outside investors. So swift and effective are these operations that within a space measured almost by months, new cities arise upon the ruins of the old, having financial, material, and moral resources far greater than the old, and joined to the outside financial and commercial interests that have come to their assistance by sentimental and business ties of the most enduring character.

"The present European problem is unfortunately far more complicated than that of any prostrated American district. Trained financial and banking ability of the highest technical order will be taxed to its utmost to reduce this problem to anything approaching the relative simplicity of the rehabilitation of a devastated American city. But after financiers and bankers have overcome the obstacles presented by differences in nationality, in credit forms, in depreciated currency, in foreign exchange, in balance of trade, and in European fiscal policies, there will still remain for every American manufacturer that heretofore has dealt, or hereafter hopes to deal, with Europe essentially the same work to do, only in thousandfold increased degree, as is required for the rehabilitation of any devastated American community.

"When inquiries come in from abroad for prices and terms, the American manufacturer appealed to must immediately and thoroughly canvass the financial, material, and moral resources of his prospective customers and within the limits of sound commercial credit, and with the assistance of the manufacturer's own banks and of the local banks which serve the customers, decide upon his terms of credit. Necessarily, the initial investigation must be made wholly from the American manufacturer's standpoint. In American territory, the manufacturer himself, through his own organization, conducts the investigation, with such assistance as he requires from his own banks and from local banks in the customer's territory. In the European situation, however, because of the obstacles already mentioned, much greater assistance from the banks is required. The American manufacturer's standpoint, however, must be maintained throughout. And only by cooperation either between the individual American manufacturer and the banks whom he consults, or between American manufacturers associated in groups and served by competent financial and banking assistance specially equipped for this particular service, can this standpoint be preserved.

"For the granting of short credits, for 30, 60, or 90 days, within the limits of sound commercial practice in export trade, there are already existing, or in sight, reasonably adequate facilities. This is particularly the business of the American banks, and is being effectively carried on by member banks of the Federal Reserve System, either directly or through their branches in foreign countries, or by corporations organized under State laws and engaged in international or foreign banking, in which member banks of the Federal Reserve System are authorized to invest not exceeding 10 per cent of their capital and surplus. Several member banks of the Federal Reserve System, during the past 18 months, have organized and invested in corporations of the class last mentioned.

"For the granting of long-time credits, however, running beyond 90 days and sometimes into periods of years, facilities are by no means so adequate; and the need for careful scrutiny of the foreign customer's resources, and for the proper carrying of the credits after they are granted, is far more serious.

"The Belgian Government, let us suppose, needs steel rails for its Government-owned railways, and can pay for them only with Government bonds maturing 10 years hence. The American manufacturer, to whom the Belgian Government appeals, must first investigate the Government's resources, to make sure that the interest upon its bonds will be met when due, and that the principal will be paid upon maturity. Even if the bonds are found to be safe, however, the American manufacturer himself can not carry them until maturity, for in doing so he would be depriving himself for 10 years of working capital which he requires in the conduct of his own business. For the same reason, neither the manufacturer's bank in America nor any bank in Belgium, or anywhere else, can afford to carry these bonds. Unless, therefore, they can, within a reasonably short period, be disposed of for cash by the American manufacturer, he can not afford to accept them, and must decline the Belgian Government's business.

"The problem is very similar to that of an American street railway which needs electrical equipment and can pay for it only with its corporate bonds maturing 10 years hence. For many years various electrical equipment manufacturers have maintained subsidiary companies which, in instances like these, have taken street railway bonds and deposited them, together with other bonds accepted from other customers in purchase of electrical equipment, with a trust company, under a trust agreement to secure an issue of the subsidiaries' own notes, which the subsidiaries have then sold to institutions and individuals for permanent investment. The money which the investing public has thus paid to the subsidiaries in exchange for the latter's notes has, in effect, returned through the subsidiaries to the electrical manufacturers to pay them for the electrical equipment which they have sold to the street railway.

Thus the street railway has bought on long-time credit, but this long-time credit has been carried by the investing public and not by the electrical manufacturers or their banks.

"Instead of themselves organizing subsidiary companies to finance sales to their foreign customers American manufacturers in some instances may best be served by leaving this work to be done by their banks, collectively and cooperatively. One hundred million dollars of purchases by the French Government from American manufacturers during the European war were thus successfully financed, and eventually fully paid for, by a credit operation which has now become history.

"On July 14, 1916, the American Foreign Securities Co. was incorporated in Delaware by a group of American bankers to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, and to hold or dispose of, stock, bonds, or obligations of any foreign or domestic government or corporation. On July 18, 1916, the company entered into a contract with the Government of the French Republic whereby the company made the French Republic a loan of $100,000,000, bearing interest from August 1, 1916, and payable July 31, 1919. Unlike the examples already considered, the company not only took the note of the French Government but also insisted that the French Government deposit collateral with the note. To secure the payment of principal and interest of the loan the French Republic pledged various securities with the company and authorized the company to rehypothecate these securities. The value of these securities was calculated to be $120,000,000, and the French Government agreed to pledge from time to time additional securities so that the calculated value of the collateral should always be 20 per cent in excess of the principal of the loan. The collateral pledged included obligations of the Governments of Argentina, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Switzerland, Holland, Uruguay, Egypt, Brazil, Spain, Province of Quebec, Suez Canal, and various United States and Canadian corporations. Under its authority to rehypothecate these securities the company deposited $126,526,534 worth of them with the Bankers Trust Co., in New York, as trustee, under a trust agreement to secure $94,500,000 of the company's three-year 5 per cent gold notes, dated August 1, 1916, and payable August 1, 1919, which notes the company publicly offered for general sale in July, 1916, at 98 and interest. Throughout the war these notes maintained a high value and on August 1, 1919, they were paid in full. Meanwhile the company paid dividends averaging more than 8 per cent per annum upon its $10,000,000 of capital stock.

"Instead of individually organizing subsidiary companies like the electrical equipment manufacturers above described, or of leaving this work to be done by their banks upon the analogy of the American Foreign Securities Co. above described, American manufacturers in the same line of business may in some instances best finance their sales to foreign customers by collectively and cooperatively organizing and operating their own investment and financial corporation for that purpose. Such an institution, with a capitalization of upward of $100,000,000, is already under consideration, according to newspaper reports, by a group of American manufacturers of railway equipment, who, it is stated, will themselves take the leadership in the institution and will depend for expert financial and banking assistance and for the marketing of their securities when issued upon their affiliated banking connections and upon security-issuing houses associated with them in the enterprise.

"European bankers, somewhat more than American bankers, have more or less permanently invested their own funds in long-time credits, and have thus assimilated the standpoints of both the manufacturer and the banker which, excepting possibly in the public utility field and the electrical equipment field, and more recently in a few instances in the foreign field, have not often been combined in the United States. Danger is always possible, of course, in any departure from the banker's strict standards of credit. Inertia, however, is no less possible in the inelastic application to long-time credits of standards to which bankers are accustomed in the short-time credits which constitute their business. In the future financing of the American export trade neither the banker's standpoint nor the manufacturer's standpoint can be disregarded. The most fortunate results, it is believed, will be obtained by a policy which fairly reflects both points of view.

"How successful may be investment in financial institutions which have attained this golden mean appears from the history of some of the English, Scotch, and Swiss 'investment trust companies.' These are institutions for the acquisition, disposition, and rehypothecation of securities particularly in foreign trade and are operated substantially upon the plan of the electrical equipment subsidiaries above described, and began to be formed in Great Britain during the third quarter of the last century. Like our own American savings banks and insurance companies, these investment trust companies have pursued the policy of selecting their securities in various lines of trade and from all parts of the world. The Investment Trust Corporation (Ltd.), of London, for example, in its statement of 1917, shows 315 kinds of investments; the Second Edinburgh Investment Trust (Ltd.), of Edinburgh, Scotland, for the same year, showed 235, and the Metropolitan Trust Co., of London, showed 220. These investments included foreign government issues, municipal loans, mortgage bonds, preferred and common shares in railroads, public utilities, banking, commercial, and industrial corporations. The Investment Trust Co. (Ltd.), of London, is capitalized for $10,000,000, and has outstanding $10,000,000 in 4 per cent bonds, and during the 10 years expiring in 1917 paid dividends averaging about 12 per cent per annum upon its common stock. The Second Edinburgh Investment Trust (Ltd.), of Edinburgh, Scotland, is capitalized for $2,250,000, and has outstanding $1,950,000 in 4 per cent bonds and during the nine years expiring 1916 paid dividends averaging 12 per cent per annum upon its common stock. The Metropolitan Trust Co. (Ltd.), of London, is capitalized for $4,000,000, in 4 per cent bonds, and during the 10 years expiring 1918 paid an average of 12 per cent per annum upon its common stock. The Bank for Electrical Securities, of Zurich, Switzerland, which specializes in the securities of public utility companies, and the Franco-Swiss Co., of Geneva, Switzerland, which specializes in city and railroad bonds, have had almost as great a development.

"Heretofore no Federal law has provided for the organization of such investment and financial institutions as these, nor were member banks of the Federal Reserve System authorized to invest in them.

"To correct the first of these deficiencies, the Edge bill (which passed the Senate September 9, 1919, and is now pending in the House of Representatives) provides in effect that corporations for the granting of long-time investment credits as well as short-time commercial credits may be organized under the Federal reserve act, though not themselves entitled to membership in the Federal Reserve System, which shall be capitalized at $2,000,000 or over, of which capital at least one-fourth must be paid in before commencing business, which corporations may then engage in international or foreign banking 'or other financial operations' with power to invest not exceeding 15 per cent of their capital (subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board) in other corporations similarly organized, or in foreign corporations, provided such corporations transact only purely incidental business in the United States.

"The importance of the Edge bill to the export trade of the United States is emphasized by the Federal Reserve Board in a letter urging the passage of the bill which it officially addressed to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency last July:

"The credit situation in Europe at the present time is such that in order to maintain a stable market for our exports it will be necessary not merely to grant short-time commercial credits * * * but also long-term investment credits. * * * To this end Senate bill 2472 (the Edge bill) provides for the organization of corporations which shall be permitted to engage both in the business of international or foreign commercial banking and in other financial operations as distinguished from commercial banking, such as shall be necessary to assist in the development and maintenance of the commerce of the United States. * * *

"The Federal Reserve Board earnestly indorses the proposed bill and suggests that its enactment is even more essential at this time than when its adoption was first recommended by the board. The board knows no one way in which the present European credit situation may be more effectively dealt with than by the incorporation of institutions of the kinds provided for in this bill, and anything that betters that situation assists not merely in the gigantic task of reconstruction in Europe, but also in providing a market for our own exports and in developing our foreign commerce in a most effective and satisfactory way.

"To correct the second deficiency, the McLean bill (which passed Congress Sept. 5, 1919) provides that until January 1, 1921, any member bank of the Federal Reserve System may invest not exceeding 5 per cent of its capital and surplus in any corporation or corporations of the class provided in the Edge bill, so long as the financial interest of such member bank in such corporation and in the establishment of branches in foreign countries does not exceed a total of 10 per cent of its capital and surplus.

"The Edge bill specially provides in effect that shares of corporations organized under it shall be owned, in the majority at least, by citizens of the United States and by corporations organized under State or Federal laws, or firms or corporations controlled by citizens of the United States, whether engaged in domestic competition or not. While the Edge bill forbids corporations organized under it to become members of the Federal Reserve System, nevertheless it specially provides that such corporations may constitute member banks of the Federal Reserve System as their agents, and specially permits such member banks of the Federal Reserve System, subject only to regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to place their facilities at the disposal of corporations organized under the Edge bill.

"The practical benefits which manufacturers throughout the United States, particularly manufacturers cooperating under the Webb Act, will derive from the Edge bill are explained by Senator EDGE in a recent statement, as follows:

"The procedure under the prospective laws is simplicity itself; it is merely the application to international trade of the accepted method by which John Doe sells his business to penniless Richard Roe and yet obtains actual cash payment in the transaction. The American exporter or manufacturer may sell his goods to an impoverished foreign purchaser—a foreign Government or a private concern. One of the proposed corporations then may accept collateral from the purchaser, acceptable to the Federal Reserve Board, and against this issue debentures to sell to investors, and the money so received will be paid to the American seller. Through the powers granted to these proposed corporations they may accept even mortgages on the plants or other real property of the purchasers—'to borrow and to lend money on real or personal property,' so reads the bill. Thus a foreign concern in need of raw materials may obtain it by giving a mortgage on its plants and eventually by turning this raw material into finished product will be able to redeem its collateral and to put aside a little profit besides.

"Of special value will this be to corporations or combinations organized under the Webb Act. For instance, a group of shoe men who have combined to sell their shoes abroad may combine to finance their own commercial operations with which they will be intimately familiar. So also with manufacturers and exporters in every other line, even agriculture, they will be able to keep all the reins in their own hands.

"From the foregoing it appears that the Edge bill, in brief, facilitates further investment by member banks of the Federal Reserve System in corporations organized for financing long-time credits in foreign trade, and adds the official encouragement of the Federal Government to a class of investment and financial institutions which have already abundantly justified such encouragement by successful operation in a number of pioneer instances in several European countries and in the United States under various State laws. Neither the Edge bill nor any institutions organized under it is other than a piece of quite familiar machinery. Wisely directed, with correct application of power, its results will be permanently beneficial to American export trade. It requires, however, the same thorough investigation of foreign customers to whom credit is granted and the same careful building up of good will among American investors to whom its securities must be sold that is required in the successful operation of any other investment and financial institution. To accomplish this cooperation is necessary; in some instances cooperation among American manufacturers in the same line of business, but in all instances cooperation between American manufacturers and the best financial and banking intelligence which they can consult. For the points of view of the manufacturer, the bank, the security-issuing house, and the investing public, together with the point of view of America's future position in the export trade of the world, must all be reflected in the conduct of the institutions to be organized under the Edge bill."

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading an article on the United States and the Shantung question by Mr. Thomas F. Millard, which has just reached me. It has been so helpful to me that I should be glad to have other Senators see it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UNITED STATES AND THE SHANTUNG QUESTION.

(By Thomas F. Millard, Oct. 17, 1919.)

"Efforts to rectify the so-called Shantung provisions of the treaty adopted at Paris have two major considerations and objects:

"(a) Protection of the interests of the United States.

"(b) Protection of China.

"In dealing with the question it is presumed that the American Senate gives primary place to the first (a) object, with a sincere desire also to secure the second object.

"No statements or arguments have been brought into the discussion by prominent Americans indicating that any branch of the American Government has thought of abandoning the traditional American policy toward China, as embodied in the Hay doctrine of the commercial open door for all nations and the preservation of the territorial integrity and administrative autonomy of China. The argument is about means to preserve that doctrine and policy in relation to the treaty and covenant adopted by the Paris conference. It is evident that a majority of the Senate and of the American people regard the treaty provisions concerning Shantung as unsatisfactory and as subversive of both of the above-named objects. Two methods of correcting the treaty and covenant are proposed, by amendment and by reservations.

"A distinction can be made between these methods, viz, amendment of the treaty and covenant attempt to reverse certain things that were done by the Paris conference; reservations attempt to deprive those acts of the conference of binding force upon the United States. Amendments attempt to react upon the past; reservations look more to the future. Both methods may have the same ultimate results. From the standpoint of the interest of America in the Shantung question they seem as well safeguarded either way.

THE INTEREST OF CHINA.

"There is no doubt that it would have been more satisfactory to China had the Paris conference adopted provisions regarding Shantung by which Germany's position and rights and property there were ceded to China instead of to Japan, especially if Japan had signed a treaty containing those provisions; and even if Japan had not signed such a treaty a powerful international force would have been formally aligned against her. It may be pointed out, however, that even if the treaty had awarded the German rights and position in Shantung to China, Japan still would have been actually in possession of those rights, and the task of enforcing the treaty would have remained a delicate and difficult one; in short, the problem of getting Japan out of Shantung and other parts of China would have been a very embarrassing question for the powers.

"In that connection, the matter of the so-called 'secret' agreements has an important bearing. These were private engagements made in February and March, 1917, whereby the British, French, Russian, and Italian Governments agreed, in substance, to support Japan at the peace conference in her claim to inherit the German rights and position in Shantung. An examination of the texts of those diplomatic engagements indicates that the four Governments mentioned did not commit themselves in those private agreements to support Japan beyond the peace conference. Therefore by supporting Japan at the conference those Governments fulfilled the letter of their engagements and the secret Shantung agreements were terminated by being paid in full. If, however, it was proposed to amend the treaty by reversing its articles relating to Shantung, and such an amendment was referred back to the conference, the secret Shantung agreements would be revived in their binding force on the British, French, and Italian Governments, and those Governments almost certainly would feel compelled to again support Japan's position. In these circumstances there is little prospect that the consent of the principal powers to a change in the Shantung clauses could be obtained.

"On the other hand, the position of the United States on the question can be made clear by an explicit reservation, leaving the American Government free hereafter to pursue its traditional policy toward China. By not reviving the secret agreements and leaving them extinguished by being satisfied the British and French Governments also are left free regarding a future policy toward China, provided those Governments have not already made or do not hereafter make other engagements with Japan binding their actions.

"From these circumstances it appears that any advantages that might be gained by attempting to amend the Shantung clauses of the treaty might be offset by reviving the secret Shantung agreements, thereby circumscribing the policies now and perhaps hereafter of the British, French, and Italian Governments.

"The acceptance of an amendment on Shantung by the conference at one time would probably have induced the Chinese Government to sign the treaty with Germany, but it hardly would have that result now, because the Chinese Government already has declared peace with Germany by resolution and will arrange the details by negotiation. By signing the treaty with Austria, China has become eligible for membership of a league of nations should one result from the Paris conference.

"China's interest is apt to be served now and hereafter by measures that will determine or influence the alignment of the principal powers on the broad issues of the Hay doctrine and on moves to induce Japan to restore Shantung and Manchuria and to abandon her policy of aggression in China.

HOW TO PRESERVE THE HAY DOCTRINE.

"China can be saved by saving the Hay doctrine and by converting its basic principles into international practice. On this purpose American diplomatic policy should be concentrated. These conditions are essential to the success of such a policy:

"(a) An alignment of Great Britain with the United States on this question, and if possible also of the other principal nations in Europe, especially France.

"(b) Knowledge by the American Government of all diplomatic agreements and understandings, private or open, between Great Britain and those other powers in Europe relating to China and Asia, and of those powers with Japan.

"(c) Prevention by the American Government, if possible, of any further agreements between those powers, or between any of those powers and Japan, or between any of those powers and China, which are antagonistic to or subversive of the principles of the Hay doctrine, and the abrogation of existing agreements of that character.

"(d) A declaration by the American Government that it regards the political development of China and of eastern Asia on democratic lines, and free of the interference and oppression of the imperialistic policies of any nations, to be of fundamental importance to the United States and to American institutions.

"(e) A refusal by the United States to allow its capital wealth and other resources to be used either directly or indirectly through other nations to obstruct or impede the fruition of the American policy in eastern Asia, and the withholding of American financial and other assistance to nations that either directly or indirectly oppose or try to subvert the Hay doctrine.

"(f) The creation of the necessary facilities and agencies for extending and securing the American position in eastern Asia.

"(g) Establish a definite entente or alliance with Great Britain and France by which those powers will aid America in sustaining and putting into practice the Hay doctrine in China.

"It, of course, is true that the treatment of some of these matters lies outside of the prerogatives of the Senate in dealing with the present treaty and covenant, but it is in the power of the Senate to lay the foundations for them in its action relating to the treaty and covenant.

AN ANGLO-FRENCH-AMERICAN ENTENTE OR ALLIANCE.

"Interwoven with the treaty and covenant adopted at Paris, and as a supplement to them, the President has laid before the Senate for its consent a treaty whereby the United States engages, under certain conditions (of an 'unprovoked' attack on France by Germany), to come to the assistance of France with military and other forces. By reason of the fact that at the same time a similar treaty was arranged between France and Great Britain, the two treaties constitute, in effect, a tripartite defensive alliance.

"This proposed alliance is designed to secure to France safeguards not believed to be assured by the league of nations. Its territorial application is confined to Europe and to a single specified contingency. By becoming a party to it, the United States will be committed to obligations which entail great responsibility and expense and which involve this Nation in the whole corpus of European international politics. While the language of the proposed alliance treaty makes the condition of American participation an unprovoked attack by Germany upon France, the nature and causes of such provocation manifestly are not and plainly can not be confined strictly to issues that may arise directly between Germany and France. The treaties adopted at Paris reshape the political map of Europe and create conditions and relations which plant possible causes for provocations between Germany and France in every boundary and question arising in Europe, and even outside of Europe. If the United States enters upon this proposed alliance, every friction of nations in Europe or of European nations anywhere in the world will carry the possibility of eventually bringing this alliance into effect.

"In the terms of the proposed alliance the United States assumes heavy obligations in the interest of France; or, to broaden the application to its real content, to sustain a certain balance of power in Europe by backing up France.

"But the alliance as written contains no compensation for the United States. It provides for no defense or support of American territory or interests anywhere by France and Great Britain.

"In connection with the Far Eastern policy of the United States a clause in this proposed Anglo-French-American alliance treaty by which the French and British Governments again express adherence to and engage under certain conditions to aid America in defending or enforcing the Hay doctrine would clarify the attitudes of those powers vis-à-vis this question and aid greatly in establishing the future tranquillity of China and in averting a rupture of the peace about the Shantung and Manchuria questions. Such a clause will protect the interests and rights of China and safeguard the American policy toward China, as well as can be done now by diplomatic provision."

ESTATE OF THOMAS H. HALL.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask unanimous consent of the Senate for a little indulgence with reference to a bill on the calendar. It will not take five minutes to act on it, I am sure. It is a bill which once has been passed by the Senate; it has twice been favorably reported in the House and favorably reported in the Senate, and unless it is passed now it will be too late to give the relief intended. It is a very small item, only involving $544.73, which, of course, is a bagatelle so far as the Government is concerned, but it is of great importance to the widow of Mr. Hall, who is being sued for that amount under conditions which make it improper that she should be called upon to pay it. I repeat, the Senate has passed the bill once before, and, as I have said, unless it is passed now and goes to the House it will be too late to afford the relief, because the suit is now pending in the Federal court which it is intended to relieve. I am sure we can dispose of it in two minutes, and I therefore ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2716) to relieve the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of said Thomas H. Hall, of the payment of money alleged to have been misappropriated by a clerk in said office.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the bill read.

Mr. WARREN. I withhold objection until the bill has been read.

Mr. FLETCHER. A report has been filed with the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of the said Thomas H. Hall as such postmaster, be, and they are hereby, relieved of the payment of $544.73, together with the amount of the costs which may have accrued on account of the United States bringing an action to enforce the payment of said sum, the said sum being the amount of cash and funds held by the Post Office Department to be due from said Hall's estate to the United States for money misappropriated to his own use by a clerk in said office while the proffered resignation of said Hall was pending in the Post Office Department and while the said clerk was acting postmaster with the consent and acquiescence of the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the whole case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being on objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. Is morning business closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9205, being the first deficiency appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read in full for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I understand the Senator does not want to ask that the reading be dispensed with at some period during the progress of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. The bill will be read entirely as we go along.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and the bill will be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the top of page 2, to insert:

BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY.

With a view to facilitating the Bureau of Efficiency's investigation of duplication of work in the several executive departments and independent establishments as now authorized by law, it is hereby directed that before any Government department or independent establishment shall undertake any new activity, inquiry, or investigation, it shall inform the Bureau of Efficiency of (1) the character and scope of the activity, inquiry, or investigation, (2) the probable number of persons to be employed, the probable salaries to be paid, and the probale total cost of the activity, inquiry, or investigation, and (3) the appropriations out of which expenditures are to be made.

The Bureau of Efficiency is directed to investigate the methods of business of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and to report to the Congress at the beginning of the next regular session, with such recommendations as it may deem proper to make. If only a partial report can be made at that time, a complete report shall be made as soon thereafter as practicable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For temporary employees for the Civil Service Commission, $50,000: Provided, That not more than two persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,400 per annum and no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether the appropriation made for the Civil Service Commission—as I recall, it was a very generous and a very liberal one—proved inadequate; and, if so, why? Has the Civil Service Commission been adding to its personnel or force without any authority of Congress?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is alluding to this appropriation of $50,000 put in by the House?

Mr. KING. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is not a committee amendment.

Mr. KING. I am aware of that.

Mr. WARREN. It is not a committee amendment, and it is hardly in order to take it up now.

Mr. KING. I was merely inquiring so as to save recurring to it. If the Senator prefers, however, I will defer my inquiry.

Mr. WARREN. It is a deficiency, and it was stated originally by the commission that unless the appropriations were made larger there probably would be a deficiency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the top of page 3, to insert:

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION.

For expenses of auditing and closing the accounts of the Committee on Public Information, to be expended under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, $32,000. All unexpended balances of appropriations for the Committee on Public Information, together with all proceeds from the sale of material and receipts from the activities of said committee, shall immediately be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts upon the passage of this act: Provided, That that part of the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919 which provides "that all moneys received through the motion-picture activities of the committee shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation and be available for the said activities" is hereby repealed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations explain this item?

Mr. WARREN. It is for the purpose of closing up the expense accounts and effects of what remains of the Creel Bureau of so-called Public Information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "District of Columbia," on page 3, after line 15, to insert:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

SEWERS.

The unexpended balances of appropriations contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919 for main and pipe sewers and receiving basins, for suburban sewers, and for assessment and permit work, sewers, amounting in all to approximately $120,000, are hereby reappropriated and continued available during the fiscal year 1920.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 24, to insert:

Upper Potomac interceptor: For additional amount required for continuing the construction of the upper Potomac interceptor between Twenty-seventh and K Streets and the Chain Bridge, $19,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 2, to insert:

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Community forums and civic centers: Not to exceed 50 per cent of the appropriation of $25,000 for the fiscal year 1920 for expenses of the community forums and civic centers in the public schools of the District of Columbia may be expended for payment of secretaries, teachers, organizers, and clerks.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when the last appropriation bill was under consideration there was considerable debate over the appropriation for the civic forums; and, as I recall, the appropriation, though it was very liberal, was cut down from what some had desired. Is it the plan now to augment that appropriation?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. If the Senator will read the amendment, it adds nothing to the former appropriation. It simply allows 50 per cent instead of 25 per cent to go for clerks and other employees, instead of going for rental and janitors, as they do not need the 75 per cent as it stood for the payment of janitors, rent, and expenses of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, if it is in order. I move to strike out "50," in line 5, page 4, before the words "per cent," and insert "33⅓."

The reason why I propose that is this: The present law authorizes but 25 per cent of the appropriation for the fiscal year 1920 for expenses of the community forums and civic centers in the public schools of the District of Columbia to be expended for payment of secretaries, teachers, organizers, and clerks. Instead of using 25 per cent for these purposes, as Congress intended, and as has been the case in the past, they now want to take 50 per cent of the amount of the appropriation, in order that they may employ more secretaries, more teachers, more organizers, and more clerks. That is the effect of this amendment as reported. Perhaps it would be the part of wisdom to give them a little more than 25 per cent, but I can not see why we should give them 50 per cent for these specific purposes, although I know the object of it. The object of it is that the next time they ask for an appropriation it will be more than the present $25,000. I think that if we take one-third of the whole amount of the appropriation for the purpose of paying the secretaries, teachers, organizers, and clerks that is sufficient. Therefore I offer that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4 in the committee amendment, on line 5, it is proposed to strike out "50," before the words "per cent," and to insert in lieu thereof "33⅓."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope that motion will not prevail, and that the matter may be allowed to go as it stands to the committee of conference.

The allusion to what has been done in the past can apply only to two appropriations, because it is a new matter; and the determination of the committee, if I may judge by expressions when we were considering this item, was that this probably would be the last appropriation. They asked for $65,000 for this purpose, if I remember correctly—either sixty or sixty-five thousand dollars—and we gave them $25,000, and we restricted the matter of teachers, and so forth, to 25 per cent. It would have been a matter of using the money for purposes that might not be necessary if it were left as it is, because the quarters can be provided without payment. It is a matter of evening meetings, and so forth, in the schoolhouses. The payment of janitors for attention, of course, has to go on, but the whole object of this is to impart knowledge to the young. In order to impart that knowledge, teachers are required; and, of course, the organizers and clerks come along, so that I think the committee in voting on this believed that it should go to conference as it stands.

I therefore hope the amendment to the amendment may not prevail.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one more word.

I wish that I had the list of the activities that this community forum and civic center has mapped out. It goes into every conceivable activity of life, including the teaching of French, the teaching of the violin, the teaching of cooking, the teaching of a hundred different things, as enumerated in the list that they themselves have furnished members of the committee. I left the list over at my office, or I would put it in the RECORD in full. Allow me to say now that if the program is carried out the appropriation in years to come will not be $25,000, but it will be nearer $250,000, and we will not have a few teachers and organizers and clerks and secretaries, but we will have a horde of them in the District of Columbia, and we will be asked to furnish a building for them to occupy if the program as submitted is carried out.

I am perfectly willing that the Government shall pay the salaries of the necessary clerks and a limited number of teachers that are required in the District of Columbia for carrying on meetings to be held under the auspices of the community forums and civic centers, but I do not want established in the District of Columbia again a complete organization for instruction of every sort and every kind. As I say, my amendment would give them more than 25 per cent to pay for the secretaries, organizers, and clerks. I am perfectly willing that a third of the amount shall be devoted to that purpose; but, in my opinion, that is all that it should be, and I hope the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator certainly knows that the Committee on Appropriations would not assent to any such appropriation as he states—$250,000. There is not the slightest intention nor the slightest hint from any quarter that the committee would do that. The committee amendment, of course, carries no additional appropriation. It really provides, in my judgment, for the reasonable expenditure of the present appropriation.

I have here a great amount of matter on this subject from the board of education, letters from the several members of the District government, a letter from Miss Margaret Wilson, and many others. I think as little as we can do in the case of the amount already appropriated—and which, as I said, is likely to be the last—is to let it be used in the direction of doing some good, rather than to tie it up so that it must be used in a direction where it would be of no particular account.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Why did the former Congress, in making this appropriation, limit the expenditure for this purpose to 25 per cent of the amount unless they intended that that was all that should be utilized for clerical and other services of that kind? Why should the committee now, in a deficiency bill, change the original purpose of the appropriation and divert the appropriation from the channel in which it was to be expended to some other? If the former Congress appropriated $25,000 and limited the amount to be expended for employees to 25 per cent. what right have we now to change that?

Mr. WARREN. We placed the percentage as low as we did because we believed at the time that they would have to pay more for rental, and so forth. But those matters have been so arranged that they have continued in the same rooms, and other help has been contributed. This is to make the money go further and do more good.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, if we save some part of the amount which it was contemplated would be spent for rental, why may it not be covered back into the Treasury? Certainly it would be refreshing to find one appropriation not fully exhausted.

Mr. WARREN. It is very refreshing if the Senator thinks that any part of that will go back into the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when the first appropriation was asked for community forums and civic centers the amount asked for was $10,000, as I remember, and the committee was told that at no time would it ever amount to more than $10,000. We have it up to $25,000 now, and there was $65,000 asked for. Have we forgotten that when we established the Children's Bureau it was stated upon the floor of the Senate, not only by one Senator but by a number, that at no time in the history of this country would it require more than $25,000? To-day we appropriate around one-quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. President, we were told that if this community forum and civic center was established all that the Government of the United States would be asked to pay would be the actual expenses attendant upon it, and that public-spirited citizens would give their time freely for the purpose of directing its activities.

I suppose that many Senators were visited by the lady in charge of this work last year, and they will remember that she wanted the use of the grounds in front of the Capitol to give a pageant, and one of the reasons why she said she wanted to give it was that all the money that was appropriated had not been expended, and unless they gave the pageant the money would go back into the Treasury of the United States. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] suggests to me that that is a good reason for it. I know it is a reason that is followed by most of the departments of the Government.

I want the public-spirited citizens who wanted this forum and civic center created in the beginning to continue in the work they were so anxious to undertake and not throw this burden back upon the Congress of the United States. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to pay all of the expenses attached to it, and I am perfectly willing to pay the clerks who labor all the time to keep the accounts, but as far as anything else is concerned, Mr. President, if we undertake to carry out the program that is mapped out, I have not any doubt as to what the result will be in the end.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I notice that in one portion of the pending bill there is an appropriation for the International Industrial Congress, and in connection with that appropriation I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate what I believe to be one of the most important problems before the country to-day, the proposed bituminous-coal strike which menaces the country.

Mr. President, three weeks ago, on October 1, I made some remarks in the Senate regarding the threatened strike of the bituminous-coal miners. This was in connection with an informal report I made at the time concerning the work of a subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee, of which I am chairman, which has been investigating the coal situation.

In view of the desperate situation which menaces us, I deem it my duty to make some further remarks at this time, in order that the country may be advised, through this body, what the outlook now is and what a serious state of affairs is threatened on and after November 1.

An industrial calamity seems to be imminent in the United States. The stage has been deliberately set for this disastrous event by 400,000 men, over one-third of whom are foreign born, who can not speak the English language, and who have no acquaintance or sympathy with our institutions.

On September 23, 1919, the United Mine Workers of America, in convention assembled at Cleveland, Ohio, adopted a proposed wage scale, whose terms were embraced in a notable document of 13 sections. These were all set forth in my former remarks upon this subject. I shall now mention 2 only of the 13 demands.

First. A 60 per cent increase in wages.

Second. Establishment of a six-hour day and a five-day working week.

Through a committee these demands were presented to a like committee representing the bituminous coal operators of the central competitive district. This conference of the operators' and miners' representatives took place in Buffalo. Subsequent meetings have been held in Philadelphia.

At these conferences the representatives of the United Mine Workers of America have presented the ironclad demands of their convention. They have admitted that they were without power to change the terms proposed or in any sense to play the rôle of negotiators. They were, in effect, messengers only, to convey certain demands, and in default of an acceptance of the same the inevitable result would be that set forth in the twelfth of the 13 "points," to wit:

> We recommend that in event a satisfactory wage agreement is not secured for the central competitive field before November 1, 1919, to replace the one now in effect, that the international officials be authorized to and are hereby instructed to call a general strike of all bituminous miners and mine workers throughout the United States, the same to become effective November 1, 1919.

In passing let me call attention to one remarkable phase of this controversy. The bituminous field of the United States is divided into four districts. The central competitive district comprises Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and western Pennsylvania. The demand of the United Mine Workers has been presented only to the operators in that district. Nevertheless, in the event of the latter declining to accede to the demands of the miners a strike is to take place in all four districts, in spite of the fact that the operators in the other three districts have never had any demands or grievances presented to them.

I wish again to invite attention to the fact that the miners' representatives have presented certain drastic terms, which they apparently are without authority to alter or deviate from, while the representatives of the operators are vested with plenary power.

The United Mine Workers of America as an organization have achieved their present position in the world of labor through "collective bargaining." But where is there even a trace of "collective bargaining" in the proposal they have placed before the bituminous operators?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would explain whether this demand for a 60 per cent increase, a six-hour day, and a five-day week applies only to that division where the complaint arises or does it apply to all the other three?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It applies as well to the other three. The demand is made for the entire field by the president of the United Mine Workers of America representing the entire group.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the Senator, there has been no demand with reference to wages or conditions in any of these groups except the one in which the demand has actually been presented and to which he is referring.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not quite hear the question of the Senator from Nebraska, but I understand if the strike should become effective it would spread throughout the United States, either directly or indirectly, through sympathetic striking or independent action upon the part of other organizations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The contracts made between the miners and the operators relate to the several competitive fields. The demands are made by the president of the miners' union, controlling through the various locals all the competitive fields, and those demands, I understand, are made for all the fields in the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. This will result, will it not, directly in the cessation of mining in all the bituminous coal fields of the United States?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They will be entirely, absolutely, closed down except where there are nonunion mines, and those comprise about 25 per cent, I believe, of the entire production, which amounts to some 550,000,000 tons per year. I intend to point that out a little later in the course of my remarks.

The miners have come and have laid down their demands—their rigid, hard, and fast demands—and have said, "Here is what we demand; take it or leave it. Pay us a billion dollars a year more, trust in our ability to produce in a 30-hour week enough coal to keep your industries going and you from freezing, or we will close up the Nation as tight as a drum November 1."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator speaks of a 30-hour week. The prevailing week has been how many hours?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Forty-eight.

Mr. KING. Forty-four hours in some places.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; 44 in some places. Is that collective bargaining? To my mind the operators were right in refusing to grant these inordinate demands. What right have the coal producers of the country to saddle every man, woman, and child in the United States with a staggering tribute tax, such as the miners propose, and in addition gamble on the miners' ability to produce, in 30 hours a week, coal enough to keep American industries going and American houses from freezing?

Now, let us go back a little. Under the Lever Act of August 10, 1917, the United States Fuel Administration was organized. This act contained the following clause, being section 24:

> That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the termination of this act shall not affect any act done, or any right or obligation accruing or accrued or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil case before the said termination pursuant to this act; but all rights and liabilities under this act arising before its termination shall continue and may be enforced in the same manner as if the act had not terminated. Any offense committed and all penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred prior to such termination may be prosecuted or punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been terminated.

Both the letter and spirit of this act are very clear.

After the passage of the Lever Act and the creation of the United States Fuel Administration, acting under the inspiration of Dr. Garfield, an agreement was entered into between the bituminous-coal operators and their employees whereby the scale contract of April 1, 1916, was modified and extended "during the continuance of the war, and not to exceed two years from April 1, 1918."

I may point out that this was the second increase of wages granted under the Fuel Administration. The increase for the first six months previously amounted to approximately 15 per cent, I understand. Then when six months had gone by, during the continuation of the war, they came again, and, through the instigation of Dr. Garfield, the coal miners and coal operators got together and made a new wage scale. I have that wage scale here, but I will not read it. That increase amounted to approximately 30 per cent, and the miners agreed to operate the mines not less than two years beyond April 1, 1918, or during the continuance of the war.

Mr. THOMAS. That arrangement constitutes, does it not, what is generally known as collective bargaining?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I so understand.

Mr. THOMAS. Of what avail is collective bargaining if one party to the bargain may abandon it or repudiate it at pleasure?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of no avail, I will say to the Senator from Colorado.

This language in the agreement should be carefully noted—"during the continuance of the war." The Department of Justice and the various Federal courts have repeatedly held that the war is not over, and will not be until the fact is duly proclaimed by the President, following a formal ratification of the treaty of peace. This has been universally held. The Lever Act, from which I have quoted, clearly sets forth this fact and this view of the law. Therefore the scale agreement referred to is in full force and will be until April 1, 1920, unless the President shall declare the state of war at an end following the ratification of the treaty of peace.

Now, this contract, entered into during the solemn days of actual hostilities, is to be tossed into the discard and treated, in true Kaiserian fashion, as a scrap of paper, unless the demands of the miners shall be acceded to.

The two chief demands, which I have already referred to, a 60 per cent increase in wages and the establishment of a six-hour work day and a five-day working week, together with certain auxiliary demands, would involve an increase of from $2 to $2.50 in the cost of each ton of bituminous coal delivered to the consumer. This would aggregate fully a billion dollars in the country as a whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What are the wages at present, if I may inquire?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Generally speaking, I understand they average from $1,200 to $1,500 per year for each miner. I think that is the average. I have the scale of wages here. It is approximately $1 an hour.

Mr. POINDEXTER. At present?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes. That statement was made to me last night by the president of one of the operating companies.

I hold in my hand a carefully prepared table, which I shall ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in connection with my remarks. Based upon the figures of the United States Geological Survey of the bituminous coal consumption during 1917, I am able to show to what extent the people of the several States, the consumers of bituminous coal, will be penalized if the demands of the miners are granted. This is the annual cost to the public of the wage demands of the United Mine Workers of America in bituminous coal only, using the 1917 consumption figures and estimating the increased cost of production at $2 per ton.

I should like to call attention of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. CUMMINS], handling the very important railroad legislation, to the fact that the estimate of the Geological Survey of the increased cost to the railroads of the country on account of this demand of the United Mine Workers of America is $300,000,000 per annum.

I ask that the table to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, do the Senators from Alabama know that the people of their State would be taxed $22,000,000 to meet these demands? Do the Senators from Michigan comprehend that if the increase asked for were granted their constituents would have an enlargement of their coal bills to the extent of $29,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator's estimate include anything more than the actual increase in cost of production added to this wage scale, or does it also include an added profit which the operator would probably add to the price to the consumer?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It does not include an added profit. It is based entirely upon the present cost of production under the present scale and the proposed advance in wages.

Mr. McCORMICK. What about reduction in hours and its influence?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is taken into account. It also includes the increased cost by reason of the reduced production on account of a six-hour day.

Are the Senators from Missouri aware that the citizens of their State would be mulcted to the extent of $24,000,000 in the event that the mine workers have their way? Do the Senators from New England realize that their States would be called upon to pay $36,000,000 to the mine workers' union? Do the Senators from Ohio comprehend that the share their State would pay would be $76,000,000? Are the Senators from Illinois aware that the United Mine Workers are demanding an annual toll of $85,000,000 from the people of their State? And the Senators from Pennsylvania, are they cognizant of the fact that that Commonwealth will be called upon to contribute $161,000,000 to the same organization? My own State is much smaller than those cited and the extent to which my constituents would be mulcted would be considerably less, yet they would be called upon to contribute $13,700,000 to the coffers of the bituminous miners.

Are the people of the United States prepared to go down into their pockets and pay out $1,000,000,000 a year in order that the United Mine Workers may have a 60 per cent raise in pay, work six hours a day, and that for only five days a week?

Are the people of the United States prepared to place any industry on a six-hour basis? In response to an insistent demand of labor agitators an eight-hour day has been legalized. What more do labor organizations want? If any such concession be made to the miners, how long would it be before like demands would be made by representatives of other trades, and what would the final harvest be?

All thinking men, all economists, all students of trade and sociological conditions as well, are demanding the highest degree of productivity at this time. The Great War withdrew twenty-five or thirty millions of men—probably more—from the ordinary fields of production, industrial and agricultural, and the world, economically, is all awry and normal conditions will not prevail for many years. It may take a decade or even a generation to get back to healthy, rational conditions in our domestic economy.

Yet here we have nearly 400,000 men insisting that over two days shall be dropped from the industrial calendar each week, while idleness shall take the place of activity and inertness the place of production.

We all recall the great coal strike of 1902. Prior to that the miners worked 19 hours. Indeed, at one time they had a 12-hour day. The celebrated conciliation and arbitration board, presided over by Judge George Gray, of Delaware, reached the conclusion that the miners' day should be reduced to nine hours, that being deemed a reasonable and proper working-day period. That was promptly acquiesced in at that time. Next came the demand for an eight-hour day, which was granted through congressional enactment.

And now comes this final demand for a six-hour day. Where will it stop? Production would in due course of time entirely end, the wheels of production would cease to revolve, and we would have chaos and disaster throughout the land.

A demand for a 6-hour day—for a 30-hour week—involves a 37 per cent cut in present working time. To my mind this means a 37 per cent cut in bituminous-coal production. And that in turn means but one thing, a coal supply so insufficient to meet the country's needs that the closed factories, the idle mills, the crippled industries, the unheated homes of our people, would bring about a shortage infinitely worse than that of the winter of 1917–18.

It is out of the question for the miners' terms to be granted. The demanded decrease in working hours would result in industrial disaster. The demanded increase in wages would impose a financial burden upon the consumer that he can not afford to bear.

What is the alternative which the American mine workers present to the people of the United States through the operators? The country is to be plunged into industrial chaos two weeks hence. Not a pound of coal will be supplied thereafter. Our factories and mills will be closed. Our public utilities, our railroads, will cease to function. The homes of those compelled by reason of locality to use soft coal will be deprived of all fuel. Pneumonia and other diseases will become widespread. Hunger and suffering of all kinds will prevail in many communities. Industrial America will be brought to a standstill, and paralysis will take the place of activity at a time when the highest degree of productivity should prevail.

And who are the men who have precipitated this state of affairs? Are they American citizens? To a very large extent they are not. A vast majority were born on foreign soil, and, as I have said, do not speak our language and have nothing in common with the dyed-in-the-wool American. Some of them have been naturalized, but between one-third and one-half of the entire number are still aliens and utterly lacking in all the elements which go to make up the patriotic American citizen.

Is the United States ready to be dictated to by these men?

I have in my hand a letter written to me by the vice president of the National Coal Association. I asked him to give me the percentage of aliens employed in the mines, and he writes me as follows:

NATIONAL COAL ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., October 15, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to our conversation this morning, I take pleasure in placing before you below the result of a canvass of the nationality of the employees in bituminous coal industry made by the National Coal Association in July, 1918. This canvass covered approximately 2,000 operating companies in practically every producing field in the country, and in our judgment is representative of conditions prevailing in the industry to-day.

The canvass showed:

Nationality.	Total employees.	Per-centages.
Americans	283,340	63.40
Foreign born	163,516	36.60
Total	446,856	100.00

Foreign-born employees, by nationalities.

Nationality:	Number.
Austria-Hungarians, including Slovaks, Ruthenians, Magyars, and Hortats (Croats)	59,271
Bulgarians	545
Chinese	59
Danes	67
Dutch	105
Finns	1,060
French	4,478
German	5,548
Greek	3,088
Italian	44,869
Japanese	412
Lithuanians	3,767
Mexicans	820
Montenegrins	590
Polish	16,801
Portuguese	25
Roumanians	740
Russians	9,944
Servians	1,282
Spanish	850
Syrians	131
Swedish	1,167
Turks	200
Miscellaneous	7,697
Total	163,516

Very truly, yours,

J. D. F. MORROW,
Vice President.

The time has come to put an end to this situation.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I desire to ask how many employees are there working in the mines?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Four hundred and forty-six thousand eight hundred and fifty-six.

Mr. WATSON. That number includes both Americans and aliens?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Both Americans and aliens.

Mr. WATSON. Does it include both anthracite and bituminous coal miners?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; the number has reference simply to bituminous coal miners. There are about 185,000 anthracite coal miners, I think.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I inquire what area the number of 446,000 referred to by the Senator from New Jersey covers?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That covers all of the bituminous coal mines located both in the East and the West.

Mr. WARREN. Then it covers altogether both the East and West?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; the entire area.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to have read, if it will not interrupt his remarks, two telegrams which I have just received, coming from the largest coal corporations in Wyoming, which are mining vast quantities of bituminous coal?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Secretary read the telegrams that I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

KIRBY, WYO., October 20, 1919.

Senator FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

Wyoming coal operators have had no voice in wage controversy with miners. Please use your influence with Secretary of Labor Wilson so that negotiations will not be settled or adjourned without we are represented. As matter now stands, the negotiations have all been with eastern coal producers, and the western operators are being forced into a position without representation.

NORTHERN WYOMING COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
C. A. BARNARD, Secretary.

CHEYENNE, WYO., October 20, 1919.

Senator F. E. WARREN,
Capitol Building, Washington, D. C.:

Please, if possible, see Secretary of Labor Wilson and advise him that southern Wyoming coal operators do not feel there is any justice in any settlement made in the East with coal miners to which we are made a party without representation. We stand ready to meet representatives of the miners from our district in conference to negotiate a wage scale at any time. Do not want to be tied or bound by any agreement made in the central competitive field.

P. J. QUEALY.
W. D. BRENNAN.

Mr. WARREN. I simply wish to say that information comes to me, not only from these dispatches but from other sources, that there is no controversy in the mines of Wyoming; and the miners there seem to have been excluded from participation in the conference in connection with the proposition made by certain representatives of labor in the eastern section of the country.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I understood the list read by the Senator included the number of foreigners employed in this industry. Were they all unnaturalized?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; the number indicated were unnaturalized aliens.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if the threatened coal strike embraces also the anthracite fields or only the bituminous fields?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It does not embrace the anthracite fields. The anthracite miners and operators have settled their differences and their contract continues until the 31st of March, 1920.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have received quite a number of telegrams of similar import to those placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and coming from operators in my State. There has been since the troubles of 1914 no difficulty in the mines of Colorado, but they are involved in the present situation, and, whatever the result may be, they will be affected by the conditions that will prevail after the 1st of November, notwithstanding their nonparticipation either in the so-called demands of the miners or in the proposals of compromise.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, that is one of the difficulties in the situation. The president of the union can order this strike and will order it in the fields where there are no differences between the operators and the employees.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has given the number of aliens who are now engaged in this industry. Can the Senator state what the relative proportion between Americans and foreigners was at the time of the strike of 1902 and whether there has been any considerable change in the relative proportions from that time until this?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have the Gray report in my desk, but I have not read that portion of it, and I do not know. I know that the present radical influence which is being exerted in the union mine workers' organization comes principally from the foreign element.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. One moment, until I finish. I understand that the older mining men, the men with families and children, who have been employed in the mines for many years, are not the trouble makers; that they stay at home and are law-abiding citizens. When the local unions have their meetings the men that come are the foreign element, who are very radical and very pronounced in their demands. The old, conservative miner is retiring and naturally stays away from the meetings. That is what happened in the convention at Cleveland. I understand the radicals controlled it and presented these demands, which were in the nature of an ultimatum. I understand that there is to be no referendum, and although Secretary Wilson informed the Senate committee that there could be a referendum, I understand there is not and will not and can not be a referendum to the miners. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was impressed by what other Senators from coal-mining States have said, and also by what the Senator from New Jersey has said, that the difficulty comes only from one district. Now, the Senator is assuming all the time—and he may, of course, be right—that when the strike is called all the other districts in which there has been no dispute in regard to wages or any other question will strike the same as the miners in the district where the dispute has arisen.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly; the order has gone out to strike.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that the miners in other sections and States where there is no dispute will obey the order to strike?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no question about it. If the Senator from New Jersey will permit me, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. operates the largest steel mill west of the Mississippi River. They had no difficulty whatever with their men and conferences were granted as rapidly as they were asked. Not a single grievance was presented that was not met and considered. Notwithstanding that fact, when the call for the steel strike was issued, 6,500 men walked out; they are out yet; and, for the first time in 30 years, those great mills are absolutely silent, although the employees have no grievance and no difficulty whatever.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator thinks, of course, from that that the same condition will be brought about in the event the coal strike takes place?

Mr. THOMAS. There is no question about it, in my judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. In Illinois there are approximately 100,000 bituminous-coal miners, and my information from that area is that practically all of them will go out on strike. When they will return, or how long they will stay out, no one can tell.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, my judgment is that the same thing may happen in Wyoming, because it has twice before happened. In one instance there was hardly a man employed by a concern numbering its employees by the hundreds, and in another case by the thousands, that did not go out. It amounts to this, that when an order goes out from labor headquarters to strike, the members of the union who refuse to obey the order are punished, being liable to a fine and, of course, to expulsion from their union.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think another thing that ought to be understood by the public, if the Senator from New Jersey has not already made it clear, is that this coal strike was practically ordered before any attempt had been made to harmonize any existing difficulties between employers and employees. No demands had been made and no call for a conference had been asked. They met in convention, directed their representatives to make certain demands, and if those demands were denied to strike. That is the situation—a most unusual condition—and I think the country ought to understand it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I regret that I was not able to hear the first part of the speech of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], but I think every Senator is impressed with the importance of this subject. The remarks which have just been made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] made me feel that, perhaps, I ought to call attention to this situation: I have been told, and I believe reliably, that when the delegates met in convention in Cleveland these demands were presented to the convention, a resolution was passed instructing their committee to present them, and they were directed to report back to the convention. Ordinarily in disputes between operators and miners, a referendum may be had at which the miners are privileged to cast a secret vote, but under the plan which was adopted by the delegates in this case the miners themselves will have no privilege of voting upon these demands. I have been informed that in my own State of Ohio there are 45,000 miners, and that if they were granted the privilege of a referendum vote these demands would be overwhelmingly defeated. I am constrained to believe—and I base this belief upon information which I think is reliable—that this is not a miners' strike, but is a strike by the officers and delegates of the miners.

This situation is so serious that it seems to me if there is any way by which the Congress of the United States can reasonably prevent the calamities which will befall the country in the event the strike takes place, Congress ought to act. In my own State alone, with a population of over 6,000,000 of people, where we have an abundant coal supply, though much of the coal which is used in our industries comes from Pennsylvania and West Virginia and Kentucky and Tennessee, it is appalling to think that 6,000,000 of people must be compelled to freeze, the wheels of industry stop, and transportation cease because these demands are made by the officers and the delegates to a convention, and the miners themselves have no opportunity to register their voice. That is the situation as I see it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Ohio has very well expressed the alarming condition and the attendant circumstances. He says that if Congress can do anything to prevent that situation, Congress ought to act. What has the Senator in mind as preventive legislation?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have nothing in mind. I am not a member of the subcommittee that has been studying this situation; but I have this in mind which the press and public men generally can do, and that is to call the attention of every man, woman, and child in the country to the peculiar situation, and I think we are safe in saying that this strike as ordered has not been authorized by the miners themselves, or if authorized they would not ratify the action of their delegates if they had an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio what his opinion would be of a proposition of this sort: Could or could not Congress constitutionally make it a criminal offense to promote a strike that would interfere with commodities that pass through the channels of interstate commerce without first having a referendum to the men who are actually interested?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator is a better constitutional lawyer than I am. I can see serious difficulties, as I think. I am disposed to think, since the Senator has suggested the question, that while we are legally at war there is perhaps some provision among the provisions of the fuel legislation which we passed a couple of years ago which might authorize the Federal Government for the time being to take control of the situation. I do not know. I have not studied that question sufficiently to say.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me to ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I apologize to the Senator for taking so much of his time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want to interrupt this discussion, because this is the most important matter that this Congress can have before it, next to the treaty of peace; but I do want to finish pretty soon. I yield, however. I know how valuable this discussion is, and I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I simply wanted to make this inquiry, and I hope this observation may be noted.

We have here in this appropriation bill the following item:

Enforcement of antitrust laws: For the enforcement of antitrust laws, $200,000.

As it came from the House, the item excludes from the operation of the antitrust laws labor unions and farmers. So far as the farmers are concerned, I do not understand that they ask for it; but I want to ask the Senator from Ohio, if he may be permitted to answer me "yes" or "no," whether he does not think that the present threat and the present situation as described by the Senator from New Jersey amount to a trust, a conspiracy in restraint of trade, and so forth? Shall we go on in every appropriation bill appropriating money for carrying out the trust laws and excepting certain classes of people, or shall we repeal the trust laws?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, we have section 6 of the Clayton bill confronting us, and I never have made it a practice to give an offhand opinion on a legal problem. I do not think it avails very much; but I shall hope that out of this discussion will grow a solution of a very serious situation. I can not understand what humanitarian principles prompt a few men to say in the great Republic of the United States: "We have got you by the throat. We are going to make your wives and babies freeze unless you surrender." I do not believe in that kind of autocracy, and the country will not tolerate it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the impending strike was considered by the subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee investigating the production of coal. We held several meetings to decide whether or not we should call Mr. Lewis, the president of the bituminous mine workers, whether anything could be offered to the controversy in that way. The demands are so drastic, so impossible, that all we could do would be to point out to the president of this union that it was his duty to keep the contract. However, we asked the Secretary of Labor to come to a conference of the committee, and he came. I think I am at liberty to state that he also agreed with us that there was a legal and binding contract, and that the demands were impossible. He stated to us that he intended, through certain powers of mediation which he has, to call before him the mine operators—and I understand that that includes all of them—and Mr. Lewis, and attempt to adjust the differences.

That meeting was convened at 11 o'clock this morning, and from information which I had previous to its assembling I very much despair that out of the conference will come any agreement. The mine operators are perfectly willing, upon recognition of this contract, to negotiate a new wage scale, but they are unwilling to grant a six-hour day or a five-day week or a 60 per cent advance. In a proper discussion of the differences in regard to the wage scale they are perfectly willing to enter into the question of the increased cost of living as compared with the increased wages paid their miners; and I understand that the Secretary of Labor has admitted that in the last wage scale granted by Dr. Garfield, which he now states is sufficient, and also states that that contract is binding to April 1, 1920, the Secretary of Labor admits that the wages had advanced beyond the increased cost of living.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think the statement just made is subject to this qualification, that this wage scale shall continue until April 1, 1920, unless peace is sooner declared.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; during the continuance of the war. I have already mentioned that in my previous remarks.

Mr. President, I have here the invitation to Mr. Thomas T. Brewster, chairman of the coal operators, from the Secretary of Labor, asking him to meet with Mr. Lewis in order to see if these differences can not be composed. I will ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and not read.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, October 17, 1919.

Mr. THOMAS T. BREWSTER,
Chairman Coal Operators of the Central Competitive Coal Field, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The impending labor dispute and possible strike in the bituminous coal fields of the United States is of vital importance to all of the people. As the executive officer of the Government intrusted with the function of mediation in such disputes, I feel that nothing should be left undone that may give hope of an amicable adjustment of the differences existing between the operators and miners. I realize the difficulties to be overcome and give full weight to the statement of the coal operators that certain assurances relative to carrying out of existing contracts, the rescinding of the strike order, and the withdrawal of a demand for a shorter workday must be given by the representatives of the miners before negotiations can be renewed, and the statement of the miners that there must be a disposition to really negotiate on the part of the operators before it would be worth while for them to go into conference. I am sure, however, that there can be no objection on the part of either side to meet with the Secretary of Labor for the purpose of discussing with him all of the matters involved in the dispute.

I would therefore invite, through you, the full scale committee of the coal operators of the central competitive coal field to meet with me at my office in Washington at 11 a. m., Tuesday, October 21, 1919, for this purpose. I am sending a similar invitation to the full scale committee of the miners through their acting president, Mr. John L. Lewis.

Trusting that you may find it possible to comply with this request, I am,

Respectfully, yours (Signed) W. B. WILSON,
Secretary of Labor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I also have the reply of Mr. Brewster to the Secretary of Labor. I ask that the reply be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 17, 1919.

Hon. W. B. WILSON,
Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As chairman of the coal operators of the central competitive field, I am instructed to make the following reply to your suggestions that negotiations between the miners and operators be resumed. The coal operators assure you that they are willing to comply with your request, but the resumption of such negotiations should be predicated upon the following:

First. The miners must indicate their willingness to carry out the existing contract, which contract H. A. Garfield, United States Fuel Administrator attests is still in effect, to its legal termination.

Second. To do so the present strike order, effective November 1, must be rescinded and work must be continued pending negotiations.

Third. In order to produce sufficient coal for the needs of the public at the lowest possible cost, we refuse to negotiate any reduction in the hours of labor below the present standard, eight hours per day, six days per week.

As pertinent to the questions involved, the operators deem it advisable to say that the coal operators of the central competitive field have adhered to the principles and practices of collective bargaining for 33 years with the largest body of organized labor in the United States, and it is our opinion that our scale negotiations have broken down and that our contract has been abrogated by the miners' union in their call for a strike November 1, because the present system of collective bargaining does not fix equal responsibility under the law upon the employer and the labor union.

Our experience teaches us that no set of employers should agree to a system of collective bargaining which does not make both parties to the contract equally liable and responsible for the observance of the terms of such contract.

Respectfully, THOS. T. BREWSTER, Chairman.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, one of the claims of the president of the miners' union is that the war is practically over, that the mine operators have made extortionate profits, and he points to the statement of the Federal Trade Commission, based on costs for 1917–18, and states that the mine operators have been making 60 cents margin per ton profit. That is correct as far as it goes, but it does not take into account certain items which largely reduce the net to the operators. In Federal Trade Commission report, Bulletin No. 1, speaking of this margin, it is said:

This margin must not be confused with what is often called profit. Selling expense, interest, income, and excess-profits taxes, as well as other items, must be deducted from it before the net profit available for dividends or surplus can be determined. The margin necessary to a profitable operation varies greatly from operator to operator and from field to field. One operator may have a heavy investment in mining machinery and thus show a relatively low labor cost, while another operator may have a small investment but a high labor cost. In the case of the first operator the margin obtained should be larger in order to give an equal rate of remuneration on the larger amount of invested capital.

I understand that reference has been made to the western Pennsylvania field, and that the profits of the operators there were approximated to net about 10 to 15 cents per ton.

Speaking again of these demands, unless this intolerable condition can be rectified; unless some means can be found to prevent the imposition of such unthinkable demands and penalties; unless collective bargaining can be continued in an orderly manner and with due regard to the public welfare and comfort, a new remedy must be applied—the remedy of making labor amenable to the same extent as capital to the laws of the United States, hedged around by the same restrictions and subject to the same penalties.

I do not think the American people are opposed to trade-unions or to any kind of organization of workmen whose object is the betterment of their conditions.

The principle of collective bargaining is proper enough in the abstract, and also proper enough in the concrete, when applied to the employer and his employees. There should be no objection to the demand of the latter that they as a body, or through a committee, be called into consultation and conference regarding the question of wages and kindred matters.

But American employers should not be placed in subjection to any outside organization whose officers and dominating spirits are not identified with or in the service of the particular business concern in question. That is not democracy.

Allied to this is the open-shop proposition. While no employer should attempt to prevent his employees from joining any sort of an organization they please, they should never agree to close their shops to nonunion men. That, also, would be a repudiation of the essential principles of democracy.

In this connection, while speaking of the open shop, I take pleasure in quoting a very distinguished authority, none other than President Wilson, before his elevation to the White House, but then an eminent educator and historian.

Writing January 12, 1909, in reply to an invitation to speak at a banquet of antistrike and antiboycott advocates, he said:

I am a fierce partisan of the open shop and of everything that might be possible for me to contribute to the clarification of thinking and the formation of right purposes in matters of this kind.

That was a fine presentation of a fundamental proposition. Upon such a question the truly patriotic American can afford to be a "fierce partisan."

In collective bargaining it is pertinent to ask, Of what avail is a bargain if it is not enforceable at law? Of what avail is an agreement with men who break agreements? In the case of the printers' strike in New York strong local unions defied their officers. So, too, the boatmen tied up the whole food supply of New York in violation of their agreements. I read Mr. Gompers's letter, denouncing the breaking of contracts, addressed to the leader of the labor organization directly involved:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Your telegram, in which you state members of your organization are on strike against an award of the National Adjustment Commission, received. The executive council in session in Washington considered this telegram and decided:

That it is not in the province of the executive council to inject itself into a strictly trade struggle between factions in a national or international union. The dispute should be solved by those who have the power to enforce its rules and decisions.

SACREDNESS OF CONTRACTS.

But on the question of adherence to contracts the American Federation of Labor has taken strong grounds. In 1904 the convention declared unanimously: "We wish in the strongest language possible to express our regret that any organization of workmen should fail to rigidly adhere to a contract entered into with employers of its members, and we believe it essential to urge upon trade-unionism the absolute necessity of holding contracts between them and their employers inviolate."

If the longshoremen agreed to abide by the award they have been striking in violation of one of the fundamental principles of the American Federation of Labor. The agreement to abide by the award was a sacred contract to accept it.

We therefore hope that, through laws of your international union, you will successfully induce the strikers to return to work, not only for their own honor and best interests but in the interest of the trade-union movement.

By order executive council, American Federation of Labor.

SAMUEL GOMPERS, President.

Note what Mr. Gompers says. He condemns in the severest terms the breaking of contracts and upholds the sacredness of contracts. Every right-minded American must be in accord with him in that proposition, but in the first part of his letter he states that the executive council decided—

That it is not in the province of the executive council to inject itself into a strictly trade struggle between factions in a national or international union. The dispute should be solved by those who have the power to enforce its rules and decisions.

A battle over fundamental principles of right and wrong, between agreement keepers and contract breakers, Mr. Gompers denominates a "struggle between factions," and he confesses himself and his organization powerless to right the existing wrong or to compel the recalcitrant strikers to keep their contracts.

This is the issue that we must face. We are forced to insist that collective bargaining shall be coupled with collective responsibility, legal and moral, and that when employers make a contract with their employees the powers of government shall be put behind that agreement with the same force and effect as it is put behind any agreement that is entered into for lawful purposes.

I noticed in the Washington Post this short article on collective bargaining:

COLLECTIVE AGREEMENT NOT BINDING, HAT MAKERS SAY.

NEW YORK, October 18.

A statement asserting that "collective agreements are nonoperative" was issued to-day by the Ladies' Hat Manufacturers Association in view of reports that the main question before the industrial conference at Washington is the collective agreement.

The statement asserted that for four years agreements which the association had made with the Cap and Hat Makers' Union of North America had been broken at will by their employees, and that the union leaders who signed the agreements asserted they had no control over the workers. A general strike is now in progress in the industry.

One of our ablest newspapers of the country, editorially speaking, the Philadelphia North American, in a recent issue said:

Three years ago a severe blow was adminstered to the principle of arbitration and also to the doctrine of the predominating rights of the public in industrial controversies. In the late summer of 1916, when the Nation was in the ominous shadow of approaching war, the four great railroad brotherhoods presented drastic demands and announced that they would be enforced, if necessary, by a Nation-wide strike. President Wilson, concerned for his campaign for reelection, intervened in the name of the public. But when the brotherhoods refused to withdraw their ultimatum he yielded and forced through Congress a bill embodying their demands, without any effective inquiry into the facts. The railway workers, as one of their leaders candidly avowed, had employed an adaptation of the ruthless methods of the cave men, and their victory over the Government was hailed by them as a justification for their policy.

I seriously object to the United States Government being forced into partnership with any class of our citizens. If we expect to survive and continue our career as the greatest Republic on the earth, we must adhere to the doctrine that all class alliances shall be prohibited; that this shall be a Government of the whole people, and not one in which any section or faction or industry or class shall exercise a dominating influence.

What was the situation when we entered the arena of war? Why were the railroads taken over by the Government? Because they had broken down? Nothing of the sort. Look back over the newspapers of the day and you will recall the threat of a Nation-wide strike by the trainmen—a threat which, if it had been carried into effect, would have paralyzed all our transportation facilities, plunged us into chaos, and made it utterly impossible to carry out any of our war plans.

When the railroads were taken over what was the first step? Rates were raised a billion dollars. What was the second step? Wages were raised a billion dollars. And who paid the bill? The question answers itself—the people, of course.

The demand of the trainmen was followed by that of the ship workers. Ten thousand struck in one yard. Fifteen thousand in another followed suit. With the Allies in dire peril and entirely dependent upon the speed with which we would come to their rescue, and all this contingent upon the vastly increased output in our shipping facilities, these men went on strike, thus imperiling the cause of democracy and civilization in its battle with the barbarous war lord and his diabolical henchmen.

Not until their demands were granted was work resumed in the shipyards and the work of tonnage production continued.

And thus it went on, one trade or industry after another making its demands for greatly increased pay and shorter hours, with never a thought of the consequences to this country or to the world at large and never an atom of sympathy with the splendid efforts of our soldiers in France to defeat the machinations of the despicable Huns.

What is the industrial and economic situation in America to-day? We have a state of semiparalysis in the steel industry, through the action chiefly of a lot of foreigners who saw fit to strike, although they already were receiving very high wages. Only a few days ago in Pittsburgh, if the newspapers give us correct information, certain of the malcontents themselves testified before Senator KENYON'S committee that from 50 to 75 per cent of the strikers were foreign born.

We have the strike of the longshoremen, which has held up practically all our shipping and brought almost to a standstill trade with foreign ports, involving an incredibly large pecuniary loss, not to mention a tremendous food loss in New York City. At the same time we had the strike of the pressmen already referred to, the result being, likewise, a serious financial loss in many quarters.

And so it goes. Where will the striking frenzy stop? What will the harvest be? Unless a halt is called we shall reach a state of anarchy infinitely worse than the autocracy which the German Junkers sought to impose upon the world, and for the defeat of which America entered the war.

I am not an alarmist. I have an abiding faith in the American people. But I try to be a student of history, and especially of current history. Furthermore, I am not blind. There is abroad in the world a spirit of evil—Bolshevism—which is the twin brother of autocracy, in that both are enemies of pure democracy. And this spirit is more deeply seated in America than most of us are aware.

Autocracy simply meant the assumption of large powers by an individual or a clique, with the welfare of the masses a subordinate consideration. That stifled democracy. Nevertheless, autocracy, for selfish reasons, perhaps, was oftentimes paternalistic to a degree that the interests of the populace were largely conserved and promoted.

Bolshevism, like autocracy, is the antithesis of democracy. Bolshevism, as practiced in Russia, is confined to the proletariat, only a minority of the population, but embracing the rolling-stone elements, the irresponsible citizens. These oppose not only the old, exceedingly small monarchic group, but that great mass of citizens known as the bourgeoise, embracing millions of the middle class—merchants, farmers, home owners, and well-to-do mechanics. These, according to the tenets of the Bolshevists, must be excluded from all participation in government, being deprived even of the right of suffrage.

This is class government, and not democracy. This tendency toward Bolshevism in some form, either closely following the original Russian model or developing milder symptoms, is found in every nation of the earth, and this evil force is a far greater menace to the perpetuity of democratic institutions than the average citizen imagines. It is rampant in Germany. It is powerful in France. It is untiringly at work in Italy. Its activity in Great Britain is pronounced.

He who thinks we do not face this great menace at our very doors is not a truly wide-awake American. He is a sleeping sentinel at the post of duty.

The danger in America to which I refer does not come, in the main, from the un-American elements in our population who have planned and executed bomb explosions and similar manifestations of the anarchists. That element is, unfortunately, too large, and has been given entirely too much latitude in the past. But these men can be located by the authorities and placed where they shall be harmless.

But there is a determined movement throughout the land to assume control of all the functions of government in behalf of a class. They would make this a class government committed to the enactment of class legislation.

But I protest against any class organization in America being taken into official partnership with the Government of the United States, such as has prevailed for the last few years in Washington, and especially since our entrance into the war. We have come to the parting of the ways.

To Americans as a whole let me say: Abhor and resent class organization which seeks to control government in the interest of that class. In self-defense you may be compelled to organize to protect yourselves from a state of affairs which means vassalage for you and all those not subservient to the leaders of the movement to which I refer.

The people of Great Britain have just faced a grueling experience of a like character, and they have come off victors in the struggle which ensued. The very foundations of society, of government, were threatened. Only by a hair's breadth was a revolution averted.

The railway men made demands which could not be recognized. As in the case of the threatened coal strike, the conflict in England was started precipitately and in violation of an agreement. One authority described it as "wanton war on society" and "an effort to starve the country into submission," "an unparalleled attempt to blackmail the nation."

Another authority said, "Whatever is done for the railway men must come out of the pockets of the people. Everyone should be paid a fair rate, but you can not continually pay men for what they do not do. In the present case they are demanding to be masters and to determine the fate not only of the Government but of the whole community."

Speaking last February, when the miners of Great Britain threatened to strike, Lloyd-George denounced in Parliament "demands which are put forward not to obtain fair conditions, but to overthrow the existing order, to destroy the Government," and declared that "the nation must fight Prussianism in the industrial world exactly as we fought it on the continent of Europe."

Speaking two or three weeks ago at the reception to Field Marshal Allenby, at the Mansion House, the British premier employed almost the same language when referring to the strike of the railway men. He said:

Prussianism in the industrial and economic world must not prevail. Great Britain has once more rendered a deep and lasting service to real freedom by defeating an effort to hold up the community and strangle it into submission. The nation means to be strong, firm, and just, but always master.

We can not afford to temporize or compromise with the forces of evil which are threatening to undermine the foundations of society and destroy the fundamental methods of our Government. We can not afford to submit to any partnership with a class. We must not allow any element or organization to assume any of the functions of government or to dictate to either Congress or the Executive.

There has been entirely too much of this in the past. Public men have shivered and shaken in their boots when agitators have issued their orders, and, in innumerable instances, have ignored their own sense of duty because of a fear of consequences. The time has now come for every red-blooded American to stand up and be counted.

So far as concerns this threatened strike of the bituminous coal miners, there is only one way to avert it. It can not be done by Executive decree nor can any action of Congress prevent the consummation of the conspiracy.

Public opinion, however, may bring the leaders of the movement to their senses and thus the calamity may be averted. To this end it is hoped that the patriotic newspapers of the country will at once speak, and in no uncertain terms. To a large extent the matter is in their hands. Already many of them have denounced the proposed strike. The press should not wait until the strike is upon us and the disaster at our gates before speaking.

Recently, following the inexcusable strike of the Boston police force, the papers of that city, almost without exception, denounced the action of the strikers in unmeasured terms. On this point the Springfield Union said editorially:

Our only criticism of these sound observations is that something in similar vein was not said when the policemen were most in need of advice and when Commissioner Curtis should have received the uncompromising support of public opinion. It was too long left to the Transcript alone to express with courage and clear understanding the honest thought of Boston and to uphold the correct public policy for which the police commission was contending.

Concerning this whole question the Philadelphia North American, which has always been a friend of organized labor and a champion of Mr. Gompers, has recently said editorially:

There is a perceptible and growing public antagonism to organized labor. The condition is known in every newspaper office in the country, but the aggressive and dictatorial attitude of union labor, upon which most newspapers must depend, has made publishers cautious in discussing labor problems. At the present time, however, when conflicts in industry are multiplying, the newspaper which resorts to silence or evasion fails in its duty to the public and does a distinct disservice to labor itself.

These are brave words and as true as they are brave.

It is a satisfaction to note that many other leading newspapers of the United States are denouncing in vigorous terms the attempts of certain unions to sandbag the country. The New York World has recently published several powerful editorials which contain words of warning to misguided labor leaders. In its issue of October 9 it said:

Before organized labor can hope to make further progress anywhere it must put its own house in order. The whole structure of collective bargaining rests upon the principle of collective responsibility and collective good faith. Once these are destroyed nothing remains.

While taking a firm stand itself editorially upon this supreme question, the World justly calls upon Government officials to be equally positive and determined in upholding popular rights and in demanding a proper consideration of the public welfare at the hands of labor leaders.

The World quotes from the speech of Secretary Wilson in opening the sessions of the industrial congress, who said:

We have found ways of regulating all the other relations of mankind. Surely human intelligence can devise some more acceptable method of adjusting the relationship between employer and employee.

And adds:

It might, but it does not, and it never will until the Government, under the pressure of public sentiment, takes the initiative and asserts some of the power that is inherent in it.

The press of the country should make it clear to these misguided men of the United Mine Workers that the people of America will never permit this burden to be saddled upon them, and that they will never submit to any such demands as they have made—demands which threaten the very foundations of our democratic institutions. This country is not ready to be dictated to by a horde of aliens in no sense Americanized nor in sympathy with our democratic institutions.

In this whole labor controversy one fact should be clearly borne in mind. We are not chiefly concerned regarding the interests of capitalists, the employers, the operators. Nor are we giving undue consideration to the welfare of the individual worker, the miner, or other laborer who is disposed to strike. But we are greatly interested in the material welfare of the vast body of our people, the middlemen, so to speak, the consumers—in other words, the men who "pay the freight"—upon whom falls the great burden resulting from the continual increase in wages. These men know perfectly well that this increase must be made up by an increase in commodity prices, and that it is the individual consumer who foots the bill in the final analysis. These men, nine-tenths of our population—one hundred millions—are disgusted, are incensed with the whole proposition, and are determined that the arbitrary demands imposing an unjust and intolerable burden on them shall not succeed.

A bit of verse in a local paper, the Washington Evening Star, properly diagnoses the situation, as follows:

THE PUBLIC.

Says capital to labor,
"We will talk it over, neighbor,
And the public shall admire the wisdom deep."
Says labor, "I am willing,
For my mind I have been filling
With some information far too good to keep."

They argued and expounded,
And each topic they surrounded
With a vast and indefatigable din.
Here and there they grabbed a missile
Silencing the factory whistle,
And the public murmured, "Where do I come in?"

Then the discord rising thickly
Turning the harmony right quickly
As the two exclaimed in a convincing way,
"Don't feel nervous or dejected,
You shall never be neglected—
You shall be the audience who has to pay."

The New York World phrases the same idea in stern prose, when it declares, editorially:

There are three parties to every strike, not two. The third party is the general public, whose rights and whose welfare are trampled under foot, which pays the ultimate cost of the conflict, and in addition is saddled with the expense of maintaining some semblance of law and order between the belligerents.

That is the situation in a nutshell. The great third party is the chief sufferer in these strikes.

The total cost of the British railway strikes is estimated at a quarter of a billion dollars. What an enormous loss these misguided men have inflicted upon their country, already suffering from underproduction and a stupendous war debt! They should profit in a single instance, at least, from the policy of their late German antagonists, who are now organizing and putting into force a 10-hour day program, in order to force production to a maximum limit, and thus hasten the day of liberation from the burdens and penalties resulting from war conditions.

We are threatened with an experience in this country similar to that of England. If all the strikes which scheming malcontents, largely of alien origin, are now hatching in the United States shall materialize, the loss in production and otherwise is likely to amount to billions of dollars. This, in view of the burdens we are already carrying, is piling Pelion upon Ossa to an unendurable degree. Those guilty of this dastardly act are in no sense patriotic American citizens, nor should they be treated as such. Whatever they may be nominally, they are in spirit outlanders and enemies of democracy, and are deserving the contempt of all true patriots.

Throughout this whole controversy one compelling question looms up, overshadowing all others. Lloyd-George set it forth in the splendid words which I have already quoted, and which I shall quote again, paraphrased to fit the occasion:

Prussianism in the industrial and economic world must not prevail. The United States will render a deep and lasting service to real freedom by defeating any effort to hold up the community and strangle it into submission. The Nation means to be strong, firm, and just, but always master.

I call upon all patriotic Americans, in public life and out, to adhere to that principle with the utmost rigidity, and not seek to enter into any "entangling alliances" with forces whose primary concern is not the public welfare, forces seeking to advance causes antagonistic to the well-being of the people as a whole.

That citizen who seeks to advance the interests of himself and associates at the expense of the general public is not a patriotic citizen, or one to whom any considerable deference should be paid in the adjustment of economic or other problems. Sovietism means class rule. We can not permit that in America and still preserve our democratic institutions.

Labor unionism should be upheld for one primary principle, to obtain and maintain justice for the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow; but when the power of organization is employed to impose injustice against all other classes of society, the law of the land should be invoked to prevent the abuse of such power, or laws enacted that will do this.

When labor defies law and order through the power of its union it is sounding its own death knell and digging its own grave.

There are thousands of law-abiding citizens members of these unions, men of family, self-respecting citizens, who are satisfied with existing conditions, who do not desire to strike, but wish to continue at work. The terrorism spread by the radicals and lawless in these unions creates fear for the safety of their homes, their wives, and their children, and, indeed, for their own lives.

Is it not the Government's duty to throw around such in this land the strong protecting arm of the law, so that the liberty we all boast of may continue to exist?

The best thought of this Nation should always be expended in the interest of the man who works with his hands. He is the bone and sinew of the land. Otherwise the history of labor, indeed, would be the history of slavery. But in this land of opportunity labor has risen to a higher degree than in any other, but if, through improper influence and disloyal leadership, the labor group attempt to place its fetters upon an unoffending public, it must be dealt with accordingly.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 4, after line 9, to insert:

COURTHOUSE.

For the care and protection of the courthouse of the District of Columbia, under the direction of the United States marshal of the District of Columbia, namely: Ten charwomen, at $240 each per annum, from November 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive, $1,600, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the Senator will not do that. We should like to get through this bill by 2 o'clock, if possible.

Mr. KING. There are some Senators absent who are interested in some of the provisions of the bill and they desire to be advised.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harding	New	Simmons
Brandegee	Harris	Newberry	Smith, Ariz.
Capper	Harrison	Norris	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Johnson, Calif.	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Smoot
Curtis	Kendrick	Owen	Spencer
Dial	Kenyon	Page	Sutherland
Dillingham	Keyes	Penrose	Swanson
Elkins	King	Phelan	Thomas
Fall	Kirby	Phipps	Townsend
Fernald	La Follette	Pittman	Trammell
France	Lenroot	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Gay	McCormick	Sheppard	Warren
Gronna	McCumber	Sherman	Watson
Hale	McKellar	Shields	Wolcott

Mr. KING. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 16, to insert:

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL AND LYING-IN ASYLUM.

Columbia Hospital and Lying-in Asylum: For general repairs and for additional construction, including labor and material for each and every item connected therewith, $2,900.

One-half of the foregoing amounts to meet deficiencies in appropriations on account of the District of Columbia shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 5, to insert:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Vocational rehabilitation: For an additional amount for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, $5,000,000: Provided, That the salary limitations prescribed by the item of appropriation for vocational rehabilitation contained in the sundry civil act, approved July 19, 1919, shall apply to the appropriation hereby made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think that may be deemed an independent amendment from that which follows. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the occasion for this very large appropriation, the greater part of which, doubtless, will go to the personal expenses of employees of the Vocational Board. I want to say to the Senator that I have had many complaints about the lack of efficiency and the extravagance of the Vocational Board, and it seems that the charge of extravagance is supported if an additional $5,000,000 is now asked for. There has been a desire upon the part of Congress to appropriate whatever was needed by the soldiers and sailors for their rehabilitation and for vocational training, but there has been a feeling that the administration of the fund created for such purpose has been inefficient and wasteful.

Mr. WARREN. To what board does the Senator allude?

Mr. KING. The Federal Board for Vocational Education having to do with the vocational rehabilitation of soldiers.

Mr. WARREN. There are two different matters involved. The appropriation here is $5,000,000, and is made upon the basis of an estimate that it will take to carry on the work to the end of the fiscal year about $19,000,000. This will carry them along only until some time in the early part of the next session, when we shall be called upon again to appropriate for this purpose.

The Senator knows—or if he does not I shall tell him—that I was opposed to as liberal treatment as we originally provided for this board, not that I wished to oppose the rehabilitation of the wounded soldiers, because I heartily approve of that work, but I believed that they were traveling with too much steam on and with too many employees at too large salaries. If I remember aright, we had one bill vetoed because we did not provide properly, as it was thought, and we met opposition on the floor and we met some opposition in conference, but finally we put in an appropriation of about $14,000,000.

In the military bill, as I recall, there were $6,000,000 provided to take care of those in the Army. This item of $5,000,000 in this deficiency bill is to take care of soldiers that have been discharged from the Army who have been injured and now, succeeding demobilization, are applying to the board in large numbers. It is expected there will be very heavy expenses for about eight or nine months, as nine months is the usual term during which the men are under instruction. This item of $5,000,000 is appropriated, however, with strict adherence to what has already been settled upon by the Senate and by the House as to what salaries shall be paid and how many employees there may be.

I am sorry the Senator has not examined the report, for it contains a list of all the employees and the compensation received by them and each of them.

Mr. KING. I have not seen the report, but I shall be very glad to examine it. I should like to ask the Senator whether this amount is in addition to the appropriation which was carried in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. WARREN. It is in addition to about $14,000,000 that was appropriated. It will take, however, to carry the work through the present year from $34,000,000 to $40,000,000. This will be the heavy year, as we have reason to expect. More and more men are applying every day, and I believe the peak of the load will be reached toward the end of the year.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator indicate what part of this $5,000,000 goes for salaries of the multitude of employees who are connected with this board and the board which will be undoubtedly attached to it within a short time?

Mr. WARREN. At the time we organized this institution and provided the compensation, or very soon thereafter, the salaries were a trifle less than $1,000,000. As I recall now—I can not always remember the exact figures—we were able to reduce the amount paid for salaries to about $825,000. I should have to look at the figures to give the Senator the exact amount. The matter was before the committee and was considered by it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is no question that whatever amount is required for the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers we ought gladly to appropriate.

Mr. WARREN. The money appropriated under this bill can not be used for any other purpose except to provide the machinery with which to carry on the work; that is, for the teachers and, of course, for rental to some extent, because they have branches in various States. There is one in Denver that takes care of soldiers from Utah, Wyoming, New Mexico, and Colorado.

There the highest salary is one man at $3,750, one at $3,500, two at $3,000, three at $2,750, three at $2,500, and seven at $2,400. That is the force of teachers or members of the staff. The clerical personnel consists of clerks at $2,300, $2,250, $2,200, $2,100, $2,000, and so on down, employees and teachers, aggregating 72 individuals. As I say, they care for the States of Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming. There is a rather larger personnel than in most of these establishments.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I was about to observe a moment ago when the Senator interrupted me, that no Senator would refuse to appropriate whatever is required for the proper protection of the soldiers and for their rehabilitation, but the trouble is—and that complaint is constantly being made—that millions of dollars of appropriations made for the soldiers will be consumed in salaries, in needless expenditures made by extravagant and in some instances incompetent officials; and this appropriation, I think, is a partial justification of the view that there is extravagance and waste upon the part of the Vocational Board. There is a disposition to give positions to a number of broken-down individuals and to create too many positions. The overhead expenses are too great and too much of the appropriations made for the soldiers is expended in salaries, traveling expenses, and so forth. There is too large a personnel in the service of the Government in this particular work, as there is in so many other agencies and departments of the Government.

Mr. WARREN. The total number of employees of every nature is 2,529. Out of a requirement here of $34,000,000 and a little over, the salaries of the employees—that is, what they have expended and what they will expend during the year—would be three million forty-four thousand and some odd dollars.

Mr. KING. It seems to me an outrage that such a large part of the appropriation should be utilized for the expenses of administration. It merely illustrates that even where the Government undertakes the care and education of boys who have served their country in a heroic and splendid manner there are a lot of individuals who fasten themselves upon the Government and consume a large part of the amounts appropriated by Congress for such praiseworthy and laudable purposes. When the question of vocational training of soldiers was before the Senate for consideration at the last session of Congress it was apparent from the record before us that the expense of administration was wasteful, and that extravagance was justly charged against those in control of its activities.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator, in answer to his inquiries, that the board started with 91 of these wounded soldiers. The number in September, prior to the 1st of October, was 29,667, and there are more who have applied and who are to be taken in. I do not understand that they expect to increase the salaries—in fact, they can not increase the salaries, because there is an inhibition against that in the former legislation, which is repeated here—but they expect that those soldier students will run probably to 30,000 and possibly more, and then from that time the number will recede; perhaps not in the same proportion as the number increased, but very nearly the same, as they are entitled under their present plan to about nine months each.

Mr. KING. I will say to the chairman of the committee that a number of letters which I have received from persons who have been importuned to accept the benefits of this act indicate that there is a determined plan upon the part of some of those connected with this board to make as great a showing as possible, and for that purpose and to that end they have solicited men who did not care to take advantage of the provisions of the act and who were not entitled to it, because their ailments were so unimportant as to not bring them under the provisions of the act, and complaints have been made that efforts were being put forth to induce people to claim benefits under this act when they were not entitled thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 5, after line 15, to insert:

> The Secretary of War shall have authority to transfer to the Federal Board for Vocational Education, without compensation therefor, certain surplus machine tools and other equipment of the approximate value of $250,000 belonging to the War Department and now in possession of the Federal board and being used by that board as equipment in schools for vocational education controlled by the board. Property so transferred shall be dropped from the records of the War Department on the filing with the War Department of an itemized receipt for the articles thus transferred. The Federal Board for Vocational Education shall annually report to Congress the disposition and use of the articles the transfer of which is herein authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 7, line 9, after "1920," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$200,000," so as to make the clause read:

> Salaries: For additional officers and employees in the Department of State during the fiscal year 1920, $200,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceding $4,500 per annum.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, in reference to that item the estimate made was for an appropriation of $300,000 for the department. It appears that the House only allowed $100,000, and the Senate committee has increased that amount to $200,000. The estimate also requested an appropriation of $242,500 additional for additional personnel for the department.

I have not only had my attention called to this matter by certain officials of the State Department, but I have had the necessity for these appropriations very seriously impressed upon me within the last two months and a half because of certain official business which I have been transacting upon two different committees, in the transaction of which I have been thrown very intimately with the State Department; and I may say that in both instances I have been cooperating, as the representative of one of the Senate committees, with the officials and with the personnel of the State Department. If the committee understood, as I think I more or less understand, the necessity for the appropriations which were asked in this estimate, I can not conceive that there would be any hesitation whatsoever in granting the appropriations.

I have read the testimony of the Secretary and others who appeared before the committee with reference to these items. As the presiding officer and the Members of the Senate know, the Secretary of State has been absent from this country for quite a period, and I am confident that he did not understand the details of the estimates, but simply the requirements of the service in general. I talked this matter over with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I am making this statement at his request.

I think that to cut the appropriation to $200,000 and to leave out the appropriation for extra employees would be practically suicidal. The State Department is now taking over the business under peace conditions, and a large portion of that business has been transferred to the State Department from the War Departments and other departments of the Government. The report accompanying the estimate is a very instructive one, and from my personal knowledge and personal information I think I can say without hesitation that if the appropriations requested here are not made the State Department will be practically compelled to suspend business.

The Congress provided for the appointment of something like 411 additional temporary employees and made appropriations for them. These additional employees have been at work, and the service has broken down; that is, they have not been able recently to keep up with the business. If this appropriation is not allowed, or any part of it is cut off—in other words, if the $300,000 is not allowed—the force will be reduced from 411 to 186, and instead of being reduced it needs to be very largely increased. To cut it down by any amount from the estimate requested in this particular item of $300,000 means so to cripple the service that it would be impossible for the State Department to perform that duty which it is necessary to have performed by some department.

I want to call attention to the report from the Secretary of State made on June 5, 1919, in submitting the estimate:

> There are now 411 persons temporarily employed at an annual rate of expenditure of $449,281.68. To meet the anticipated deficiency in the existing appropriation an item has already been inserted in the pending deficiency bill to carry the existing personnel to June 30, 1919.

Therefore, unless Congress shall take prompt action and provide an additional amount for the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, it will be necessary to reduce the temporary force 55 per cent, or from 411 to 186 persons. The result will be that the department will be hopelessly handicapped and impotent to perform the important duties with which it is charged.

In a later part of the report the Secretary sympathizes with the Congress in its desire to curtail expenses, and states that he has no purpose at all to fix permanently in the service the 411 temporary employees, but that at the present time in the particular division in which they are employed the necessity exists for the continued employment of these 411 temporary employees, and that at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator his amendment ready?

Mr. FALL. I move to strike out "200" and insert "300," making it "$300,000"; and I move an additional appropriation to be inserted immedately following this amendment of $242,500 for additional officers to aid in important drafting work. I will present the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I know what it is.

Mr. FALL. It calls for $242,500.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to make a few observations to see whether the Senator wanted to do just that. I appreciate quite fully the situation, and I wish to say to the Senator that in the last deficiency appropriation act the committee did not give, in fact, anywhere near what the State Department wanted. I am aware of the extra work that comes in the clean-up in relations with foreign countries following the war.

Under the rules of the Senate, we have provided that hereafter the Diplomatic appropriation bill shall go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, presided over, as Senators know, by the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]; but the deficiencies will continue, probably, to go to the Committee on Appropriations. The Senator from New Mexico is entirely within the estimates in his proposal. What occurred to the committee on the House side, I think, was that they did not want to create these statutory places in a deficiency bill, and I think it is a question of procedure. Therefore they put in one hundred thousand, by which they sought to cover the two items of three hundred thousand and two hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred. The question arises whether, in view of the attitude of the House, you want to put in two amendments to operate that way, or to offer one amendment covering the two, following the same procedure as that followed by the House, and increase the amount accordingly.

Mr. FALL. The difficulty is, Mr. President, that the appropriation of $300,000 asked is under the act of March 1, 1919, volume 40, page 1224, section 1. The appropriation asked is to cover the number of employees provided under that act, and the appropriation necessary for that particular purpose is $300,000.

The department states, and I know that they are correct in it, that it is necessary to give them an additional appropriation for the appointment of extra assistants in what they call generally the drafting department. The business in that department is increasing so enormously that it is entirely congested. The report of the department states that—

The Consular Service, involving a personnel of more than 2,000, and appropriations of more than $5,000,000 for the next fiscal year, is being administered by a director who has to assist him only two men receiving salaries greater than $1,800, and only three receiving as much as $1,800. The Diplomatic Service is being administered by the Assistant Secretary with little help other than his confidential clerk. The Russian division, specializing upon European and Asiatic Russia, one of the enormous political and commercial fields in the world, is administered by a chief and a few clerks. There ought to be at least five or six high-grade specialists in that division, men upon whose judgment the Secretary of State could rely. The result of this condition is that officers in responsible charge are compelled constantly to work overtime, and give their nights, Sundays, and holidays to their tasks.

Mr. President, that was one of the matters which was brought to my personal attention. As the chairman of one of the subcommittees of the Foreign Relations Committee, I myself have been at work with representatives of the State Department as late as 1 o'clock in the morning and half the day on Sundays; I have had my morning hours taken up; and I know that these representatives, in addition to their regular work at their desks, have been compelled to work overtime, as much as 18 to 20 hours out of the 24, because of the congestion. One of our ministers to a foreign country is doing work here which should be handled by solicitors and other expert officers in the department. I know that in one matter alone he is doing work that should be done by three or four on the regular staff in the office, and he has been retained here because it was impossible to detail anyone else to the work. The State Department simply have not the personnel. They want some additional help.

This report further states:

The Index Bureau, which receives and dispatches correspondence by mail and telegraph, employs 134 clerks, paid from the fund under consideration.

I only call attention to this to show how the work in the department has increased. If the $300,000 is not given for this particular work to which it is to be devoted, that force will be reduced from 134 to 60, instead of being increased.

The report further states:

During the month of May it received and sent out more than 1,800 mail communications a day, and in addition an average of 337 telegrams each day.

You will find on an examination, so I am told, that the work has increased from prewar times by from 200 to 500 per cent in each one of these bureaus, and now it is increasing by leaps and bounds as the peace settlement comes around, and the work which has formerly been handled by other departments devolves entirely upon the State Department.

They therefore have asked, in addition to the $300,000, for $242,500 for additional officers to aid in important drafting work. That does not mean drawing plans, Mr. President; it does not mean map making and work of that kind. It means getting up the diplomatic documents and notes, and handling work of that character, particularly work in the solicitor's department.

The Secretary refers, just incidentally, in his testimony to one of the difficulties, and I happened to be brought face to face with that myself. One of the experts of the department, who has not yet been replaced, who took up certain work with the committee at the request of the Secretary of State, who transacted a portion of that work and assisted in getting it started, failed to appear. My information was, upon asking the question, that he had been getting $3,500 a year, and he stepped out into private employment at $15,000. As the Secretary says, the difficulty is that you get a man at $3,500, $4,000, or $4,500 a year who is capable of transacting the very important business devolving upon him as solicitor or assistant solicitor or in the drafting department generally, and private individuals, exporting firms or importing firms, or those doing business with foreign countries are on the watch out for a competent man, and when they find him in the State Department they make it so interesting to him that he can not remain in the State Department at the salaries which we pay.

Mr. President, the amount which is asked here, $242,000, is for additional officers, as follows:

Eleven at $4,500 each; 25 at $4,000 each; 22 at $3,500 each; 2 at $3,000 each; and 4 at $2,500 each, to be appointed by the Secretary of State, all of whom may be appointed as chief of division of Far Eastern Division, Latin-American Division, Near Eastern Division, Division of Western European Affairs, or upon other work in connection with the foreign relations—

Under the act of March 1, 1919, the same act.

The Chief of the Division of Latin-American Affairs of the United States State Department draws the munificent salary of $4,500. For anything like the same amount of work any commercial establishment or any banking establishment in the United States would not think of offering a competent man less than $25,000 per annum, but in the State Department he can receive only $4,500. The consequence is that it is necessary to secure an inferior man or to appeal to the patriotism of some man who can afford to live on a salary of $4,500 because he has some additional revenue on the side. Yet they are not asking for an increase of salaries, but simply that they may be allowed an increase in the personnel.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, what the Senator from New Mexico says is entirely correct. The amendment is within the estimates. However, the estimates are made for 12 months, and, of course, we would have to confine the deficiency bill to the balance of the present fiscal year, which would be 8 months instead of 12 months.

Mr. FALL. That would be approximately three-quarters of the amount asked.

Mr. WARREN. It would be about $166,000.

Mr. FALL. Very well. If the Senator will allow it to go in at that figure, I will be willing to agree to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want to say a single word in support of what the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has said. The Senator in charge of the bill has accepted the amendment; so I do not wish to consume time.

It is a matter of the utmost importance that the State Department should have money to the amount asked for. I can testify to the need of it from my knowledge of the work with which the committee has been brought in contact. The work is now so congested that it is extremely difficult to get anything done, and the proposed reduction of the House would absolutely cripple the department.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has referred to some of the duties of the subcommittee of which he is chairman, with which I am familiar. In order to get that work done, in order to get the correspondence with the country with which we were in negotiation completed, the Senator from New Mexico and some of the principal officers of the State Department had to work after midnight and far into the night, night after night, in the simple work of drafting and preparing the dispatches that were necessary. That ought not to be. We ought to have a sufficient force there. It is not an extravagant department, and I am extremely anxious, owing to my experience on the committee and from what I know of the situation, that these increases shall be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment of the committee, changing the amount from $100,000 to $300,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. Now, let the vote be taken on the additional amendment to the amendment, as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the additional amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

The SECRETARY. Add to the amendment the following:

Additional officers to aid in important drafting work, as follows: Eleven at $4,500 each, 25 at $4,000 each, 22 at $3,500 each, 2 at $3,000 each, 4 at $2,500 each, to be appointed by the Secretary of State, all of whom may be employed as chief of division of Far Eastern Division, Latin-American Division, Near Eastern Division, Division of Western European Affairs, or upon other work in connection with the foreign relations, $161,666.67.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I reserve a point of order against this amendment until the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] returns to the Chamber. I ask that it be passed over until his return.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 8, to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General shall formulate and promulgate such regulations as will enable persons insured under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act to make payments of premiums at such post offices or branches or stations of post offices as they may designate or to any city letter carrier or rural carrier while on duty. The Post Office Department is hereby authorized and directed to receive sums so tendered in payment of such premiums, and to receive and transmit to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance applications for the reinstatement of lapsed insurance.

Mr. McKELLAR. I also reserve a point of order against the amendment just read on page 14, lines 9 to 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. WARREN. It was passed over with the other, I understood. The Senator reserves a point of order against it?

Mr. McKELLAR. All right; I reserve a point of order, especially to lines 9 to 19 on page 14, until the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] comes back.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 19, to insert:

COAST GUARD.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "American Printing House for the Blind," on page 15, line 10, after "$30,000," to insert:

Provided, That two copies of each of the publications printed by the American Printing House for the Blind shall be furnished free of charge to the National Library for the Blind located at 1729 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

So as to make the clause read:

To enable the American Printing House for the Blind more adequately to provide books and apparatus for the education of the blind in accordance with the provisions of the act approved August 4, 1919, $30,000: Provided, That two copies of each of the publications printed by the American Printing House for the Blind shall be furnished free of charge to the National Library for the Blind located at 1729 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 15, to insert:

MISCELLANEOUS.

Credit in the accounts of C. G. Duganne: The accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of C. G. Duganne, formerly disbursing officer, United States Reclamation Service, Denver, Colo., the sum of $147, representing amount paid by him to the Hendee Manufacturing Co. ($144) and overpayment to M. Killian ($3), the former having been disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department as having been paid in contravention of the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes, and the latter because of the item representing an overpayment to the payee named, $147.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 4, to insert:

The accounting officers of the Treasury are directed to allow and credit in the accounts of Sydney E. Smith, disbursing clerk of the War Department, the sum of $550 expended by him from the appropriation for contingent expenses, War Department, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, for the removal of certain partitions in the State, War, and Navy Building, and for this purpose the sum of $550 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WARREN. After line 4, there should be a subhead "Credit in the accounts of Sydney E. Smith."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will make the correction.

The next amendment was, under the head of "War Department," subhead "Contingent expenses," on page 16, line 21, after the word "gas," to insert ", and heating apparatus for and repairs to buildings (outside of the State, War, and Navy Department Building) occupied by the War Department and its bureaus," so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of professional and scientific books, law books, including their exchange; books of reference, blank books, pamphlets, periodicals, newspapers, maps; typewriters and adding machines; furniture and repairs to same; carpets, matting, oilcloth, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, sponges, fuel, gas, and heating apparatus for and repairs to buildings (outside of the State, War, and Navy Department Building) occupied by the War Department and its bureaus; maintenance, repair, and operation of motor trucks and motor cycles, and one motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes; freight and express charges; street car fares, not exceeding $1,000; and other absolutely necessary expenses, including a per diem allowance not to exceed $4 in lieu of subsistence, $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Engineer Department," on page 17, after line 13, to insert:

Aqueduct Bridge: For continuing the construction of the bridge authorized in section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in place thereof," approved May 18, 1916, one half to be payable out of the Treasury of the United States and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 3, to strike out:

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

Ordnance reservation civilian schools: Authority is granted for the expenditure during the fiscal year 1920 of not to exceed $64,000 from appropriations heretofore made for the "purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon," for the operation and maintenance on Ordnance reservations of schools for children of persons employed thereon, where public schools are not conveniently available for such children, including salaries, supplies, stationery, and industrial work, replacement and repair of books and equipment, and all incidental and necessary expenses in connection therewith.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 20, to insert:

DAMAGE CLAIMS.

To pay the claims adjusted and determined by the Navy Department under the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1911 on account of damages occasioned to private property by collisions with vessels of the United States Navy, and for which naval vessels were responsible, certified to Congress in Senate Document No. 104 of this session, $6,289.94.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Naval Establishment," on page 23, after line 4, to strike out:

The aggregate of the sums of $7,300,000 and $2,000,000, respectively, of the appropriations "Pay of the Navy" and "Provisions, Navy," contained in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1920, may be transferred to the following naval appropriations for the fiscal year 1920 in the following amounts, respectively:

"Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks," $2,500,000;

"Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," $1,050,000;

"Construction and repair of vessels, Bureau of Construction and Repair," $3,250,000;

"Engineering, Bureau of Steam Engineering," $2,500,000;

In all, $9,300,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended upon repairs to any vessel which is not to be retained permanently in the Navy: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall submit to Congress not later than February 1, 1920, a statement showing, for each navy yard and naval station, the total number of employees, by occupations, on December 31, 1919, and the proportion of such employees who are below a fair standard of efficiency.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the committee amendment. The Navy Department asked $18,000,000 for the purposes enumerated in the item stricken out. The Committee on Appropriations of the House refused to approve the recommendations of the Navy Department in that regard, and instead have provided for the transfer of certain funds of the Navy for the purposes covered in the House provision of the bill.

I have carefully examined the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations of both the Senate and the House. It seems to me that this transfer of funds is very necessary. An examination of the hearings would seem to indicate that the money appropriated during the last Congress for the repair and maintenance of naval vessels was insufficient to put them in proper condition; this applies particularly to the larger ships. All of these vessels have been in active service, and many of the dreadnaughts and superdreadnaughts, as well as the torpedo boats, have not been overhauled since the war began. Then, too, Mr. President, the hearings seem to indicate that we have to-day in the navy yards about 15 or 20 per cent fewer men than were employed in the war days. If we allow this transfer we will be able to keep the navy yards at the highest state of efficiency, to keep trained men, men accustomed to Government work, until next spring. The Secretary of the Navy suggests that even with the $9,000,000 provided for in this item he will be compelled to lay off 10 per cent on the 1st of March, 10 per cent more the 1st of April, and 10 per cent more the 1st of May, so that by the 1st of July next we will have gotten down to about 60 per cent of the number of men employed in the navy yards during the war. This number would be about 15 per cent more than before the war and they will be needed in view of our largely increased Navy.

I think perhaps Senators generally appreciate what it means to keep a Government or private plant in its highest state of efficiency, and for men to know that they are to be retained in their employment, particularly when the work is needed. This money is to be used only for the purpose of employing men on ships that are required for immediate service and not on emergency vessels that were brought into Navy for the period of the war. At least every year the machinery, hull, and ordnance of every naval vessel needs overhauling to be kept in the highest state of efficiency.

I believe, Mr. President, that failure to retain the House provision in the bill will prove most unfortunate. It is important, most important. I hope the Senate committee amendment will be defeated.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course, during the war we had to have thousands of men employed at various points in the Navy and Army and in the War and Navy Departments, and now that the war is over, and since the Navy itself has been cut down to but a fraction of the number of men to man these ships which are still in service, unless we are to begin to cut down the great amount of help that has been employed we shall never get it done. We have appropriated money enough at all times to keep these vessels up. It is true that during the active period of the war they were unable to get men enough to use the money that we appropriated, but they have men enough now and money enough now to bring these ships up on time for the service, and to bring them up even faster than they can man them with the forces to sail them and to arm them.

The only difference is that every department, so far as I can observe—I will not say every department, because the War Department has already reduced its help 38½ per cent—but there seems to be generally in the departments, first, the proposition on the part of the employees to remain forever, and, on the other hand, on the part of the heads of the divisions and bureaus, unfortunately all the way up, that they can not let go. They can not let go now. If we are to get back on a peace basis we have got to make a beginning. The Committee on Appropriations desires to follow the law, desires to keep inside of good, economical business lines; but Congress by frequent acts of legislation which require the appropriation of large amounts of money makes it impossible for the Committee on Appropriations to effect the economies we desire. We have an instance or two on this bill.

Now, in this proposed naval appropriation it is simply a matter of whether we shall keep a great horde of men to repair these ships within the next five or six months, or whether we shall repair them as fast as we may. They are in the service; we have more in the service now than we can man; vessels fit for service are tied up because the Government has not the men to man them. I think the amendment of the committee ought to be sustained.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I want to read from the hearings of the committee the testimony of Admiral McKean on this point:

Admiral MCKEAN. The necessity for the appropriation, as the Secretary has explained, is for fitting the fighting ships. We had, as you know, all of our ships busily employed in training, in convoy work, and two divisions abroad. They were kept working for 24 hours a day. They were kept away from the navy yards just as long as they could run, and when sent to the yards the repairs made were just sufficient to enable them to go ahead on the next trip. The result has been not the normal amount of repairs, but they have been going down, going down, going down, until some of them stopped, and we had to take them off of the convoy of troops.

I have fallen in with the divisions that were over on the other side with the British fleet, where they were kept on from four to eight hours' notice all the time to get under way. Those officers and men worked very hard and very conscientiously in their efforts to keep the ships fit during that time, and when they came back they were very proud of their success in keeping the ships operating up to high efficiency and high speeds. Whenever they were called for they went. They came back and told us that self-maintenance, which we had preached as a theory in the Navy Department, was all right. They were convinced for the first time of its possibility. They had done it, they said, and the ships were all right.

I was then in charge of matériel. I told them: "I do not believe it. You are too enthusiastic. The matériel will talk for itself when you get it opened up." It does. All of those ships to-day are requiring from 50 to 100 per cent more repairs than the same ships would have required had we been able to take them out of the fleet, send them to the yards, and do the "stitch in time that saves nine."

Mr. President, I hesitate to disagree with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but it seems to me, after a careful examination of the whole subject, that in the long run it would be most uneconomical if the Senate committee amendment is adopted. Our Navy has always prided itself on its efficiency, and this action will materially lessen our actual fighting force. I therefore hope that the committee amendment will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," on page 24, line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that the next amendment, which is in reference to the enforcement of the antitrust law, be passed over for the present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I should like to know what the request of the Senator from Wyoming is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is to pass over the next committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment relating to the enforcement of the antitrust law?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. The Chair will state to the Senator from Mississippi that the amendment which will be passed over at the request of the Senator from Wyoming is under the heading "Miscellaneous—Enforcement of antitrust laws."

Mr. HARRISON. That is the amendment to which I desire to address myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 30, line 19, after the words "Attorney General," to insert "maintenance, purchase (if possible, from other Government services) and," so as to make the clause read:

None of the judgments contained herein shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, after line 21, to insert:

SEC. 4. Public act No. 152, Sixty-fifth Congress, entitled "An act authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government," is hereby repealed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I make the point of order that the amendment is in contravention of Rule XVI, being new legislation and repealing an act now existing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). What is the point of order?

Mr. OVERMAN. I raise the point of order that the amendment is new legislation and proposes on an appropriation bill to repeal a law now existing.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I can not contest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WARREN. I do not. I simply wish to say that I am sorry the Senator from North Carolina has made the point of order. The Senator from North Carolina knows more about the existing law than does anyone else, as he was its originator, and it has undoubtedly done a great deal of good, but at the present time it is a load upon the back of the Appropriations Committee. Congress hardly has possession of its own, and matters come to the Appropriations Committee for which provision must be made which have come about because of the existence of the law. I hope the condition requiring the law may soon end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the point of order is insisted upon, it is well founded and must be sustained.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am aware that the Chair has ruled the amendment out of order, but in reply to the Senator from Wyoming I desire to put in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of War in regard to this matter. The act referred to expires, in any event, six months after the declaration of peace, but the Secretary of War says that to repeal the act before some legislation is passed to take its place would be a calamity, and shows that he could not have won the war without the legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 31, 1919.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I beg leave to reply to your letter of March 10, 1919, in which you request information as to the use made by the War Department of the provisions of the Overman Act.

This act has very materially facilitated and expedited the task of the War Department in organizing, training, transporting, equipping, and maintaining the Army. It has permitted a centralization of control, a coordination of effort, a flexibility of organization to meet changing requirements and an increased efficiency in the procurement and distribution of material and supplies, including an elimination of competitive purchasing and a standardization of specifications and procedure, without which the military program which had been so successfully carried out by this country would have been impossible of realization.

Estimates of requirements and the purchase and distribution of all equipment and supplies, except that very highly technical, has been consolidated under the direction of the Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division of the General Staff. This has prevented duplication and a condition formerly frequently occurring, a shortage of supplies in one branch of the service while another had temporarily a surplus. The same result particularly as to avoiding duplication of equipment and effecting economy was obtained by the consolidation of all motor transportation under another branch of the General Staff.

The consolidation, under the Chemical Warfare Service, of the research work involved in the development of new and improved offensive and defensive chemical warfare material, and the reorganization of the Air Service, have been very potent factors in the result attained in these very important services.

In view of the marked economy and the increased efficiency that has been made practicable under the provisions of this act, I believe that it would be a misfortune if it were revoked before such time as new legislation of a permanent nature, based upon the experience of the war, may be enacted.

Below you will find specified the rearrangement of duties and responsibilities that have been effected within the bureaus of the War Department:

1. Assigned to the Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division of the General Staff: Requirements, purchase, storage, distribution, fiscal accounting and property accounting. Transferred from Ordnance Department, Quartermaster Corps, Signal Corps, Engineer Corps, and Medical Corps.

The duties transferred include:

(a) Office of the Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic, General Staff. Duties: Responsibility for and authority over—

(1) Supply of the Army, including analysis and computation of requirements, purchase, production, inspection, acceptance, transportation, storage, issue within the United States, and embarkation.

(2) Relations with all other agencies, governmental and otherwise, in regard to Army supply, including representation of the War Department on the War Industries Board and business with representatives of the allied Governments.

(b) Facilities Department. Duties: Responsibility for and authority over procurement of real estate.

(c) Accounts Department. Duties: Responsibility for and authority over disbursements, fiscal accounting, preparation of estimates, and reports of accounts.

(d) Traffic Department. Duties: Responsibility for and authority over inland transportation.

(e) Embarkation Department. Duties: Responsibility for and authority over embarkation and ocean transportation.

The procurement of highly technical equipment and supplies not transferred—

(1) By the Corps of Engineers: Arc searchlights and gas-electric generators.

(2) By the Medical Corps: Vaccines and serums.

(3) By the Ordnance Department: Cartridge cloth, blast furnace and steel mill products, substantially all metals, coal tar, coal gas and water gas products, optical glass and optical instruments, acids, etc.

(4) By the Bureau of Aircraft Production: Aeroplanes, Liberty motors, barometers, clocks, watches, gauges, thermometers, compasses, etc.

(5) By the Chemical Warfare Service: All chemicals entering into the production of toxic gases, liquid chlorine, laminated glass, etc.

2. To the Bureau of Aircraft Production and the Division of Military Aeronautics: The production of airplanes, airplane engines and equipment and the duty of operating and maintaining or supervising the operation and maintenance of military aircraft, including balloons, airplanes, and all aircraft equipment. Transferred from the Signal Corps.

3. To the Motor Transport Corps, a section of the Operations Division, General Staff: The design, production, procurement, storage, maintenance and replacement of all motor vehicles and accounting for the same. Transferred from Quartermaster Corps, Ordnance Department, Engineer Corps, Medical Corps, and Signal Corps.

4. To the Chemical Warfare Service: The duty of operating and maintaining or supervising the operation and maintenance of all plants engaged in the investigation, manufacture, or production of toxic gases, gas-defense appliances, the filling of gas shells, and proving grounds utilized in connection therewith, and the necessary research connected with gas warfare. Transferred from the Ordnance Department, Sanitary Corps, Medical Corps, and the Experimental Station, American University.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 48, after line 2, to insert:

AUDITED CLAIMS.

SEC. 5. That for the payment of the following claims certified to be due by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, and under appropriations heretofore treated as permanent, being for the service of the fiscal year 1917 and prior years, unless otherwise stated, and which have been certified to Congress under section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884, as fully set forth in Senate Document No. 94, reported to Congress at its present session, there is appropriated as follows:

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY THE AUDITOR FOR THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

For collecting the revenue from customs, 58 cents.
For freight, transportation, etc., Public Health Service, $243.06.
For care of seamen, etc., Public Health Service, $63.
For preventing the spread of epidemic diseases, $3.75.
For Quarantine Service, $2.78.
For refunding internal revenue collections, $5.

Mr. WARREN. The section containing the amendment just stated by the Secretary will have to be numbered section 4. I ask that the Secretary may be allowed to renumber the sections, and that the bill may be printed accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will be instructed to correct the section numbers. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 18, to insert:

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY THE AUDITOR FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

For contingencies of the Army, 1918, $5,000.
For Signal Service of the Army, $434.86.
For pay, etc., of the Army, $438,866.44.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, inviting his attention to the bottom of page 49, as to the item of $438,866.44, how such a large deficit was permitted?

Mr. WARREN. I may say that this appropriation includes thousands of little items that have accumulated and are reported in a public document and sent to Congress. All these items are taken up before the proper officers and audited, and we put them in here, giving the number of the document, so that the Senators may see the document, the committee having established the correctness of the items before including the appropriations in the bill. They are simply debts owed by the Government which have been adjudicated, but the money is not in the Treasury for the purpose of meeting them. Some of these claims, in fact the larger portion of them, arise where we make appropriations that are not used up on the 1st of July, when the money goes back into the Treasury, although bills are on the way from the Philippines or from France or other distant points which are payable under the appropriations and should be paid, but can not be paid because of the money having gone back into the Treasury. Hence we have these audited claims provided for in this bill.

Mr. KING. It would not mean, then, that some of the officers of the War Department had made expenditures not authorized by law?

Mr. WARREN. No; nothing of that kind. In fact these items assume the same attitude as judgments of courts, so far as the exactness of the amounts is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the top of page 50, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, I ask to return to the first amendment that was passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment passed over is on page 13, line 22, after the word "abroad," where it is proposed to insert:

Advertising, $1,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that particular amendment is to be considered in connection with the amendment on page 14, which provides as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General shall formulate and promulgate such regulations as will enable persons insured under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act to make payments of premiums at such post offices or branches or stations of post offices as they may designate or to any city letter carrier or rural carrier while on duty. The Post Office Department is hereby authorized and directed to receive sums so tendered in payment of such premiums, and to receive and transmit to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance applications for the reinstatement of lapsed insurance.

Of course, there can be no question about the fact that this provision is new legislation and subject to a point of order. I really do not know that it is necessary to discuss the matter at all, because if there is no question about its being subject to the point of order I will merely make the point of order against the provision.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator is referring to the amendment on page 14.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am referring to that part of the amendment which is on page 14. I take it the chairman of the committee admits that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. WARREN. You mean lines 9 to 19?

Mr. McKELLAR. Lines 9 to 19 on page 14.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the point of order is pressed by the Senator from Tennessee, I simply want to take time enough to let the Senate know really what is intended by this amendment.

It is well known by all Senators that there were some 4,700,000 insurance policies issued to the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Army and Navy. To-day we find that there are less than 1,000,000 of them in force. If we are going to continue the War Risk Bureau, and if we are going to try to issue insurance for the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Army and the Navy, we ought to provide the simplest and most inexpensive means for those soldiers, sailors, and marines to pay their monthly premiums. I know that the director of the bureau claims, whether it be true or not, that the great majority of the 3,700,000 lapses come about from the fact that the soldier does not know where to send his money, he is not prepared to write his letters every month, and there is no place where he can take his money and pay his monthly insurance dues, as would be the case if he were carrying insurance with a regular life insurance company.

Mr. President, there is only one agency and one organization that is in force to-day in the Government of the United States that can take care of this situation without much cost to the Government, and that is the Post Office Department. I am not discussing whether or not it is a good thing to maintain the War Risk Bureau, nor does this amendment have anything to do with that question. But as long as there are at least a million policies in force, and with the hope of the bureau officials that they will be increased threefold, the way to make it as convenient for the soldier to pay his premium as possible is to provide that the soldier has but to drop into any post office in any town or city in the United States designated to receive these premiums, pay his money, and get his receipt. He need send no letters, he receives no letters, he knows that his premium is paid, and there is no question of delay in carrying the mail from where he lives to Washington, passing through the hands of the bureau here, returning the letter to the soldier. Perhaps, he not being home, the receipt is lost in the mail, and other things could happen that would make it very inconvenient for the soldier.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not my colleague think that before inaugurating a policy so radical as that contemplated by this amendment it is important for Congress to decide whether it purposes to continue this war-risk insurance activity longer? If the Senator will pardon me, I received the impression when we passed the war-risk insurance bill that upon the termination of the war a paid-up policy of insurance for a given amount—whatever would be right and just under the tables that obtain in insurance companies—would be given to each soldier and sailor, or that some arrangement would be made with one or more life insurance companies of the United States by which there would be transferred from the Government to such companies the various policies then in force and suitable arrangements would be made for the insurance companies to take the place of the Government, if necessary the Government to pay whatever would be fair for the increased cost that would be incident to the companies carrying and meeting the obligations under the policies. I certainly did not get the idea, and I am sure that many other Senators did not, that the Government was projecting itself into the life insurance business for an indefinite period, and that it purposed to continue to carry these four or five millions of policies as long as any of the persons holding the policies were alive.

It seems to me the first thing for Congress to do is to determine whether it is going to adhere to the plan then announced or whether the Government is to enter the general life insurance business for an indefinite period. Before I would be prepared to vote upon this proposition, which is concededly new legislation, and which, it seems to me, if enacted, would tend to fasten more firmly than ever the insurance business upon the Government, I should like to know what the policy of the Government is going to be.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say in answer to my colleague that the unfortunate thing was that the policy which the Senator has just outlined was not adopted by Congress. Some of us took the position at the time that that should be the policy of the Government, but that the Government should, for the extra risk assumed during the war, see that soldiers were given insurance at the regular insurance rate in peace times, but shortly after the war terminated that the activities of the Government in carrying insurance policies for its discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines would cease. But Congress took the other view and by the legislation has put the Government into the insurance business.

The law specifically provides that the present term insurance can be carried by the insured for a period of five years after peace is declared. Then it also provides that at the end of five years each of the insured has the right to transfer that insurance into forms of insurance carried to-day by the old-line insurance companies.

Mr. President, that is what Congress decided, and in order to change that there must be a repeal of the law. But as long as the law is upon the statute books it is our duty to make the payment of these premiums as convenient to the insured as possible.

Mr. President, I offered this amendment to the bill not only with the view of making it as convenient as possible for the insured, but to make it as inexpensive to the Government as possible. Of course, I recognize that this is general legislation upon an appropriation bill. I am not going to resist any question of its being such, and if the point of order is made against it I expect the Chair to sustain the point of order.

Mr. KING. Without expressing any opinion one way or the other, I ask my colleague whether he thinks that, notwithstanding the legislation to which he has just adverted, which perpetuates these policies for a period of five years, at the expiration of which time some change may then be made, the obligation rests upon the Government to spend a million dollars or more in advertisements setting forth inducements for the further payment of premiums upon lapsed or lapsing policies? Should the Government spend a million dollars or more and incur millions of dollars of expense annually in other directions for the purpose of inducing men to take out insurance or to continue the payment of their premiums from year to year? I express no opinion upon this question, because my information upon the matter is not sufficient to enable me to form an intelligent judgment. I can see some reasons why this should be done, and I can perceive some serious objections to this course. Should it not be a voluntary matter on their part, and should the Government be called upon to induce them to continue their insurance?

Mr. SMOOT. There is only one reason I can give my colleague for the Government of the United States doing it, and that is that if this insurance is carried as Congress intended it would be carried it would in a way prevent in the future our soldiers, our sailors, and our marines from applying for pensions from the Government. It is true that in that same legislation we provided allowances for soldiers who were wounded in service, and in connection with that Congress thought it wise to provide an insurance system, so that in case of death of the insured there would come to the beneficiary an amount which, if reasonably and safely handled, would be sufficient to assist in taking care of his or her absolute necessities of life.

If my colleague were here at that time he would remember that I stated to the Senate then, as my opinion now is, that no matter what the insurance might be, whether a million of them carried insurance or whether five million did so, the time would come when there would be applications made for pensions by the soldiers of the late World War.

The million-dollar advertising is, I think, for the purpose of carrying out a system of advertising following in part the plan adopted in our Liberty loan campaigns. I expect, if we give this appropriation, to see posters in the windows of public buildings, and on the fences along the roadside, advising the soldiers and sailors and marines of the last war to carry life insurance, to reinstate that which has already lapsed. There is no effort upon the part of the director of the bureau to hide the fact that the bureau is going to do everything it can, everything that is in its power, and spend every dollar that the Government will give it, to get all of the soldiers, sailors, and marines who have allowed their insurance to lapse to reinstate it.

Senators must know that the ruling of the Treasury Department made of late, granting the privilege of reinstating insurance allowed to lapse, and do not compel them to pay for the insurance during the months when not carried, but they can take up, at any time now within a given period, the amount of insurance that was originally taken and go on with it just the same as before they permitted the insurance to lapse.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. And every effort will be made to see that every soldier of the war carries the amount of insurance that he had during his service in the war. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. My colleague upon the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SMOOT] serves on other subcommittees than this one, and so did not get one part of the testimony of the War Risk Insurance Bureau Director. It is true, as the Senator says, that the Treasury Department has given out the length of time as, I think, a year within which these men may renew their insurance and take it all up again; but the director, in answer to advice given him by the committee that the Government did not intend to prolong the insurance business as such, and had no interest in undertaking to have men renew who wished to drop their insurance, assured the committee that from now on his only ambition would be, and his labors would only be, to reach everyone at least once, so that a man might know where to communicate his wishes and that he might get a reply. Hence the advertising matter that comes in appears to be useful, that these men may know where and when and how to dispose finally of this insurance matter—whether they will drop it; whether they will convert it into a different kind of policy; or whether they will renew the old policy and go on with that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Cholmeley-Jones, the director of the bureau, has been in my office many times upon this question. Not only that, but the subcommittee of the Finance Committee has before it now a bill that was passed in the House amending the war-risk insurance act so as to extend its provisions to a larger range of beneficiaries. I am perfectly willing that the act should be amended in that regard. It also provides that in case of death insurance shall be paid in one lump sum or in 36 monthly payments. I want to say to the Senate, as was said here by many of the members of the committee not long ago, that the lump-sum payment plan was prohibited in the original act, for the reason that experience shows that wherever an insurance company pays to a beneficiary the full amount of the insurance in a lump sum that within three years' time 92 per cent of all of the beneficiaries are without a dollar of the money received. Congress provided for 240 monthly payments, covering a period of 20 years, during which the beneficiaries of the insured should at least have enough to assist in taking care of their necessary wants. The beneficiary of a soldier carrying insurance of $10,000 under the present act would receive from the Government of the United States $57.50 every month for 20 years. It is now proposed in the bill that has passed the House, and which is before the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, to change that whole system and provide that the full amount of the insurance shall be paid to the beneficiaries of the insured in a lump sum. The reason for that is given by Mr. Cholmeley-Jones, the director of the bureau, that they have to liberalize the act in order to compete with the insurance companies of the country. I know that many of the posts of the American Legion have already passed resolutions in which they indorse the principle of a lump-sum payment. I do not know whether Congress intends to change the policy or not, but I want to say this now, that if the policy is changed it may be of benefit to a very small percentage of the beneficiaries of the insured soldiers, but as to the great bulk of those beneficiaries it will be a decided disadvantage and they will find themselves in a few years after receiving the money with not a single cent of it left.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator what the aggregate sum of these payments will be if they are made in the lump sum?

Mr. SMOOT. Insurance policies run all the way from $2,000 up to $10,000. Ten thousand dollars was the limit under the law, but the average, I will say to the Senator, is about $8,750.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator misunderstood my question. If we pay these amounts in one sum, practically, what will be the drain on the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, here is the statement of the business of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, showing that we have estimated profits of over $17,000,000, and showing what has been done by the bureau, giving the amount of money received and expended. I think it ought to go into the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it go in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want to take the Senator from the floor to have this done, but I think it covers the point very fully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the excerpt referred to by the Senator——.

Mr. SMOOT. That does not cover the point which the question of the Senator from Colorado implied.

Mr. WARREN. He wants to know what the drain is on the Treasury, how much has been paid out.

Mr. SMOOT. There has been no lump sum paid out.

Mr. THOMAS. As I understand the Senator from Utah, the House has passed a bill which is now before a committee of the Senate, which substitutes what is popularly called a lump-sum payment for these annual payments extending over a period of 20 years. If we are to pay these soldiers in that manner the aggregate drain upon the Treasury must be very large, and I wanted to get an approximate idea of the amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to Senators that the discussion has taken rather a wide range on the point of order. The Chair understands that the point of order is still pending and that is the only matter now before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Has any objection been made to a reading of the report as requested by the Senator from Wyoming?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The Chair understands that has been included in the RECORD without objection.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to have it read at the desk. I should like the attention of all Senators to it, because I will confess that, as much as we have seen of our appropriations connected with it, it astonished me when I learned the amount of business they have done. It also covers, I think, to some extent, the inquiries which have been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, October 9, 1919.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Appreciating your keen interest in the war-risk insurance act and the carrying out of that act by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, I think that you may like to have at this time a brief summary of our activities in order that you may be fully informed as to the present situation.

Other than the Members of Congress there are few people who realize the full scope of the war-risk insurance act, and little do they appreciate that within the bureau there are four of the largest businesses of their kind the world has ever known. Our records show, for instance:

A marine and seamen's insurance company—
Doing a total business of	$2,390,080,236.54
With premiums collected amounting to	$47,592,510.61
Having issued policies to the number of	33,384
Paid claims to the extent of	$28,737,146.47
With a surplus over expenses and refunds of	$17,124,903.84
A stupendous banking business—
For the dependents of men in the service making monthly payments of allotments and allowances on 2,057,842 awards during the period of a year and a half exceeding	$526,000,000.00
An employers' liability company—
Now making payments each month on claims for compensation to the extent of	$2,410,271.91
Having paid burial expenses amounting to	$1,834,763.33
The largest insurance company in the world—
Having written during the period of one year and a half 4,561,974 individual policies, representing a total amount of insurance of	$39,817,391,500.00
With premiums between Oct. 6, 1917, and Sept. 30, 1919, of approximately	$233,599,432.95
With claims payable to the extent of	$1,035,958,004.48

Up to June 30, 1919, the cost of administration of the bureau had been approximately $19,000,000, which, as you can see, has been almost entirely covered by the profit of approximately $17,000,000 on the business done under the marine and seamen's feature of the act.

Outsiders who are constantly making statements as to the great expense of maintaining the bureau and the carrying out of the provisions of the war-risk insurance act entirely ignore the fact that up to June 30 the net cost was approximately but $2,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I should not feel justified in even attempting to estimate what the cost would be. I know the Post Office Department is opposed to this amendment, and I am not going to take time to go into the details as to why they are opposed to it or why, in their judgment, it would be a mistake to adopt it.

I desire to say that the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance having the amendment to the existing war-risk insurance act under consideration has not considered the House bill, because there have been representatives from the American Legion, time and time again, who have called upon me, as chairman of that subcommittee, and asked that nothing be done with the bill until after the American Legion meets on November 11 next. I have received a number of letters, however, of late stating that the Secretary of the Treasury thinks that some amendments are quite vital and ought to be enacted into law as quickly as possible. The subcommittee has begun the consideration of that bill and we hope soon to report at least upon the questions as to which there is no particular dispute.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why can not this provision be taken up at that time by the committee and be passed upon in connection with the various other provisions that must necessarily come before the committee in the consideration of the bill? It seems to me that this is a half-baked plan. It so appears on its face; for it provides that "the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General shall formulate and promulgate such regulations as will enable," and so forth; which means that the method of carrying out this provision is left to those two departments. If they do not agree, how are they going to get along? I think the Senator from Utah will agree with me that, however meritorious the proposition contained in the bill may be, as arranged here it is not as it should be. I should think that the Senator would prefer that the matter should come before his committee. I will ask him if that is not correct?

Mr. SMOOT. The subcommittee of the Committee on Finance could take it up and consider it in connection with the bill that is now before them; but I had in mind saving a little money for the Government of the United States. I know I am foolish in contemplating such an effort.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Utah is not only foolish, but he will make himself very unpopular in this body.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah is fully aware of that, because of the fact that the Senator from Colorado has already made himself unpopular in some quarters for trying to do the same thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Utah says that he desires to save the Government money?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. This bill provides that the collection of insurance money shall be taken out of the hands of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. It does not provide for the lessening of the force of the War Risk Insurance Bureau at all, but requires the services of 53,000 postmasters, 35,000 letter carriers, and 41,000 rural carriers.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, the Senator from Tennessee is mistaken about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. It says so on its face.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. And it will necessarily involve the creation of an additional accounting system by the Post Office Department. I say to the Senator from Utah that, instead of saving the Government money, this system, if adopted, will cost the Government many millions of dollars in instituting in a separate department of the Government a coordinate branch of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the discussion is entirely outside of the record.

Mr. McKELLAR. I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has not carefully read the amendment or he would make no such statement as he has made. Not only that, but I desire to say that if the amendment should be adopted there would be no necessity of having 16,500 employees in the War Risk Insurance Bureau in Washington. I desire to say further that it would not cost a single solitary cent outside of the cost of printing of the slips used by the post offices in this country on which to give a receipt for the amount of money collected and the expense that might be incident to the little work that would be done by the postmaster in making out his monthly statement. That would be the expense and nothing more in the field. The Senator from Tennessee does not think for a minute that we intend to pay the postmaster additional compensation for giving six or seven receipts a month?

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I happen to be on a commission that is undertaking to deal with the readjustment of the postal salaries in this country, and I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that if this legislation passes there will be an application made before that commission to increase the salaries of every letter carrier and of every postmaster on account of the increased work of collecting the premiums on war-risk insurance. I am sure the Senator will agree with me that that will be done.

Mr. SMOOT. I guarantee, Mr. President, that there is hardly a rural carrier in any part of the country, outside of a large city—and I think the statement will apply to most of the city carriers—who would collect more than three or four premiums a month.

Mr. McKELLAR. But I would pay for that.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Tennessee says he wants to pay for that; and I say to the Senator that there will be application for an increase of wages in any event. This provision will make no difference; such demands come regularly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Postal employees ought to have an increase of wages where their work is increased.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say in this connection, Mr. President, that of all the employees of the Government of the United States I think the rural carrier is the poorest paid.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is anything they can do more than they are now doing which will justify them receiving a little more salary, I think we should provide it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield, I desire to say that I think that we ought to pay them more salary and not impose more duties upon them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is going to rule that this discussion is all out of order; and is going to hold that the point of order is well taken and sustain it. So the amendment goes out.

Mr. KING. In the committee amendment on page 13, line 22, I move to strike out the figures "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$500,000," so that it will read:

Advertising, $500,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment on page 13, line 22, by striking out "$1,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500,000," so as to read:

Advertising, $500,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment, I shall not withdraw it, and move that the amount be reduced to $250,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I simply desire to make an observation or two. As the Senator knows, this is a committee amendment, and he knows what it will have to go through before it becomes a law. I hope he will not insist upon his motion, but if he does—and I am not going to discuss it at any length—I hope it will be voted down; because, I repeat, the matter has got to go to conference and be considered there. Therefore, I hope that if it goes in at all, it may go in at $1,000,000, and I certainly want it to go in.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me, that I may ask the Senator from Wyoming a question?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming for what this amount is going to be expended? It says for "advertising"; but what kind of advertising? I am not in the fortunate position in which the Senator from Utah is; I do not understand it; and I should like to know what it means.

Mr. WARREN. The mode proposed by the amendment of reaching the men who have been injured seems to be far more economical than the present system of circularizing them.

Mr. McKELLAR. What mode is proposed here?

Mr. WARREN. It is proposed to advertise, under contract with various magazines and papers which reach the remotest quarters of the country, and in that way to convey the necessary information to all the men who may be interested. It is expected that on account of the large volume of such business low figures may be obtained and that it may be possible to cut down vastly the circularization business.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should be very glad, of course, to yield to my distinguished friend from Wyoming; but it seems to me that the amount of $500,000 for this purpose is ample, and that it will accomplish all he desires and designs shall be accomplished. I have no doubt that if we gave five million or ten million dollars it would be expended by the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

I listened to the reading of the laudatory report, written probably by some member——

Mr. WARREN. What was read was simply evidence before the committee prepared under the direction of the head of the bureau, of course.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my statement. It is a laudatory report made by some person in the bureau——

Mr. WARREN. Exactly.

Mr. KING. Desiring to exonerate the bureau from the charges of excessive extravagance and waste that have characterized the administration of the bureau. An an evidence of the fallacies that lie at the base of their calculations, reference is made to profits which were derived from a certain branch of insurance. They do not state what the facts are; that there are obligations to be paid out of that fund which has been accumulated. When those obligations are paid, instead of there being a surplus or profit there will be, of course, a deficit. That is the way that some of these departments and departmental heads and agencies of the Government do. When their profligacy is challenged, they tender figures for the purpose of justifying their extravagance, and misleading Congress and misleading the country. Everybody knows that the War Risk Insurance Bureau has been a scandal in its administration and has come in for the severest criticism at the hands of governmental officials who have investigated it, as well as those who are cognizant of its maladministration.

I wish to say, however, that the present director is attempting to remedy many of the defects, and I have no doubt if he had been in charge in the past, many of the evils of which we have been aware would have been avoided; but it is an extravagant branch of the Government. There has been the grossest kind of incompetency in the administration of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

I insist upon the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

On a division the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. KING. I reserve the right in the Senate to present this amendment again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On line 23, page 13, after the numerals "$75,000" and after the semicolon, the committee proposes to insert:

Addressograph supplies, $161,536.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 4, the committee proposes to strike out "$4,701,640" and to insert "$5,863,176."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is found on page 29, where, after the numerals "$200,000," the committee proposes to strike out the following words:

Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization other than an organization of public officers or any individual other than a public officer for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I dislike very much to disagree with my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations, but I reserved the right in the committee to oppose this proposed amendment.

I believe at this particular time it would be very unfortunate to make the change which has been proposed by the Senate committee. I want to call the attention of the Senate to what this amendment is.

As the bill passed the House, the paragraph under consideration read as follows:

Enforcement of antitrust laws: For the enforcement of antitrust laws, $200,000: Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization other than an organization of public officers or any individual other than a public officer for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

In the first place, let me call the attention of Senators to the fact that in the food bill which has just passed Congress, and which, I believe, is still in the hands of the Chief Executive, we incorporated this provision in Part I of the bill as it passed both Houses:

And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid or make unlawful collective bargaining by any cooperative association or other association of farmers, dairymen, gardeners, or other producers of farm products with respect to the farm products produced or raised by its members upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by them.

If we adopt this amendment in the form that it is proposed by the committee, we simply repeal that law.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, does the Senator think, on reflection, that he is justified in that assertion? Here is an old law—the antitrust act. There is a provision for the enforcement of the antitrust law. The Senator has spoken of a law which this provision does not repeal or obstruct. It is a straight matter of legislation favoring the people of whom he speaks. I think it is hardly supposable that the class of business covered there could by any ordinary construction of language be brought under the enforcement of the antitrust law as the law reads and as it should be construed.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming what would the Attorney General of the United States be obliged to do if there were no provision here stating explicitly that none of this money shall be used for the prosecution of the industries to which I have referred? What would the Attorney General of the United States have to do? We have just passed a law which contains a provision, which I have just read, exempting farm organizations.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator mean to say that he has constituted a trust? This appropriation is for the enforcement of the antitrust law. I do not understand that the Senator has created any trust of farmers in his legislation.

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, no; but that is a question which has been debated ever since the antitrust law was passed. We know that the only trusts that have been successfully prosecuted are these men who get together and form their little associations—dairymen, farmers, and labor men. I know that it applies to the farmers, because there are any number of cases over in the State of Illinois where the dairymen have been prosecuted, thrown into jail, and fined for what they call collective bargaining. The same is true of a number of cases over in the State of Ohio. I will say to the Senator from Wyoming that I know of no case where the Government of the United States has been successful in prosecuting the large trusts.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is certainly mistaken about that.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know about that.

Mr. WARREN. The Government does not succeed in its prosecution of all cases, but quite a large number of violators of the law have been sent to jail and fined heavily.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the adoption of this amendment as reported to the Senate by the committee will not repeal the law referred to by the Senator. This relates to an annual appropriation. If a dollar of this money is not spent between now and June 30, 1920, every cent of it will go back into the Treasury of the United States. Of course, I will say to the Senator, that will not happen; but it does not say what class of individuals or combination of individuals the antitrust law shall be applied against. It is a deficiency created in the department in regard to the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it may be that if there are dairymen, as spoken of by the Senator, who are violating the antitrust laws, a part of this money may be used for their prosecution. It may be that every dollar of this money will be used for the prosecution of some other corporation for violating those laws. Even if the language stricken out were in here, however, it does not say that the money shall not be expended for the enforcement of the antitrust laws, but it would say that none of it should be used for the purpose of prosecuting farmers or those engaged in the lines of industry specified.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. We forget some of the provisions of what is known as the Clayton Act, and I think I should read part of it into the RECORD right here to show that there is no need for this amendment, because, as I understand, the Attorney General could not use this money for this purpose, anyway, under this section.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Section 6 of the Clayton Act says:

That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws.

Mr. GRONNA. Furthermore, it would be unfair to the Attorney General to adopt this amendment. I want to read just a sentence or two from the House hearings, on pages 449 and 450:

The CHAIRMAN. I note you are asking that the following language carried in the present appropriation act for this appropriation be eliminated:

"Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products."

Mr. PALMER. I have no objection to that being eliminated at all. I do not know why that is put in. We simply estimated for the enforcement of the antitrust law $200,000. We did not go into the question of repeating legislation on it. I assume that stays.

The CHAIRMAN. You carried all the provisions except those two provisos, and when that is done the estimate is marked as this estimate is marked for elimination.

Mr. STEWART. The department has never included that language. That legislation is inserted by the committee, and we assumed it would be each time.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not asking the elimination of it?

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. PALMER. No; I voted for it when I was in the House.

Mr. President, the Attorney General, as I understand, is in favor of this language as it is written into the bill by the House.

I have only referred to the farmer. I hold no brief particularly for labor organizations, but I believe that labor is entitled to fair dealing. I believe that if those who labor feel that it is for the interest of labor and in the interest of humanity that they shall form associations, they ought to have a perfect right to do so.

As long as these things are all being done in accordance with law, there is absolutely no reason why we should say that such associations shall not be permitted to organize; and I am very glad that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has called the attention of the Senate to the Clayton Act. There is absolutely no need for striking out this language, because, as the Senator has said, in all probability it could not be used in any event.

Mr. WARREN. Then I ask the Senator, Why need it be put in, as the Clayton Act provides for it?

Mr. GRONNA. We want to make it plain, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. You want to make it plain that we pass a law and then reserve certain industries to which it can not be applied?

Mr. OVERMAN. The question is, Why put it in?

Mr. WARREN. That is what I say.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why strike it out?

Mr. WARREN. Why leave it in? I will tell you why, because it says, openly and aboveboard, that the Congress of the United States, when it passed the law, meant it to apply only to certain individuals and certain interests, and to exclude all the others. That is what it means.

Mr. OVERMAN. You want to make an appropriation for the enforcement of the antitrust law and appropriate $300,000?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; $200,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then you say that you ought to put that in, when you have the Clayton Act here before you?

Mr. WARREN. The Clayton Act is all right, and so is the act the Senator speaks of. But the idea, every time we pass a law, of having the necessity of making a reservation of that kind, does not seem to me to be good legislative practice.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I wanted to ask the Senator from Wyoming, as the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, if it is not a fact that in practically every appropriation bill a provision similar to this has been carried since 1913? Has not this proviso been written into it?

Mr. WARREN. It has at times, and at times it has not.

Mr. HARRISON. Practically speaking, the policy of Congress since 1913 in making appropriations has been to put this proviso in, has it not?

Mr. WARREN. I do not consider it a policy of Congress; no. It may pass it one year and not pass it another.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that in the Sixty-second Congress a similar provision was passed by Congress, and Mr. Taft, who was then President, vetoed it, and both Houses passed it over the President's veto?

Mr. WARREN. That was quite different.

Mr. HARRISON. It was in the same language, was it not?

Mr. WARREN. I think not.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from North Dakota will permit, I should like at this time to insert in the RECORD the exact wording of the proviso that President Taft vetoed.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to inquire if the Clayton Act was on the statute books at the time the President vetoed that bill?

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Clayton Act was passed about six months after President Taft vetoed that measure.

Mr. KING. There is a general act now that exempts these organizations from prosecution under the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. HARRISON. Year by year since then a similar provision has been incorporated in appropriation bills. Here is the way the proviso read at that time:

Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the condition of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Both provisos are practically the same as the proviso in this appropriation bill, and that was passed over the President's veto.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator says, the bill was vetoed, and afterwards the Clayton Act passed, which provides for all that should be provided for in that respect, I think.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not reading from the Clayton Act.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that. I understand what the Senator is reading. He is reading from the bill that was vetoed.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill that was vetoed and passed over the President's veto.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not care to further occupy the time of the Senate, but I simply want to say that this is no time to pass this kind of legislation. I believe that whatever legislation we enact ought to be made plain, not couched in ambiguous language, but in plain language. We know that there is considerable unrest in the country. We also know that these labor and farm organizations can not, by the very nature of things, become monopolies or trusts. I am not now defending either farm organizations or labor organizations when they violate the law. But they should have the right to form their associations to talk matters over, and that applies to labor as well as to farm organizations.

Mr. President, I was impressed with the statement made by a gentleman from Pennsylvania by the name of Miller, who, I believe, is chairman of the dairy association of that State. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to read his statement, but I know that many of those associations to which he referred were being not only prosecuted but persecuted. Of course none of them were convicted, but they were put to a lot of trouble and unnecessary expense.

I want this language so plain that no man can have the right to point his finger at the Attorney General and say that he is not doing his duty, and unless we say, in plain language, that this money shall not be used for the prosecution of these associations; if the Attorney General receives complaints against farm associations, he might have to proceed and prosecute them if he knows that they are getting together and discussing prices, or if labor gets together and talks or discusses wages or advocates associations for the purpose of bettering their conditions, for the purpose of shortening hours or increasing wages, as I understand it, that might be construed to be a violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. President, I for one do not want that to be done, and I do not believe that a majority in the Senate wish that to be done.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am in somewhat the same position as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], being a member of the committee. I voted against this amendment in the committee, and reserved the right to oppose it on the floor of the Senate.

Notwithstanding the provision of the law read by the Senator from North Dakota, notwithstanding the provisions of the Clayton Act read by the Senator from North Carolina, and notwithstanding the provisions of the national defense act, which read as follows:

> That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or other persons with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him, nor to any retailer"— > that any accumulating or withholding by any farmer or gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or any other person, of the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be hoarding within the meaning of this act.

And so forth; and notwithstanding the reading of the provisions of section 6—

The fact is that prosecutions have been brought against organizations of farmers.

I had a wire the other day advising me of a suit that had been brought, and called the matter to the attention of the Attorney General to get the facts upon which the suit had been based. He advised me that his office had not been informed and therefore could not give me the information. I do not know the facts in the case, but I do know that these organizations have been threatened with prosecution. They have been organized under the law. They must deal with large corporations. They must deal with millers and elevator men who have a monopoly of the trades in their neighborhoods, and they have organized all over Kansas, North and South Dakota, and other agricultural States, to protect themselves. They have organized under the law. They had a right to organize, and I claim that no part of this appropriation should be used to prosecute those men, and I hope this amendment may be defeated. They have not organized in restraint of trade, and they have no desire to create a monopoly; they have formed associations and organized in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator if he does not, from his statement, believe that the trust law ought either to be repealed or amended so that we would not have to protect them in every item of appropriations, which, of course, should call for only money to carry the laws out as they stand on the statute books?

Mr. CURTIS. I think if the Clayton law were liberally construed there would be absolutely no necessity for such provisions as these. But, notwithstanding the Clayton Act, they are prosecuting these associations of farmers. What I want is that these men be protected; that the Attorney General be notified time and again, if necessary, that these men who have organized to protect themselves, as they must, shall not be prosecuted under this law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I did not hear all that the Senator from Kansas said; but for information, and in order to get the point of view of the Senator, I should like to know whether the Senator is contending that if farmers, or any other class of people, acting in their individual capacity or as corporations, should organize for the purpose of restraining trade and commerce and for the purpose of creating a monopoly, they ought to be exempt from prosecution?

Mr. CURTIS. No. But these people do not organize for that purpose. They are endeavoring to obtain fair and reasonable prices. But, notwithstanding that fact, they are prosecuted or are threatened with prosecution.

Mr. KING. I do not know, of course, to whom the Senator is referring.

Mr. CURTIS. I believe the people who do organize for the purpose of creating a monopoly and for the sole purpose of increasing prices should be prosecuted. But I believe the men who organize in small trading centers—farming communities, where there is little or no competition—to handle their own grain, to handle their own cream, and to handle their own butter, ought to be exempted from prosecution under this act or any other act.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator, I agree with his position. May I inquire of the Senator further, suppose a large number of communities organize for the purpose of creating a monopoly and then extend their operations so as to embrace a State, or a number of States, and they then fix the price of butter, or cheese, or other farm products, and do create a monopoly, and their organization is such as to constitute a restraint of trade. I am curious to know whether the Senator thinks that such combination would come under the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, if they organize all over the country and created a monopoly, they would come under the antitrust law. But these are not large organizations. They only apply to small communities, where they have no competition. In some places the markets are not good, they have poor railroad facilities, there is only one organization there to buy their products, and that organization fixes the price, and the farmers are helpless. They must organize to protect themselves against those who have no competition and who buy and control the market, as they do in many communities. I know of cases in my own State where there was paid a difference of 10 to 20 cents a bushel for wheat at stations within 10 miles of each other. Should not the farmers there, when they were being robbed of 10 or 20 cents a bushel, be permitted to organize, build an elevator, and hold their wheat until they could get a fair and reasonable price for their products?

One farmer could not compete with a big elevator, but 5, 6, 10, 20, or 30 of them could.

Mr. KING. I was expressing no opinion. I was interested in finding out where the Senator would draw the line between a big trust and a little trust, a large combination in restraint of trade and a little combination in restraint of trade.

Mr. CURTIS. The farmers have not organized in restraint of trade. I might state, in further answer to the Senator's question, that the last two lines of the amendment read:

> And organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

This is all they ask, and they are entitled to this protection, and it is this amendment in behalf of the farmers that is proposed to be stricken out. I hope the amendment may be defeated.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows, of course, that the Clayton Act contains a provision which legalizes all the organizations for which the Senator is contending, and prohibits any prosecution against them.

Mr. CURTIS. I know that is true. But I stated, in the opening of my remarks, that notwithstanding the Clayton Act, notwithstanding the national-defense act of August, 1917, notwithstanding the act read by the Senator from North Dakota, prosecutions are now pending. As I stated, I had a wire of a prosecution, called the matter to the attention of the Attorney General, and he was unable to give me the facts, because no report had been made to his department.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit the suggestion, perhaps those who initiated the prosecution thought they were going beyond the provisions of the Clayton Act; that they were charging more than a fair price; that their organization was not for the purpose of obtaining fair prices for their products, but was for the purpose of obtaining an unfair price for their products.

Mr. CURTIS. Then why should any Senator object to a provision in this bill which says they can only hold out for a fair and reasonable price?

Mr. KING. I am making no argument in respect to that. I am merely trying to find out what the views of the Senator were as to when an organization would become a monopoly and when it was not a monopoly. The thought also occurred to me that if there is a statute already upon the books which protects the organizations for which the Senator is speaking, as I understand him to admit that there is, how can that statute be affected by the measure which is now under consideration? It does not propose to repeal that law.

Mr. CURTIS. Up to date it does not seem to have protected it. That is the point I am making.

Mr. KING. Would it protect it any more by merely reaffirming the statute?

Mr. CURTIS. It shows a desire to prevent the use of any part of this money for the purpose of bringing a prosecution against farmers' organizations, which were organized solely for the purpose of obtaining fair and reasonable prices.

The Attorney General stated before the House committee that he would obey this provision if it were put in the act and we ask that the committee amendment be defeated so the provision may be retained in the act and that the associations of farmers may cooperate and organize, and in that way secure reasonable prices for their products.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I merely want to express, on my own behalf, a complete approval of the views which are being expressed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and to say that I am altogether in sympathy with them. The big combinations are not really controlled by the antitrust law. They are flagrantly carrying out now their monopolistic plans throughout the country, and that contributes largely to the high cost of living. The big organization which can bring within its own hands the purchasing of products raised by the farmers can absolutely exercise control over those prices to the injury of those who produce and thereby discourage production in this country, just exactly as the American Tobacco Trust could, by setting such low prices on tobacco that at last they drove people into absolute revolution.

The thing that we ought to do in this country is to go far beyond what the Senator is now trying to do, to protect these little producers against injury and harm from failure of administration of some officer who does not know enough to draw a line of discrimination between the two. We have to go far beyond that. We have got to put a limitation upon these monopolies in this country as to the extent they can tax the people of the country under the powers which they are permitted to exercise under the laws as they exist. I think the Sherman antitrust law might as well be wiped off the statute books for all the good it does.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I notice that in the Sixty-second Congress, on March 4, 1914, when the veto message of the President came before the House for consideration and the passage of the bill over his veto, the present Attorney General was at that time a Member of the House, and that he voted to override the President's veto with this provision in the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that he made that statement in the hearings.

Mr. HARRISON. I call to the attention of the Senator also the fact that on this provision in the House there were only 30 votes against it and 201 for it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, some days ago, in discussing a proposition somewhat analogous to the one presented by this amendment, I inserted in the RECORD the veto message of President Taft to the first appearance of the proviso which is here under discussion and which has appeared in every appropriation bill since that time which makes appropriations for the enforcement of the antitrust laws. That message came to the Senate on the last day of the life of the Sixty-second Congress, and of course could not be acted upon here; hence the bill died with all other unfinished business of the Congress. It made its appearance at the special session which was called by President Wilson for April, when the appropriation bill, which had failed of passage, was renewed. It came from the House with this proviso and was here opposed by a very small minority of Senators under the leadership of the late lamented senior Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Gallinger. President Wilson signed the bill and took occasion to state—I will not say that he said he regarded the proviso as unconstitutional, but while he regarded it as unlawful, he realized that unless he signed the bill it would again fail, and he therefore concluded to sign it, because there was plenty of money in the previous appropriation for the prosecution of violations of the antitrust law to make it practically ineffective. In other words, two Presidents of the United States, one a Republican and the other a Democrat, have officially voiced the opinion that the proviso was unconstitutional. I mention both these circumstances lest it might appear that the opposition to the appearance of this sort of legislation in a congressional enactment was based upon some partisan motive or purpose. Such is not the case.

I have objected, Mr. President, to this proviso wherever it has appeared, and because I have been unable to make that objection effective I have felt it to be my duty to vote against every measure containing it. My objection to it has nothing whatever to do with the classes which it affects, with the need for it, if need there be, or with the manner in which the antitrust laws have been executed.

If the exception related to any other class of people, if, instead of relating to classes, it were confined to sections, my objection would be the same. It consists in the fact that, under this sort of legislation, the general laws of the country are made to apply to only certain sections of the people, while other sections are expressly excluded from its operation.

Now, I contend that it is beyond the power of the Congress of the United States, however great its authority, to enact general legislation and make it applicable to only a part of the people of the country. It has been done a great many times; in fact, I think such legislation has disfigured the legislative history of the United States ever since the close of the Civil War. Privileges have been extended many times, and improperly, to corporate influences, combinations, and to vested interests. I shall not attempt to specify any particular ones at this time. Suffice it to say that I always condemned them long before I was honored with a seat in the Senate.

Fundamentally it is undemocratic and in practice it is a violation of the political cry, because that is all it now amounts to, of "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." Class legislation disfigured the action of Congress in behalf of vested interests so long as vested interests were politically more powerful than any other. Class legislation has disfigured our action since vested interests ceased to be more powerful and other interests and combinations have taken their places. But the principle is vicious in either case, and it is one which in my judgment has more to do with the present unsatisfactory condition of the country than any other single element, with the exception of the effect of the war itself upon the human race.

Let me read this proviso:

> For the enforcement of antitrust laws, $200,000: Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization other than an organization of public officers or any individual other than a public officer for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Let me say, Mr. President, at the outset that if any attempts were made to use or if any use were actually made of this appropriation for the purpose of prosecuting such organizations as are included in the proviso, it would be unlawfully used, since the character of organizations there cited is not and can not under any circumstaces constitute a violation of the antitrust law. Men have the right to associate, to combine, if you please, for the purpose of doing everything which is mentioned in the proviso, and by so doing they violate no law whatever, so far as I know, either State or National.

The difficulty with this proviso, Mr. President, is not in what it recites but in what it actually accomplishes. Section 6 of the Clayton Act, which I opposed, is harmless as regards its phraseology, but under its operation have grown up enormous aggregations of men frequently engaged in conspiracies against trade, as exemplified by Nation-wide strikes, against which the Government can not lift a finger or does not lift a finger, because of the exemption from the Clayton law of these classes of society.

We are face to face with a threatened strike of the employees of all of the bituminous coal mines of the country. The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] took occasion this morning to address the Senate upon that all-important subject and very graphically outlined not only the probabilities of this Nation-wide calamity but its consequences. Needless to say, both of them are appalling, as both of them are un-American and unjust. There 446,000 men, engaged in a great basic industry, protected by the provisions of the Clayton anti-trust law, meet in convention, announce terms under which they will continue their employment, instruct their leaders to call a strike upon a day to be fixed; and they can do so, so far as regards any lawful remedy, with absolute impunity. In every other department of life, responsibility goes with power; amenability to law is the inevitable condition of the exercise of a business right or pursuit. We require capital to organize; we give it privileges of incorporation that are just as pernicious and have been the source of just as much abuse as any other privileges founded on legislation; but there is an element of responsibility, since if my business is ruined by a process that is forbidden by law I can summon my adversary into court, and, if I can prove my case, I can secure a judgment, and that judgment will be in whole or in part my reimbursement. But the suffering inflicted upon the members of my family by an organization which I have never injured, consequent upon the shortage in coal during the winter season, and which comes not only to mine but to every family in the United States, however serious it may be and however long continued, carries with it absolutely no remedy whatever, since, under the laws of our country, those engaged in that sort of a conspiracy against trade are not even required to incorporate.

So I say, Mr. President, it is not the phraseology of a proviso like this, but the construction that is placed upon it, and the things done under it, that make it formidable and which would require the repeal of both, by which I mean the proviso in this bill and the exemption found in the Clayton Act. I say again that associations of men designed to better their condition, to bring about "collective bargaining," if you please, can be formed, and all those activities of men, short of conspiracies against trade, can be exercised in this country, always have been and always will be.

It is the carving out of a class—I care not what that class may be—and making it immune from the operations of the general statute, I repeat, that has been the prolific source of industrial and social evils in this country for the last 50 years. The thing itself is what I oppose, whether the moving cause of the thing comes from the one or the other direction, whether it comes from the vested interests or from associations of men. In each instance the great public is the sufferer; in each instance the laws are brought into disrespect; and in each instance the impulse is furnished for further class legislation, either exempting other elements from the operation of general law or increasing the privileges already enjoyed by those who are so fortunate.

Mr. President, if this proviso should read that "no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization in the States of North Dakota and Colorado," no Senator within the sound of my voice would hesitate for a moment in characterizing it as class legislation and in voting aganst it; but there is no more difference, in legal effect, between such an exemption and the one which is set forth in the proviso itself.

If we should enact a law against highway robbery—and perhaps the activities of the Federal Government will extend that far very soon—and then exempt from its operation all of the red-headed men and women of the country, no one for a moment would hesitate in pronouncing it class legislation, yet such a statute would differ not a whit from the one which now confronts us.

I do not want to see any small organization of any sort engaged in the very credible task of promoting the interests of its members subject to prosecution by the Attorney General or by anybody else; and if it be true, as stated by the Senator from Kansas, that such prosecutions now exist, then it is equally true that this proviso, if it be not stricken out, will not protect such organizations, for they are being prosecuted under statutes containing this proviso, thus showing that it is not operative.

I know that producers in this country have or have had a hard time; there is no question about that. I know that organizations of some kind are necessary for their well-being, because when one part of the community organizes for a certain purpose, aimed at the rest of the community, they also must organize as a counter-defense. Such local organizations should be encouraged along every legitimate line that will promote their welfare and, through such promotion, contribute to the general welfare. But, Mr. President, there are organizations and organizations. Those which were referred to by the Senator from North Dakota are those that should be encouraged; those which are immune and must be immune, regardless of this proviso, are those which will be prosecuted, as I have just stated, if they are to be prosecuted at all, whether this proviso is in the bill or not.

Only last week there was an announcement in the public press by some gentleman who declared that he represented an organization consisting of 40 per cent of all the farmers in the United States in which he outlined a national program. I read that program with a great deal of interest. While I may be mistaken, I am free to confess that if it is carried out it is apt to prove quite as objectionable to the consumers of this country—to the great mass of the people—as is the present steel strike. That is the sort of an organization, Mr. President, that should be but is not included in the Clayton Act; that is the sort of an organization that will escape under the practical application of provisos like this; while those with which Senators are concerned will, independently of the law, continue as they have before; in other words, the public construction given to these exceptions, the practical operation of affairs under them, is to give immunity to the huge organizations that are quite as apt to interfere with the normal flow of business and of ordinary affairs as are institutions which are known as combinations of capital. If 40 per cent of all the agriculturists of the United States lay down a national program which virtually demands the nationalization of what they call the national resources of the country—which, in my judgment, necessarily includes every farm in the United States—and then place the force of the organization behind it, and, by the power which that organization represents, virtually defy the antitrust laws of the country, then their success is absolutely certain, especially in view of the other consideration that there is no corresponding responsibility.

Mr. President, it has been said by one of the Senators who preceded me that this is no time to change laws; that this is not an occasion for interfering with or altering those conditions which have prevailed in the last few years. I wish I could agree with that view of things. My mind would be a great deal easier. My own view is that inasmuch as every day now brings us face to face with the consequences of our past legislation, inasmuch as the events of every week demonstrate the power of individual organizations, and bring forcibly to us, either by object lessons in existence or those which are sure to come, what they can accomplish, and propose to accomplish, under the special privileges and exemptions given to them by the statutes of the United States, now is the time of all times to wipe these excrescenses from our statute books, and get back to the good old level where all legislation was designed for the benefit or the punishment of every citizen, high and low, of every man and woman in the United States, of all classes and conditions of men.

Mr. President, the consumers, the noncombatants in this country, the men upon whose shoulders rests the burden of taxation, the people who have to pay for every rise in the cost of living, constitute 90 per cent of the people of the United States, and they are entitled to a little consideration at the hands of their representatives in the two Houses of Congress. They are not very well organized; they may never be; but their resources are not absolutely inexhaustible, and when they break the Nation breaks. When the burden becomes so great that they stagger under it and fall, the Nation falls, and all of these classes whose favor we so earnestly seek and whose votes we need so badly will cease to be classes, because the Nation itself will have undergone collapse.

The papers announced a day or two ago that the fares upon the traction lines of Washington were to be increased 40 per cent after the 1st of November—that is to say, from 5 to 7 cents. The 1st of November is getting to be the most attractive day in the calendar. All the coal mines are going to stop, and city fares are going to be raised 40 per cent. What else will happen I suppose will be announced in due season. The man riding to his business and back home, paying two fares per day, will have his general expense increased $14.60 every year. One of the companies is prosperous, paying dividends, I understand, and has asked for no increase, but it gets it just the same. The other seems to be a bankrupt concern, water-logged with over-issues of stock and bonds, trying to keep out of the hands of the receiver, and has appealed to the commission for help, and the commission has finally concluded to give it, but at the expense of the consuming public. It is an outrage, and it is one of these outrages that are spread as thin as possible, and then spread over the whole community. The man who pays 2 cents additional pays but little attention to it at the time, but every day means an aggregate increase of revenue to these companies of thousands upon thousands of dollars. That is but one of the little things that are placed upon the broad backs of the consuming public, due to the increasing demands from these classes protected by our statutes from any of the consequences to which others are exposed.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate of the United States will have the courage to begin right here and strike out this legislation. I have no doubt that it is true, as stated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], that many violations of the antitrust law by some of the corporations of the country either have not been prosecuted, or have not been properly prosecuted. I think there is no doubt about that; but, Mr. President, that may be a fact and at the same time constitute a very poor argument. It is a fact, unquestionably, but I am unable to apply it to the consideration of this question. The remedy is not to continue an exception, thereby creating a favored class, but to ascertain why the law is not enforced against everybody, and if there be reasons why it is not so enforced which we can ascertain and remove, then that is the legislative course which the Senate and the House should pursue.

The House, Mr. President, when this question came before it, by a viva voce vote struck out this proviso, and then some one demanded a record vote. If there is anything that the average Senator or Congressman likes to dodge on anything of this sort, it is a record vote. Nobody takes account of the viva voce vote, but when a man's name is called he has either got to vote or run, and when the viva voce vote was called for upon it the amendment was overwhelmingly defeated in the House.

That, Mr. President, was not an entirely creditable performance. If the House were not a body of equal power and dignity with this, I should speak of it in more expressive terms. It is not only not a creditable performance, but it is not an unusual performance. It happens many times. I am told that when the Congress increased the salaries of its own Members, an arrangement was very carefully made whereby a record vote was avoided. Every Senator and Member wanted the extra $2,500, but he did not want to go on record as wanting it. Consequently refuge was taken in the viva voce vote. Now, that may be successful, but it is not manly. It may be politics, but it is not right. We either should do here what we are willing to face our constituencies with or not do it.

So far as I am concerned, I am not particular how the vote is taken upon this particular amendment, so long as it is successful. I have gone on record a number of times concerning it, and I am quite willing to go on record again. I repeat that it is the beginning or the effort to begin the right legislative course, and do away with this unfortunate practice of listening to special privilege whispering in our ears from all sources and becoming more and more successful as time passes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Committee on Appropriations has acted wisely in proposing this amendment to the pending bill. The House provision temporarily, so far as this appropriation is concerned, suspends our trust laws. It does indirectly what Congress ought to have the courage to do directly, if it is right to have class legislation. I will not consent with my vote to enforce laws against one class of the people and not against the others. The antitrust laws are good laws, and they should be either enforced impartially or repealed. Senators do not dare to repeal them, but seem not to hesitate to provide for a partial enforcement of them. It is proposed by the House provision to make an appropriation for enforcing the Sherman antitrust law and then to provide that the money shall not be used in enforcing it in certain cases. This procedure brings about a contempt for law. It is simply a recognition of class distinctions, and we are suffering to-day more from that fact than from almost any other.

I believe it is true that a great many of the organizations that are established by farmers are perfectly innocuous, are entirely helpful, and, in my judgment, do not violate any law; but if they do, then those laws ought to be amended, and it ought to be done directly. If the laws prevent desirable combinations by either farmers or laborers or manufacturers, then they should be amended so as to permit good combinations, and I know there are such, and they should be encouraged. I am ready to revise the trust laws, but am not willing to permit favoritism in their enforcement. But no Senator uninfluenced by political considerations, it seems to me, can stand in this Chamber and advocate a law for one class of the people which is not applicable to all of them. If you want to encourage class antagonism and class distinction you can encourage it no more than by this kind of legislation.

I have opposed this character of exceptional legislation ever since I have been in Congress, because it has seemed to me to be instrumental in creating the most serious wrongs and the greatest dangers. But this House provision is not intended to relieve the farmers of the country. They are put into this as a sop in an effort to make it more popular and respectable. I know that the farmers themselves do not want to do anything that is contrary to the public welfare. They are public-spirited, and if proper organizations are denied existence by the existing antitrust laws, I repeat that those laws should be amended. But I submit that it is an improper and a cowardly thing to do to exempt from a general law certain classes of our people and permit them, if that is what they are seeking—and I deny that is what farmers are seeking—to do things which would be unlawful for others to do.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, does not that always form a direct invitation really to attempt to go in opposition to the Clayton Act when we specifically and directly exempt them? Is it not more or less by inference an invitation that they can go ahead without fear of prosecution?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think it is. I have no doubt about it myself. Such exemptions as these in the past have not been of benefit to labor. I believe that they have been injurious to it, and I am sure that any special provision now for any class of our people will result in injury rather than benefit. The country is suffering from lawlessness. Why encourage the evil?

I have no doubt this amendment will be defeated if a vote is taken on it. Very many amendments of this character have been defeated, and I think Senators who have cast votes on similar provisions in the past have realized that an injury rather than a benefit was done, especially to the people as a whole. If a thing is wrong for one man to do, it is wrong for all men to do it, and honest men are not demanding special privileges.

Mr. President, I have understood that there were some bills being considered for the purpose of making a distinction between the efforts of people who are operating under the provisions that would be affected by the Sherman antitrust law, or the Clayton law, so as to classify combined activities and separate those which are clearly beneficial from those which ought to be prohibited. Will it be contended that any act which labor might do, or which farmers might do, however detrimental to the public welfare, would be perfectly lawful and ought to be exempted from the operations of the general law? I do not think the farmers themselves want any such provision adopted. I have not been notified by any of my farmer constituents that they want this exemption from a general statute. They want only their legitimate rights, and if any statute denies them these it should be repealed. When they want legislation they will ask for it, and we can consider it upon its merits and not sidetrack the issue by an exemption in an appropriation bill affecting a law which should be universal in its application.

So, Mr. President, I shall vote for the committee amendment, believing it is proper and consistent with an honest effort to serve all the people of the United States impartially. Many times have class legislation and partial enforcement of laws risen to plague the country. Can Congress afford to add to this trouble? If the people's representatives would serve their constituents with the same zeal that they employ in looking after their individual political fortunes the distance between capital and labor, between the masses and the classes, would be lessened and a greater respect for law would exist.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 29, on which the yeas and nays are requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUM-

BER] to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I wish to announce that I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded,

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who is absent on official business. He is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has not voted. As I have had for many years a standing pair with that Senator, I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]; and

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. KING. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent on account of illness in his family. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are absent on public business.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Borah	Kellogg	New	Smoot
Calder	King	Page	Sterling
Chamberlain	Knox	Phipps	Thomas

Gerry	McCumber	Robinson
Gore	McLean	Shields

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have an amendment, which I send to the desk. It is a slight matter. We will have to reconsider one amendment in order to insert the word "agent" in place of the word "clerk."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was heretofore agreed to will be reconsidered. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, in line 18, strike out the word "clerk" and insert in lieu thereof the word "agent."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment and ask to have it read.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That no money, now, heretofore, or hereafter appropriated by the Congress for the pay, salaries, or maintenance of the Metropolitan police department of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, shall be paid to any member, officer, policeman, or patrolman of such force or such department of the District of Columbia who shall be a member of any organization of policemen or patrolmen which is affiliated, directly or indirectly, with any other labor organization or any branch or body of organized labor; and that the auditor of the District of Columbia and the Auditor of the Treasury Department and all other auditors and auditing officials of the United States Government be, and are hereby, ordered, directed, and commanded not to audit or approve any claims, warrants, or vouchers for services by any such member, officer, policeman, or patrolman under such circumstances; and that the Treasurer of the United States and all other officials are hereby ordered, directed, and commanded not to pay or cash any claim, warrant, or voucher of any such member, officer, policeman, or patrolman under such circumstances.

That all auditing and disbursing officials of the District of Columbia and of the United States Government shall be governed in the matters and orders herein set forth, made, and provided by such action in the premises as may be taken and such notice as may be given by the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia and it shall be the duty of such board to notify and keep informed all necessary auditing and disbursing officials of the District of Columbia and of the United States, from time to time, of the names of all such members, officers, policemen, and patrolmen of such police department or such police force as may be members of any such organization of policemen as is herein described and prescribed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I feel that it is my duty, as chairman of the committee, to make a point of order against the amendment, but I wish to say that I am entirely in sympathy with the object stated, and if it were on some bill that contained legislation I would not make the objection. It is not a matter that can be considered in a deficiency appropriation bill, and I am therefore compelled to make the point of order against it.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to say a word about the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. I withhold the point of order for that purpose.

Mr. MYERS. I have given that question some thought. It occurs to me that the amendment does not change existing law, but is merely a limitation upon the expenditure of money appropriated by Congress. I have always understood that it is permissible to put an amendment upon an appropriation bill which is merely a limitation upon the expenditures of moneys appropriated by Congress. That is my understanding of the rule, and I think this is merely a limitation upon the expenditure of money appropriated by Congress. For that reason I have been of the opinion that it would not be out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any appropriation in the bill providing pay for the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia?

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say that that is the particular point on which I base my point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no appropriation for the Metropolitan police?

Mr. WARREN. There is not. I renew my point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. If there had been an appropriation for that purpose in the bill, the amendment would be in order.

Mr. POMERENE. I send to the desk the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

Natural-gas supplies of the Northern Appalachian States: For the investigation of the stage of exhaustion, the amounts remaining available in the ground, and the probable life of the natural-gas fields tributary to the cities of Ohio, western New York, western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and eastern Kentucky, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $15,000, to be expended under the direction of the Director of the United States Geological Survey.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should be glad to vote for a bill which carries that item, if it came as a separate measure, but I am compelled to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Will not the Senator withhold the point of order for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. I will withhold it while the Senator addresses the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as everyone familiar with the subject knows, there is considerable gas territory in Ohio and West Virginia and western Pennsylvania. A large portion of our industrial cities are supplied with natural gas, not only for industrial purposes but for housekeeping purposes. Franchises are granted by the different municipalities to different companies. There has been a good deal of difference of opinion as to what price should be paid for the gas, and during the last 10 years, to my certain knowledge, there have been different representations as to the amount of natural-gas territory and the supply which can be produced, not only at the present time but in future years. As a result, many of the cities are uncertain as to what ought to be done.

This proposed amendment simply asks for a preliminary survey. I have taken up the subject with the United States Geological Survey, and they advise me that they have no funds now whatever with which to have the survey made. Similar surveys have been made in the past in the Texas-Oklahoma territory and the Kansas territory, possibly in some others, and the information which they have gathered, while not mathematically certain, of course, has been of very great value to those communities.

I hope the Senator can see his way clear not to insist on the point of order. I hope he will consent to have the amendment adopted. It will no doubt go to conference; and if any reason occurs to Senators then why it should not be permitted to remain in the bill, of course I shall make no objection, but I make an appeal now to the good nature of the chairman of the committee and ask him to let it go in the bill under these circumstances.

Mr. WARREN. It is not a matter of good nature at all. It is a mere matter of a construction of the rules of the Senate. I have no pleasure but really have pain in insisting upon the point of order.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator smiles when he says he has pain. I am very sorry he feels that he must make this objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must sustain the point of order if it is made. It is not estimated for.

Mr. POMERENE. I observe an expression of pain on the face of the Vice President at the same time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer an amendment. On page 19, between lines 23 and 24, I move to insert the following:

For extra and special services performed by a United States district attorney, Clarence L. Reames, of Portland, Oreg., in the prosecution of certain cases in the northern district of California and in the western district of Washington, pursuant to the request of the Attorney General, during the years 1916 and 1917, $2,000.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say to the Senator offering the amendment that that was considered in the committee, and there was some question whether it should go in or not. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator wishes, to let it go in the bill and go to conference.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have it go to conference, because I am satisfied the Attorney General will recommend it, in view of statements that he has already made about it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

RESERVATIONS TO TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to have printed a number of suggested compromise reservations for the treaty of peace. These represent efforts of the different Senators to get together on some line of reservations on which a majority could agree.

As is well known, I think, no one claims to-day that the treaty can go through without reservations. It is necessary to secure 64 votes to put the treaty through. In order to secure those 64 votes it is necessary that some reservations be agreed upon. Those which I present, while not being reservations that have been agreed upon in every respect and in each detail, do represent the effort to agree of those who might be called mild reservationists and those who desire most radical reservations. I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD of the proceedings of to-day, so that we may have them before us during the consideration of this matter to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in addition to printing them in the RECORD, would it not be well to have them printed as bills are printed, and laid on the desks of Senators?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection, if the Senator wishes that done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). The reservations will be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask that the reservations offered by the Senator from North Dakota may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed reservations being read? The Chair hears none.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, before that is done I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether we are to understand from his statement that he is offering these reservations not only on his own behalf but on behalf of other Senators who have agreed to them?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will scarcely say that, Mr. President. Many of them we have agreed upon. To others there are some slight objections, I will say, upon my own part and some on the part of others. These represent rather the effort to get together, perhaps, as nearly as we shall be able to get together until we may decide the matter in the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have no objection to their being read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed reservations.

The Secretary read as follows:

SUGGESTED COMPROMISE RESERVATIONS.

CONCERNING WITHDRAWAL.

CONCERNING ARTICLE 10.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military and naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military and naval forces of the United States, shall, by act or joint resolution, so declare.

CONCERNING DOMESTIC QUESTIONS.

3. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its internal affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not, under this treaty, submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

CONCERNING THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

4. The United States does not bind itself to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which, in the judgment of the United States, depends upon or involves its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine. Said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said league of nations; and it is preserved unaffected by any provision in said treaty contained.

CONCERNING SHANTUNG.

5. The United States refrains from entering into any agreement on its part in reference to the matters contained in articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action in respect to any controversy which may arise in relation thereto.

CONCERNING VOTE OF DOMINIONS (WHERE NEITHER PRINCIPAL COUNTRY NOR DOMINION IS PARTY TO DISPUTE).

6. The United States reserves the right, upon the submission of any dispute to the council or the assembly, to object to any member and its self-governing dominions, dependencies, or possessions having in the aggregate more than one vote; and in case such objection is made the United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, finding, or decision in which such member and its said dominions, dependencies, and possessions have in the aggregate cast more than one vote.

CONCERNING VOTES OF DOMINIONS (WHERE PRINCIPAL COUNTRY OR DOMINION IS PARTY TO DISPUTE).

7. That the United States understands and construes the words "dispute between members" and the words "dispute between parties," in article 15 to mean that a dispute with a self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in the assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein and that a dispute with such dominant or principal member is a dispute with all of its self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies; and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in the last paragraph of said article will cover not only the dominant or principal member, but also its dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, so that these reservations that have been offered in the form of resolutions may all appear in the RECORD together, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD, following the proposed reservations, the reservations presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on behalf of the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee, the reservations heretofore offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] on September 15, the reservations and amendments suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] on June 12, the reservations of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] under date of June 9, the reservations of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] on October 2, and the reservations of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] under date of August 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that all of these reservations be printed in one document and laid on the desks of Senators in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. POMERENE. If it is the purpose of the Senate to reprint these reservations it seems to me that all of them should be reprinted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think they ought to be reprinted together and laid upon the desks of Senators.

Mr. POMERENE. Some reservations were offered by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that they have already been printed.

Mr. POMERENE. I know; but it is proposed here to reprint them.

Mr. MCKELLAR. They ought to be printed in the RECORD also, and I do not understand that the Senator's request would exclude them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all. They have already been ordered printed in the RECORD.

Mr. POMERENE. Also, certain reservations were presented by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I think those were prepared, perhaps, by former Justice Hughes; and I think, as I now recall, that certain reservations were presented by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have here the reservations suggested by Mr. Hughes and presented by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] under date of July 24. I present them to accompany the unanimous-consent request. I also present the reservations offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] under date of October 11, and ask that they take the same course.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if these reservations are to be printed, I ask that all the reservations which have been proposed and not merely a part of them be printed and laid on the desks of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the suggestion as first made was to have all these reservations printed in the RECORD. Now, there seems to be another suggestion, that they shall all be printed as one document and laid on the desks of Senators. Is that the idea?

Mr. CURTIS. My request applies to the document which is to be laid on the desks of Senators.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that if we are going to put them all together as a document it would be sufficient for every Senator to have them all together in that form. All of them, I think, have been printed in the RECORD already. What the Senators want is to have them handy, so that they can get to them at once. If they are published in a document, that is the proper way and the best way for Senators to see all of the reservations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to including these reservations in the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator making the request if he will not change it so as to have them printed as a document?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I thought they ought to be printed in both ways, for this reason: The document is only immediately available to Senators until it is mailed out, while anything that appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD goes to the country, and gives everyone the benefit of the comparison of the various reservations. That was my object.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I recognize that fact, and I will say to the Senator that I understand that all of them have already been printed in the RECORD; but if the Senator really thinks that it is necessary, and as we are paying no attention anyhow to what we put in the RECORD, I have not any objection if the Senator desires to have it done.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think at the present time it is becoming more important than it was at the time they were offered.

Mr. SMOOT. It is understood, then, that all of the reservations of every kind and character shall be printed not only in the RECORD but also in document form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the reservations, and then that all the reservations shall not only be included in the RECORD, but that they shall be printed as one document and laid on the desks of Senators. Does the Chair hear any objection?

Mr. PITTMAN. Also in the RECORD and in this one document.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall this suggestion reach to printing these reservations as a public document—the Chair presumes, a Senate document? What is the pleasure of the Senate on that question?

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to request that they be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I requested that they be printed as a Senate document and laid on the desks of Senators, so that Senators can compare them and examine them without having to refer to the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The only difference seems to be that Senate documents are exclusively for the use of Senators, while public documents go out to the various libraries in the country.

Mr. OVERMAN. I only wanted them printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to present and have printed and lie on the table to be printed with the other reservations in the document that was ordered printed this afternoon what is intended to be proposed by me as an additional paragraph to the resolution of ratification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. All reservations presented up to this time will be printed as a document and also in the RECORD.

The reservations are as follows (S. Doc. No. 139):

Senate resolution 76.

Mr. KNOX submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the Congress of the United States in declaring, pursuant to its exclusive authority under the Constitution, the existence of a state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, solemnly affirmed that the Imperial Government has so "committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States" that a state of war had been thrust upon them by that Government, and thereupon formally pledged the whole military and national resources of the country "to bring the conflict to a successful termination"; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States, being a coequal part of the treaty-making power of this Government, and therefore coequally responsible for any treaty which is concluded and ratified, is deeply concerned over the draft treaty of peace negotiated at Versailles by which it is proposed to end our victorious war and is gravely impressed by the fact that its provisions appear calculated to force upon us undesirable and far-reaching covenants inimical to our free institutions under the penalty that failing to accept these we shall continue in a state of war while our cobelligerents shall be at peace and enjoying its blessings; that it is proposed to make us parties to a league of nations, under a plan as to which the people of the United States have had neither time to examine and consider nor opportunity to express regarding it a matured and deliberate judgment, whereas the treaty may be easily so drawn as to permit the making of immediate peace, leaving the question of the establishment of a league of nations for later determination; and that the treaty as drawn contains principles, guaranties, and undertakings obliterative of legitimate race and national aspirations, oppressive of weak nations and peoples, and destructive of human progress and liberty: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States will regard as fully adequate for our national needs and as completely responsive to the duties and obligations we owe to our cobelligerents and to humanity a peace treaty which shall assure to the United States and its people the attainment of those ends for which we entered the war, and that it will look with disfavor upon all treaty provisions going beyond these ends.

2. That since the people of the United States have themselves determined and provided in their Constitution the only ways in which the Constitution may be amended, and since amendment by treaty stipulation is not one of the methods which the people have so prescribed, the treaty-making power of the United States has no authority to make a treaty which in effect amends the Constitution of the United States, and the Senate of the United States can not advise and consent to any treaty provision which would have such effect, if enforced.

3. That the Senate advises, in accordance with its constitutional right and duty, that the great paramount if not sole duty of the peace conference is quickly to bring all the belligerents a full and complete peace; that to this end the treaty shall be so drawn as to permit any nation to reserve without prejudice to itself for future separate and full consideration by its people the question of any league of nations; that neither such an article nor the exercise of the rights reserved thereunder, whether at the time of signature, the time of ratification, or at any other time, shall affect the substance of the obligations of Germany and its cobelligerents under the treaty, nor the validity of signature and ratification on their behalf; and that any indispensable participation by the United States in matters covered by the league covenant shall, pending the entry of the United States into the league, be accomplished through diplomatic commissions which shall be created with full power in the premises.

4. That this resolution indicates and gives notice of the limits of the present obligations against the United States in which the Senate of the United States is now prepared to acquiesce by consenting to the ratification of a treaty embodying peace conditions that may be found otherwise acceptable to its judgment, and that the adoption by the peace conference of the foregoing reasonable limitations and positions will facilitate the early acceptance of the treaty of peace by the Senate of the United States, will in nowise interfere with the league of nations as between these countries prepared to ratify the treaty without further consideration, and will afford such a manifestation of real respect for the wishes of a great people as can not fail more firmly to cement the friendship already existing between ourselves and our cobelligerents.

5. That, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

Senate resolution 80.

Mr. SPENCER submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to lie over under the rule:

Resolved, That the Senate approaches the consideration of the league of nations with entire sympathy and in the earnest desire to cooperate as fully as it may in thus establishing and preserving the peace of the world.

That in the interest of a frank and full understanding with the other nations of the world, and particularly with the signatory nations to the covenant itself, candor and friendship alike require that the danger of future misunderstanding should as far as possible be eliminated, and to that end the following declarations should be clearly and definitely made:

First. That the Monroe doctrine is an essential national policy of the United States, and that the necessity and extent of its application and enforcement are matters to be determined alone by the United States as the occasion for interpretation may from time to time arise and without interference, direct or indirect, on the part of any other nation.

Second. That internal questions entirely domestic in character, such as immigration and tariff, notwithstanding certain international results that may from time to time naturally be connected therewith, are matters to be determined entirely by the country in which they arise, and are under no circumstances questions for settlement under the provisions of the league of nations.

Third. That inasmuch as the United States is governed by a written constitution, the provisions of which are supreme and controlling in this Republic over every act, legislative, executive, or judicial, and by such constitution it is expressly provided that the power either to declare war or to continue war for more than two years is vested exclusively in the Congress of the United States, it is apparent that the United States can not bind itself in advance to either make war in the future or to send its Army or Navy into other lands for purposes of control, which is an act of war, without the express authorization of Congress at the time, and, therefore, whether the United States, as the necessity for such action in the future may arise, shall by any military or naval force cooperate in maintaining any of the provisions of the league of nations is a matter which the Congress under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States is, and must be, entirely free to determine by what in its judgment is at the time consistent with the honor and interest and duty of the American people.

Reservations by Mr. Hale.

The Senate of the United States of America advises and consents to the ratification of said treaty with the following reservations and understandings as to its interpretation and effect to be made a part of the instrument of ratification:

First. That whenever two years' notice of withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given, as provided in article 1 of the covenant, the power giving the notice shall cease to be a member of the league, or subject to the obligations of the covenant of the league, at the time specified in the notice, notwithstanding any claim, charge, or finding of the nonfulfillment of any international obligation or of any obligation under said covenant: Provided, however, That such withdrawal shall not release the power from any debt or liability theretofore incurred.

Second. That questions relating to immigration, or the imposition of duties on imports, where such questions do not arise out of any international engagement, are questions of domestic policy, and these and any other questions which, according to international law, are solely within the domestic jurisdiction are not to be submitted for the consideration or action of the league of nations or of any of its agencies.

Third. That the meaning of article 21 of the covenant of the league of nations is that the United States of America does not relinquish its traditional attitude toward purely American questions, and is not required by said covenant to submit its policies regarding questions which it deems to be purely American questions to the league of nations or any of its agencies, and that the United States of America may oppose and prevent any acquisition by any non-American power by conquest, purchase, or in any other manner of any territory, possession, or control in the Western Hemisphere.

Fourth. That the meaning of article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations is that the members of the league are not under any obligation to act in pursuance of said article except as they may decide to act upon the advice of the council of the league. The United States of America assumes no obligation under said article to undertake any military expedition or to employ its armed forces on land or sea unless such action is authorized by the Congress of the United States of America, which has exclusive authority to declare war or to determine for the United States of America whether there is any obligation on its part under said article and the means or action by which any such obligation shall be fulfilled.

Senate resolution 168.

Mr. PITTMAN submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to lie over under the rule:

Resolved, That when the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, signed at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, now pending in the Senate, that it be done with and in consideration of the following understanding as to the present and future construction and interpretation to be given to the treaty:

1. That whenever the two years' notice of withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given by any member of the league, as provided in article 1, the Government giving such notice shall be the sole judge whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

2. That the suggestions of the council of the league of nations as to the means of carrying into effect the obligations of article 10, the execution of which may require the use of military or naval forces or economical measures, can only be carried out through the voluntary separate action of each of the respective Governments, members of the league, and that the failure of any such Government to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league, or to provide such military or naval forces or economical measures, shall not constitute a moral or legal violation of the treaty.

3. That all domestic and political questions relating to the internal affairs of a Government which is a member of the league, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, and commerce, are solely within the jurisdiction of such Government, and are not by the covenant of the league of nations submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or assembly of the league of nations or to the decision or recommendations of any other power. If a dispute arises between parties with regard to a question other than those which are herein specifically exempted as domestic questions, and it is claimed by one of the parties that such question is a domestic and political question, relating to its internal affairs, then the council shall not consider or make recommendations thereon, except upon the unanimous vote of the council, other than the representations of the disputants.

4. There shall not be submitted to arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which, in the judgment of the United States, depends upon or involves its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, and it is preserved unaffected by any provision of the said treaty.

Senate resolution 169.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States in ratifying the treaty of peace wth Germany has done so with the understanding that the meaning and purpose of this instrument is as follows:

1. That there is nothing in the covenant establishing the league of nations capable of being interpreted as permitting the league of nations to interfere with any of the domestic affairs of the United States or of any other nation, such as matters relative to immigration, emigration, imports, or exports, coastwise traffic, or sovereignty within the 3-mile limit of its seacoast.

2. That nothing in the covenant can be construed as requiring the United States to use its military or naval forces except when the Congress of the United States within its own discretion may authorize it.

3. That if any member nation should see fit to withdraw from the league would not be precluded from doing so on the ground that it had not complied with its obligations.

4. That the covenant of the league will not in any degree impair the Monroe doctrine as heretofore interpreted by the Government of the United States.

5. That the league of nations is not authorized to interfere with the internal revolutions of any nation except in respect to the backward nations under a mandatory, nor to interfere with the readjustment of boundaries by agreement.

6. It is the opinion of the Senate that the reduction of armament should proceed as rapidly as the safety of the world shall permit.

7. It is the opinion of the Senate that the pledge contained in article 23 (b) that the members of the league "undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants under their control" is a moral pledge of the highest international character, made in pursuance of the principles enunciated by the President of the United States January 8, 1917, and in his subsequent addresses, which were accepted by the allied Governments on November 5, 1918, in arranging a basis for a treaty of peace with the Government of Germany.

8. The Senate has ratified the treaty upon the express understanding that the Japanese Government will fully and speedily carry out the pledge made to the Chinese Government in May, 1915, with regard to the Shantung Peninsula and has every confidence of the faithful and early compliance with this pledge.

Reservations reported by Mr. LODGE from the Committee on Foreign Relations to be made a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany when it is submitted, viz:

1. The United States reserves to itself the unconditional right to withdraw from the league of nations upon the notice provided in article 1 of said treaty of peace with Germany.

2. The United States declines to assume, under the provisions of article 10 or under any other article, any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between other nations, members of the league or not, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States in such controversies, or to adopt economic measures, for the protection of any other country, whether a member of the league or not, against external aggression, or for the purpose of coercing any other country, or for the purpose of intervention in the internal conflicts or other controversies which may arise in any other country; and no mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, Part I, of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

3. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States, and are not under this treaty submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the league of nations, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

4. The United States declines to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council of the league of nations provided for in said treaty of peace any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone, and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said league of nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

Reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. MCCUMBER to be made a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

1. That whenever the two years' notice of withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given by the United States, as provided in article 1, the United States shall be the sole judge whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

2. That the suggestions of the council of the league of nations as to the means of carrying the obligations of article 10 into effect are only advisory, and that any undertaking under the provisions of article 10, the execution of which may require the use of American military or naval forces or economic measures, can under the Constitution be carried out only by the action of the Congress, and that the failure of the Congress to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league, or to provide such military or naval forces or economic measures, shall not constitute a violation of the treaty.

3. The United States reserves to itself the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its internal affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other purely domestic questions are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not by this covenant submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

4. The United States does not bind itself to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which in the judgment of the United States depends upon or involves its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, and it is preserved unaffected by any provision in the said treaty contained.

5. That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States understands that the German rights and interests, renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty as provided in the exchanged notes between the Japanese and Chinese Governments of date May 25, 1915.

6. That the United States understands and construes the words "dispute between members" and the words "dispute between parties" in article 15 to mean that a dispute with a self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in the assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein and that a dispute with such dominant or principal member is a dispute with all of its self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies; and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in the last paragraph of said article will cover not only the dominant or principal member but also its dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

Reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. SMITH of Georgia to the pending treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

Resolved, That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the treaty with Germany with the following provisos, to be made a part of such ratification:

First. The United States understands and construes the words "dispute between members" and the words "dispute between parties," in article 15, to mean that a dispute with a principal member, self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in the assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein and with each of the other self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies thereof, and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in the last paragraph of said article will cover the dominant or principal member, its dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

Second. The United States understands that, as the covenant provides no tribunal to pass judgment upon the subject, whenever the two years' notice for withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given by a member nation, as provided in article 1, the member nation shall be the sole judge whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States can be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

Third. The United States understands that the reference to the Monroe doctrine in the league covenant means that the long-established policy of the United States, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, is preserved unaffected by the covenant, and that no question which depends upon or involves this policy is to be submitted to arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council of the league.

Fourth. The United States understands that under the league covenant no question can be raised either in the assembly or in the council of the league which will give either body the right to report or to make any recommendation or to take any action upon the policy of the United States or any other member nation with regard to domestic or political questions relating to its internal affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other purely domestic questions, but these questions, in whatever manner they may arise, are solely within the jurisdiction of each member nation, and are not by the covenant submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power, and, in the case of the United States, they are reserved for action by the Congress of the United States.

Fifth. The United States understands that the advice which may be given by the council or the assembly of the league with regard to the employment of the military or naval forces by a member nation, or with regard to the use of economic measures for the protection of any other country, whether member of the league or not, or for the purpose of coercing any other country or for the purpose of intervention in the internal conflicts or other controversies which may arise in any other country, is to be regarded only as advice, and leaves each member nation free to exercise its own judgment as to whether it is wise or practicable to act upon that advice, and that the Congress must determine for the United States its course.

The United States can not assume, under the provisions of article 10, or any other article, any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country, or to interfere, under the provisions of article 16, in controversies between other nations, whether members of the league or not.

The authority for decisions in all matters referred to in this reservation is placed by the Constitution of the United States upon the Congress, and the failure of the Congress to adopt the suggestions of the assembly or the council of the league of nations or to take independent action shall not constitute a violation of the treaty, and no mandate shall be accepted by the United States, as provided in article 22, part 1, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

Sixth. The United States understands that the representatives of the other nations upon the reparations commission will interfere with exports from the United States to Germany or from Germany to the United States only when the United States also approves the interference.

Seventh. The United States understands that no one may represent the United States in any of the positions created by the treaty except when appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless provision is hereafter made by the Congress for selections in a different manner; and the representative of the United States, either in the assembly or the council, shall have no authority to agree for the United States to any amendment to or change in the covenant of the league until the same has been first submitted to and ratified by the Senate of the United States as other treaties.

Reservation intended to be proposed by Mr. CURTIS to the reservations proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations as a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

5. The United States construes subdivision "C" of article 23 to mean that the league shall refuse to recognize agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children and that the league shall use every means possible to abolish and do away with such practice.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SHERMAN to the document (S. Doc. 85), treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

On page 17, line 10, before the word "agree," insert the following: "invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God and."

Reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS to be made a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

1. The United States declines to submit the credentials of its delegates and their advisers to the general conference to the determination of that body or to receive or act upon proposals of any conference from which its delegates and advisers or any of them have been excluded. And the United States understands and construes the Government delegates provided by article 389, and the 12 delegates representing governments upon the governing body of the international labor office and the person of independent standing to be nominated for the panel provided by article 412, to mean that both employers and workers are ineligible to selection or appointment to said positions or any of them. And the United States declines to submit the credentials or qualifications of any of its appointees under Part XIII of the treaty to any authority whatever.

2. The United States understands that the provisions of article 1, Part I, of the treaty, authorizing any member of the league to withdraw therefrom, mean that any such withdrawal, when made, is a withdrawal from the international organization created by Part XIII of the treaty. The United States also understands that amendments to Part XIII, under the provisions of article 422, shall not bind any member of the league which signifies its dissent therefrom, but in that case it shall cease to be a member of the league.

3. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and that of the States respectively, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, agriculture, the tariff, commerce, and all other domestic subjects, are not under Part XIII of this treaty submitted to the determination of the general conference, the governing body of the international labor union, or any other commission of inquiry to be chosen thereunder.

4. The United States reserves the right to decline to recognize the authority, except that of a member of the league, to file a complaint with the international labor office that it is not securing effective observance of any convention which both have ratified in accordance with the articles of Part XIII.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the United States in ratifying the covenant of the league of nations does not intend to be understood as modifying in any degree the obligations, entered into by the United States and the Entente Allies in the agreement of November 5, 1918, upon which as a basis the German Empire laid down its arms. The United States regards that contract to carry out the principles set forth by the President of the United States on January 8, 1917, and in subsequent addresses, as a world agreement, binding on the great nations which entered into it, and that the principles there set forth will be carried out in due time through the mechanism provided in the covenant, and that article 23, paragraph (b), pledging the members of the league to undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants under their control, involves a pledge to carry out these principles.

The protectorate which Germany recognizes in Great Britain over Egypt is understood to be merely a means through which the nominal suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt shall be transferred to the Egyptian people, and shall not be construed as a recognition by the United States in Great Britain of any sovereign rights over the Egyptian people or as depriving the people of Egypt of any of their rights of self-government.

SUGGESTED COMPROMISE RESERVATIONS.

October 21.

CONCERNING WITHDRAWAL.

CONCERNING ARTICLE 10.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country, or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military and naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military and naval forces of the United States, shall, by act or joint resolution, so declare.

CONCERNING DOMESTIC QUESTIONS.

3. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its internal affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not, under this treaty, submitted in any way, either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

CONCERNING THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

4. The United States does not bind itself to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which, in the judgment of the United States, depends upon or involves its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine. Said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said league of nations; and it is preserved unaffected by any provision in said treaty contained.

CONCERNING SHANTUNG.

5. The United States refrains from entering into any agreement on its part in reference to the matters contained in articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action in respect to any controversy which may arise in relation thereto.

CONCERNING VOTE OF DOMINIONS (WHERE NEITHER PRINCIPAL COUNTRY NOR DOMINION IS PARTY TO DISPUTE).

6. The United States reserves the right, upon the submission of any dispute to the council or the assembly, to object to any member and its self-governing dominions, dependencies, or possessions having in the aggregate more than one vote; and in case such objection is made the United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, finding, or decision in which such member and its said dominions, dependencies, and possessions have in the aggregate cast more than one vote.

CONCERNING VOTES OF DOMINIONS (WHERE PRINCIPAL COUNTRY OR DOMINION IS PARTY TO DISPUTE).

7. That the United States understands and construes the words "dispute between members" and the words "dispute between parties" in article 15 to mean that a dispute with a self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in the assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein, and that a dispute with such dominant or principal member is a dispute with all of its self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies; and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in the last paragraph of said article will cover not only the dominant or principal member, but also its dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

The following is proposed by Mr. JONES of Washington as an additional paragraph in the resolution of ratification:

Paragraph —. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league of nations at the end of two years from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty unless by the end of that period—

(1) The sovereignty of China shall have been fully restored over and in Shantung;

(2) The relations of Ireland to the British Empire shall have been adjusted satisfactorily to the people of Ireland;

(3) The independence of Egypt shall be recognized and that country set up as a free, independent, and sovereign State; and

(4) Each member of the league shall have abolished through the duly constituted authority the policy of maintaining its regular military and naval forces in time of peace by conscription.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 22, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 21, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Speak to us, Father, that we go forward with the strength, the courage, the fortitude, to obey Thy commands; that whatsoever we put our hands to, in private or in public, we may prove ourselves worthy of Thy care and protection.

Give to us a clearer vision of the psychological and physical conditions which environ us. The time has come when our statesmen must reach the golden mean between paternalism and individualism. Guide them by thy counsels and:

"Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!"

Hear us, in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. EDWARD C. MANN has been elected from the seventh district of South Carolina to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of the Hon. Asbury F. Lever. His credentials are in the hands of the Clerk of the House. Mr. MANN is present and I ask at this time that he be permitted to take the oath as a Member of this body.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will come forward.

Mr. MANN of South Carolina appeared before the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill and joint resolution:

H. R. 8624. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, and to regulate rents in the District of Columbia; and

H. J. Res. 230. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare and issue a supplementary report on the condition of the cotton crop.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9783.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9783, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9783, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 8, strike out all of lines 1 to 7, inclusive.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Where is that?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Page 8, the first paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the lines of the bill proposed to be stricken out by this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 1:

"When a comptroller general or assistant comptroller general attains the age of 70 years, he shall be retired from his office, and, if he has held the office from which he is retired during the 10 preceding consecutive years, he shall, during the remainder of his natural life, be entitled to one-half the salary he is receiving at the time of his retirement from the office which he then held."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska has been recognized, but the substitute of the gentleman can be reported for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute by Mr. CLARK of Missouri: On page 8, line 3, strike out all of the paragraph after the word "office," in line 3, down to the end of line 7.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph relates to the question of retirement upon half pay at the age of 70 years provided 10 years of service have been rendered. The whole paragraph relates to this subject of retirement with half pay, and the elimination of the entire paragraph to be followed by an amendment on page 7 will cover the question so as to leave the situation as it now stands. The comptroller and assistant comptroller under the present rule hold what are termed continuing commissions. They are not appointed for a series of years or a fixed period of time. Their commissions run now at the pleasure of the appointing power, the President of the United States. If this amendment should be stricken out the provisions of this bill would then leave the continuance of these officers in service according to the pleasure of Congress. The President would appoint and thereafter under the the terms of this bill lose the power of removal. The Congress would then have the power of removal, and if at any time Congress should see fit to make a change in these positions the way would be clear for it to do so, either before or after the retirement date. If this paragraph goes out and a man serving acceptably and efficiently had reached the age of 70 years, still in physical and mental vigor, could go on with the service here just as they go on with their service in the House and in the Senate. It will then be a question for Congress to determine whether the physical and intellectual condition of the comptroller general or the assistant comptroller general is such as to warrant continuance. They would serve at the pleasure of the Congress and no interruption would be occasioned by the cancellation of this entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any Member desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to close debate, and I desire to see whether there is any other gentleman on the committee who would like to speak in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska. I take it that the question will first come on the substitute.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am going to withdraw the substitute for the present and offer it after this amendment is voted upon, provided the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska is voted down.

Mr. GOOD. If there is no other gentleman desiring to speak in favor of the amendment I will ask that debate upon this amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks that debate on this amendment be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman desire to discuss it? I only desire to close whatever debate is had.

Mr. WALSH. I was wondering why the gentleman did not close right away.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this will not close debate on the balance of the section because there are other amendments?

Mr. GOOD. Not at all; it is on this single amendment.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman——

Mr. GOOD. The question is on the unanimous-consent request I have submitted to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection has been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. GOOD. I did not understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts made any objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts object?

Mr. WALSH. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request for unanimous consent made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. Is there objection?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute to strike out this entire section, and I want to be heard for three or four minutes.

Mr. GOOD. My request will not preclude the gentleman from offering an amendment or speaking to his amendment. My request refers to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] strikes out the entire paragraph. The paragraph contains two provisions, first, that the comptroller general shall be retired at the age of 70 years. That stands by itself as a distinct provision. And then it provides for the retirement. Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] desires to offer a separate amendment, simply striking out the provision with regard to retirement, and I do not care particularly to speak on that provision now. But the entire provision is the present provision of law with regard to Federal judges. That provision with regard to Federal judges is:

That when any judge of any court of the United States, appointed to hold his office during good behavior, resigns his office after having held a commission or commissions as judge of any such court or courts at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years, he shall, during the residue of his natural life, receive the salary which is payable at the time of his resignation for the office that he held at the time of his resignation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when the bill was originally introduced it did not contain this provision, but it became apparent as the committee heard the witnesses that this office ought to be entirely removed from politics. The office is a semi-judicial one, and it will require a man of high standing, a man who is a lawyer, and a man who is familiar with auditing accounts. In order to make him an official of the United States it is necessary under the Constitution of the United States to place the appointing power in the President. But the official is at all times subject to the will of Congress, and if he becomes inefficient in office he can be removed by a concurrent resolution. If he fails to do his duty, if he performs his duty in a corrupt way, he can be removed, and it seemed to the committee that when a man attains the age of 70 years or thereabouts he ought to retire.

It ought not to be left to Congress to pass a concurrent resolution to remove a man who is old, because the sentiment in Congress would be with a man who had performed valuable services. Congress would hesitate to oust a man because he was old. To strike out the whole provision would be a great mistake it seems to me. If it is the desire of the committee to strike out the provision with regard to retirement, that is a different proposition; but we ought to have a law that will compel him to resign or make him ineligible to hold the office when he has become old, and who by reason of his old age would not be as alert to perform the duties of the office as a younger man. The provisions of law with regard to the judges has been found to be a very valuable safeguard in this respect. Therefore the committee accepted that principle as laid down in the law already on the statute books and which has been on the statute books for a great many years.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. GOOD. I yield.

Mr. BEE. These appointments are made by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Will the gentleman be kind enough to explain to us on what theory Congress would have the right to control—I am asking for information—the tenure of office, by removal or otherwise?

Mr. GOOD. Well, the provision in the bill, as the gentleman is well aware, is——

Mr. BEE. I understand the provision is there, Mr. Chairman. I wanted to know about the constitutional power of Congress over an officer appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. GOOD. I have not the time in five minutes to enter into that question now. I think the provision in this bill will meet the constitutional requirements.

Mr. MADDEN. The Constitution provides that we can fix the time.

Mr. GOOD. We fixed the tenure of office here by this law, and the tenure of office is only during the rendering of the kind of service required and during the good behavior provided for in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. Did the gentleman from Missouri desire to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. If this amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska is voted down, then I shall offer this immediately.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is withdrawn.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. This amendment deals with a most serious question. I believe every Member of this House, almost, will agree, at least so far as details are concerned.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, debate is exhausted under the agreement, and I have no desire to extend the debate on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think he would be justified in submitting that unanimous-consent request.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the debate is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not obtain the floor for debate under those circumstances. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CLARK of Missouri: On page 8, line 3, strike out all of paragraph after the word "office," where it first occurs in line 3, down to end of line 7, and add a period after the said word "office."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, my amendment strikes out the provision to retire the comptroller general and assistant comptroller general on the retired list at half pay for life. I am in favor of the budget system, and I always have been ever since I first got the hang of things here. But this proposition to put these two men on the retired list at half pay is the first long step in establishing a retired list from the civilian forces of the Government. They work at it all the time. Everybody knows that. They are very estimable people. I have not any criticism of them, and I do not blame them for undertaking to fix a soft berth for themselves. But we are the trustees of the money of the people of the United States, and there is no reason on earth that can be assigned why a man who draws a $10,000 salary and the other one who draws the $7,500 after 10 years' service should be put on the retired list for life, one at $5,000 a year and the other at $3,750 per annum for life.

Now, you begin this once, and there is no end to it. There are, as I understand, about a million and a half Government employees, every one of them wanting his salary raised, or if it had occurred to them—which it had not, probably, when this bill was brought in here—to be retired on half pay. There is not a bit of reason why these men should be retired on half pay.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Bills are pending and sentiment is running to retire everybody in the civil service at a given age at half pay. I am against that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So am I. [Applause.] So that there is nothing for us to quarrel about.

Mr. CANNON. No; nothing. But, being against that, I think maybe this would be a bad precedent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think so, too.

Mr. CANNON. If perchance the 70 years come and anything happens, then the Congress in being might make an exception. I do not know whether it would or not. But this is the nose of the camel.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course it is. I want somebody to straighten out that camel's nose business. [Laughter.] There have been several versions of it.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Who can tell the mental and physical condition of a man at 70? There is no uniform rule to go by. Some men at 80 are younger men than others at 50.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. Clemenceau is 79.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. A man might be incapacitated for a year or two and continued forward in order to retain that pension. It is a dangerous thing to try to start it.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman has informed the House concerning the ancient Clemenceau. Will he also inform the House of his own age and that of Uncle JOE CANNON?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. Speaker CANNON's age is 83. Gen. SHERWOOD is 84. I am 69. The Speaker of the House is 68—right in the bloom of youth, just beginning to be Speaker. [Applause.] If he is Speaker as long as Speaker CANNON was——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULINGS rose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, General.

Mr. HULINGS. Is the gentleman in favor of retiring at the age of 70 years these officers, the comptroller general and assistant?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I am not.

Mr. HULINGS. When the Democratic Party has arranged in its mind now to put a man in as President of the United States who is about 69?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are running one that is 75.

Mr. HULINGS. But they are all looking forward to putting a 69-year-old youth in as President. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that. I am much obliged. [Prolonged applause.] I will confess that when the general began I was not certain about the identity of the 69-year-old man. [Laughter.] Gladstone was premier of England at 83, and Palmerston as long as he lived. I think he was about 85 when he went out.

I do not care anything about the 70-year provision. I think maybe it is a bad one, but I am in dead earnest about this other thing, and I warn the House now that if they put these people on the retired list at half pay, the next time somebody wants to be put on the retired list at half pay or at full pay you can not with a straight face make objection to it. We have already two classes on the retired list. We have the United States judges, who retire on full pay when they have served 10 years and get to be 70, and you have the Army and Navy officers retiring on three-fourths pay, the Army at 64, and I believe they have raised the Navy to 64.

If the Spanish War had been postponed six months, Admiral Dewey never would have won the Battle of Manila Bay. He never would have been there, for he would have been on the retired list. I do not care so much about that, but I do care about this other thing. People want these offices, all of them. You let a vacancy occur in one of them and there will be a dozen or two dozen applications for each one of them at the present salary. I am in favor of this and have been in favor of it for 10 or 15 years—to get up some kind of a system by which these Government employees will arrange a plan that a good actuary will say will save the Government from paying these pensions or salaries for civilians on the retired list, and whenever they do that I will vote for it. And I will go further than that. They say that these old ones will contribute nothing to the fund and the younger ones will have to pay it. If they will have that actuary work out a scheme by which the Government will be saved whole from paying these pensions afterwards I am willing to vote for one appropriation to take care of the old ones; that is, this generation of old ones, not the next generation. Let those of coming generations take care of themselves.

We talk much about economy. Here is the place to begin it. It is true it is only $5,000 in one case and half of $7,500 in the other. But this world is made up of little things. You have all sung that old song—

Little drops of water, little grains of sand—

And so forth, and if we can not make any big economies we surely can make some small ones. I am not a cheese-paring statesman. I think people should be paid wages tantamount to the work they do. I do not know who is going to be appointed comptroller general, and I do not care three straws; but if he gets $10,000 for 10 years, why can he not save a little of it? It is awfully hard to save any on $7,500 [laughter]; I have found that out by sad experience. But if we go on increasing every fellow's salary that wants it increased and retiring them this Government will get so topheavy that it will topple over. That is all I have got to say about it. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to see if some agreement can be made about time on this amendment.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Let us vote now.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to use five minutes on this amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that the debate close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not had time to find out just when Congress placed the retirement provision on the statute books with regard to Federal judges. I find in the Revised Statutes of 1878, which was a revision of the Revised Statutes of 1869, that the provision which I have read was on the statute books at that time. Therefore more than 50 years ago Congress provided by law that Federal judges upon their retirement should be retired at full pay. That has been the law for more than 50 years, and there has been no other official to whom it has been applied.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. WELTY rose.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASLH].

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman in favor of retiring bank examiners and other Federal employees who get $10,000 and $12,000 a year?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. WALSH. Then why is he in favor of this particular provision?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will tell the gentleman why I am in favor of this. I think there are a great many good Federal judges upon the Federal bench to-day who would not be there if it were not for the retirement provision. They could make twice as much in the practice of the law, and if it was not for the fact that they will be retired at a certain age with pay the office would not attract them at all. They could not afford to accept it. I hope the salary of this great office will be attractive enough so that a man like John J. Fitzgerald or Swagar Sherley, men who to-day are receiving or making more than twice the amount of the salary of this official, would be attracted to the position, and that in this position, where the official will be called upon to pass upon billions of dollars per year, the man at the head of it will be of high character and high integrity, and that he will be able to conduct his office in such a manner that it will reflect credit not only upon him but upon the office itself.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa and Mr. WELTY rose.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Has it not always been understood that the reason why this retirement provision was enacted with reference to Federal judges was because the Constitution provided that they should hold their office for life, and if some such provision was not enacted men who were really disabled by sickness or other cause would hang on to the office for years after they were incapacitated?

Mr. GOOD. I think that had something to do with it, and I think it was also done to make the office attractive to great lawyers. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] says that $10,000 is a big salary. The Speaker of this House receives $12,000 a year, and that has been the salary for a number of years, but I never heard either the Speaker or any ex-Speaker say that that salary was too large. I want to say that we must make this office attractive enough to invite the very best ability obtainable. I do not believe you will be able to get that kind of ability unless you place some retirement provision in the bill. I do not believe you are going to get that kind of a man unless you hold out some inducement of this sort. For more than 50 years we have had on the statute books a retirement provision for judges. I have said before that if this were the beginning of a retirement provision I would not offer it in the bill, because as a general proposition I am opposed to it, but I feel that this office is to be akin to that of a Federal judge, and if so I want to see it attractive enough so that we can get a man of high character and splendid attainments to occupy the position.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD) there were—ayes 57, noes 45.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CLARK of Missouri: On page 7, line 18, after the word "time," insert the words "and who shall be removable at the pleasure of the President or."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply gives the President of the United States the right to remove these men whenever he gets ready. If these officers are going to be as important as the chairman of the committee [Mr. GOOD] makes out, then it would be both a calamity and an outrage to compel the President of the United States to keep these men in office after he came to doubt either their integrity, their capacity, or their friendliness toward either himself or his administration. There can not be any two opinions about that.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. BEE rose.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask the gentleman if there would not be danger in having a double control? In other words, the President will have the right to remove and the Congress will have the right to remove. Suppose the President did not want to remove a man, but Congress did remove him, would there not be a conflict, then, between the executive and the legislative branch?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think not.

Mr. BEE. I would like to ask the gentleman this further question: What power is possessed by the Congress to remove from office by concurrent resolution a man who has been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not believe there is any.

Mr. BEE. Then that ought to be stricken out.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Anybody else can make the motion who wants to.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. I beg to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the provision that they can be removed for no other cause and in no other manner is directly in conflict with section 4 of Article II of the Constitution, which says that civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of certain things.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was going to state that.

Mr. STEVENSON. This provision sweeps away the power of impeachment. I have an amendment to include impeachment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There are several gentlemen here to-day who were not here yesterday, and I will state over again a case that might arise. If the President appoints a man of eminence and great ability, that man will have opinions of his own, which may come in conflict with those of the President. The President is responsible for his administration. It would be a very curious condition to have the comptroller general and the President at loggerheads without any way of getting rid of the comptroller general except by this cumbersome congressional joint resolution.

President Johnson got crossways with Secretary of War Stanton. It is no use to discuss the question as to which of them was right and which of them was wrong. The President removed Secretary Stanton temporarily. In the meantime, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] states, Congress had passed the tenure of office act. The President had to submit his reasons to the Senate for suspending Stanton. The Senate refused to recognize his reasons as sufficient. In the meantime, while the Secretary of War was in suspense, Gen. Grant was appointed Secretary of War ad interim, and, as I stated yesterday, President Johnson and Gen. Grant fell out and came to be mortal enemies, so bitter that Johnson would not ride with Grant to the Capitol, and I do not suppose that any power on earth would have made him ride with him short of physical force. Anyhow, Stanton went back and took the office again.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is one case that illustrates what might happen, and it is the only case I know of, because, as I said yesterday, the Republicans repealed the act as soon as Grant was sworn in.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will.

Mr. FESS. The office of Stanton was a constitutional office provided for in the Constitution and not the office of the head of a department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true.

Mr. FESS. This is a statutory office and would not have the same force that it would have in the case of a constitutional office.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Congress is not under the slightest obligation to create a Cabinet office. Members of the Cabinet are simply head clerks; that is all they ever have been or ever will be. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] says that this comptroller general is going to have more power than any Cabinet officer, and probably more power than all the Cabinet officers put together. Suppose he and the President got at loggerheads, do not you think he should be fired?

Mr. FESS. If the law that created the office is to be for good behavior, it would appear to me that the President's power to remove would in that case be inhibitive.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If I was President and I had one of these statesmen under me and he did not do things to suit me he would be fired as sure as the world. [Laughter.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I would like to ask what function the comptroller general will have that would interfere or forward any difficulty between him and the President. In other words, what are the specific functions of the comptroller general?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. To tell the gentleman the truth, nobody knows. [Laughter.] I will give you another illustration, cited by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. Right in the middle of Gen. Jackson's service, toward the beginning of his second administration, the Senate passed a resolution of censure on him for certain performances of his, removing the bank deposits, and so forth. Immediately after they voted the censure Senator Benton hopped up and notified the Senate that he was going to move to expunge the resolution. As the gentleman from South Carolina says, the only way to punish a President is by impeachment, and he is entirely correct.

Benton made a flaming speech; said he knew he was not going to get it expunged then, but he was making the speech for educational purposes to circulate throughout the country. They beat his resolution to expunge. At the next session he offered it again, coming a little nearer to expunging it. The sentiment in the country changed; every time an anti-Jackson Senator resigned or died they elected a Jackson Senator in his place. Finally, after five or six years, Senator Benton got it expunged, and it is one of the greatest curiosities in Washington. Col. Roosevelt said, in his Life of Benton, that it was all tomfoolery. Senator Vest said, in his speech on Benton, that it was all tomfoolery; but it was not; it went to establish what is the truth, that they have no right to punish a President except by impeachment.

Benton described the way that it should be expunged. Before that, when they offered to repeal it, he would not have it, but he directed the clerk to draw great black lines around the resolution and write on the face of it, "Expunged by the Senate" on a certain day.

If you people here think that the old-time statesmen did not know anything about playing tricks, you read his book on how he got that expunged. They did not have any saloons or eating houses on the Hill in those days. He forced an all-night session. He loaded up his committee room with everything good to eat and drink, and his supporters went out, two or three at a time, and loaded up with these good things. The anti-Jackson fellows did not have anything to eat or drink, and that was the way he accomplished it in 1837.

This clumsy arrangement of Congress removing the comptroller is all stuff. If the man was favored by the President, the entire administration would be here lobbying to keep him from being removed by a resolution of Congress; and, believe me, they have some influence when it comes to a vote. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Charman, if the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is adopted it will devitalize the most important provision in the bill. The illustration given by the gentleman from Missouri is not analogous to the case before us. Stanton was a member of the Cabinet. This man we are providing for as comptroller auditor general of the United States is not a Cabinet officer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman from Illinois think that this man is bigger than that of a Cabinet member or all of the Cabinet members put together?

Mr. MADDEN. Not at all; the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri giving power to the President of the United States to discharge this man whenever he pleases makes the office of the comptroller auditor general a political football.

That is what we are trying to avoid. We are trying in this bill to take away the power of the President of the United States to spend the money and at the same time audit his own expenditures. We are trying to give the power of audit to the people, and this provision of the bill reported by the committee does exactly that. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] takes the power away from the people, takes away the safeguards that we are trying to throw around the expenditure of the people's money. The comptroller auditor general has no power to take away the discretion of a Cabinet officer as to what shall be done in the discharge of his duty, but he has the power only to pass upon the legal phases of the expenditure of the appropriations, and incidentally to report any delinquencies that may be found in any department in the course of the execution of the work of the department. Throw away the safeguards that this provision of the bill places around the expenditures and you make chaos worse confounded. What we are trying to do is to get away from politics. What the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is trying to do is to put us into politics. The man who is the comptroller general should be the instrument of the people, provided for by the Congress, and if you adopt the amendment suggested you destroy every vestige of the people's right to supervise and survey the expenditure of their own money.

I think I may safely leave the case with the committee, feeling assured that every man here, even including the gentleman who offered the amendment, wants this provision retained by the representatives of the people, and wants to do away with political chicanery that may follow the appointment and discharge of a man holding this high place by the President of the United States.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that no one knows the range of authority and jurisdiction of the comptroller. I hold in my hand a copy of the law that fixes that as it stands to-day, and I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. To what extent, if any, would his bill modify existing law in relation to the accounting system, in the main?

Mr. GOOD. It gives him some additional power. It gives him the power to go into offices and to call for information that I do not believe the auditors now have.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. But, if I understand it correctly, it does not destroy any of the vital principles of the accounting system as it now stands?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no; it strengthens them, and requires that he shall report to Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I do not quite agree with the chairman. What this bill does is this. In the matter of accounting it provides that instead of following the heads of appropriations as now, the accounting system shall follow the head of the budget as proposed, and it revolutionizes the accounting system to the extent of furnishing information in detail that it is not possible to obtain under the present law.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the floor.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] explain in what way there would be an audit when an item is put in by the Congress which was not in the budget.

Mr. MADDEN. The audit is made after the expenditure, not before.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I am confident that any form the budget may assume will not materially modify the fundamental laws of the accounting system as it now stands. Neither the President of the United States, a member of his Cabinet, nor anyone that has a claim before the comptroller general, has any right to dictate to him what his decision shall be upon the law and the facts involved in the case. It is a judicial determination, just as clear and distinct as any question in court, and the chairman of this committee is absolutely right when he says that judicial powers reside here and must be exercised by the comptroller general. Beyond that the President can not go; beyond that a Cabinet officer can not go; beyond that a claimant can not go. There is a course of procedure, however, which may be adopted. Anyone who feels aggrieved by the decision, taking issue with the finding of the comptroller, may go to the Court of Claims and sue there to protect his rights, and may also go on to the Supreme Court of the United States. Here is a direct line of judicial procedure. If we should strike out this provision of the bill which would give to Congress the power to remove the comptroller general, we would destroy one of the most commendable features of the bill. The committee has made a very happy solution of this matter—appointment by the President and removal by the Congress, the comptroller to hold his position under a continuing commission in the future, as now.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Is the contention of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] that the provision in the Constitution which provides for the removal by impeachment for malfeasance in office is nullified by this proposed law?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I do not think so.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It takes a majority to impeach and two-thirds of the Senate to convict. This bill, if it passes, will make a majority of the House and a majority of the Senate all that is necessary to remove.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Just as the President would exercise the power of removal, if it were left with him.

Mr. CANNON. So that there will never be any impeachment——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. In all probability not.

Mr. CANNON. There would be a readier—in fact, an immediate—opportunity to dispense with a dishonest man.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. In other words, if we discover wrongdoing we want to settle it at once, and this provides the way.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have not contended that you could not remove them in this way. The part I am calling attention to is this, that they can be removed by concurrent resolution of the Congress, after notice and hearing, when in their judgment the comptroller general or the assistant comptroller general has been inefficient or guilty of neglect of duty or malfeasance in office, and for no other cause and in no other way. I call attention——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Just one moment, Mr. Chairman; I can not yield further in connection with that unless I can have five minutes more, in which event I shall be glad to yield. There are other amendments which may be offered which will not affect the vital element in this section and this feature of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, let me call the attention of members of the committee to this fact. During the preceding years and under the system of accounting as it stands now when you call upon accounting officers to come here and disclose the record of facts, you are asking them to come and give testimony substantially against the men who hold their official lives in their hands. Under the arrangement here provided, if the House should call upon these officers, as it will have occasion to do, to come here and disclose contracts, vouchers, disclose the record in any question under investigation, they will be disclosing information to the body that has in its hands the power to insist upon a correct showing of facts. Hence there will be removed all tendency to withhold information or evade a statement of facts. If you destroy this provision of the bill you destroy a large portion of the benefits of an independent accounting system.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I do.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman heard the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina, where this bill says, in lines 22 and 23, page 7, that his removal shall be for no other cause and in no other manner. Now, the Constitution provides the manner of impeachment. What does the gentleman think of the constitutionality of this provision that he can not be removed in the constitutional way?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I have two amendments, one proposing to strike out all of line 17, except the last two words, and another amendment to strike out all after the word "office," in line 22, and the word "manner," in line 23. That will remove that objection and clear the way absolutely, so far as any question concerning impeachment is concerned. Then we will have it upon clear ground.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the pending amendment, in my opinion, would destroy one of the most desirable and meritorious features of this bill. The comptroller general is not expected or intended to have any official relation with the President of the United States in so far as auditing accounts are concerned; and for my part, if there had been any way under the Constitution whereby we could have provided for his appointment by Congress I would have favored it. The comptroller general is expected to audit the accounts and the expenditures made by the various departments, whereas under the present system the spending departments of the Government audit their own accounts. Now, the comptroller general, when he audits those accounts, will be responsible to the body which makes the appropriation and not to the spending departments of the Government. He not only audits the accounts, but he passes upon the expenditures and construes the statutes passed by Congress relative to appropriations. So, I say, if we now undertook to permit the President of the United States to remove this official at his will and pleasure we would destroy the very object and very purpose of the committee in making this recommendation to the House. This bill provides that the comptroller general shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and then he can only be removed by a concurrent resolution of both Houses of Congress. This makes him responsible to Congress and not to the President. He is subject to the will of Congress and every committee in furnishing it information. He is expected to advise Congress as to improvements that may be made in the matter of expenditures.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If we do not make this department or bureau independent of the executive departments of the Government why not let the law stay as it is now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Missouri is clearly correct in that statement. Under the present law the Comptroller of the Treasury construes appropriation statutes, and under a recent departmental order he has charge of the auditing of the various expenditures; but if we are going to leave this official responsible to the President and not to Congress then there is no reason whatever for passing this particular provision, so I hope this amendment will not be adopted. Now, it has been suggested that we are undertaking by law to repeal a part of the Constitution relative to impeachment. Why, of course, we do not undertake to deny the right of impeachment guaranteed by the Constitution; but, as has been suggested, this concurrent resolution simply provides a readier and quicker way of getting rid of an incompetent and inefficient official by simply providing that a majority of both Houses may pass a resolution and dispose of him. The right of impeachment still exists, and we could not disturb it if we would.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think that the language "has been inefficient or guilty of neglect of duty or malfeasance in office" is really surplussage, for when any future session of Congress adopts a simple resolution removing this official that Congress could do so, because that in effect would be a repeal of the requirement? In other words, Congress having the power to create the office would have the power to remove the official without alleging any cause, and it seems to me that it should just be a matter of removal at any time by concurrent resolution.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That may be true, Mr. Chairman, but it was the idea of the committee in making this recommendation to remove this official as far as we could from politics.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The idea in adopting this provision was to take this official as far as possible out of politics and not make him subject to change of political administrations, and therefore we have expressly provided that he shall not be removed except in case of inefficiency or for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office. It will be persuasive and, I think, controlling, and it can not be changed by future Congresses except by a bill or joint resolution, which would require the approval of the President. I hope the amendment which has been offered will be voted down.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section close at the end of 10 minutes. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina has another amendment——

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir; my amendment is being discussed in connection with this.

Mr. GOOD. I will see that the gentleman gets time on his amendment.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I will make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as I construe the language of this section the Congress will be practically without any way by which the comptroller general or his assistant may be removed before he reaches the age of 70 years. I do not know whether a future Congress will be so afraid of itself that it would not like to have some right of removal with regard to these officials. But the power should be retained, and if they do not want it they will not be bound to exercise it. However, it seems to me that this Congress ought not to attempt to tie the hands of those who are to come after us by fastening officials of this sort upon the Government practically for life, or, at least, without any practical method by which the Congress may get rid of him.

Now, let us see how this statute will operate. It does not provide that the Congress may remove the comptroller general or his assistant at will. But the act limits the way in which he may be removed. One of the causes is "inefficiency," another is "neglect of duty," and the other is "malfeasance in office"; and the act provides specifically that neither the comptroller general nor his assistant shall be removed for any other cause.

Now, I take it that the purpose of this act is to put men in these positions who will use their brains and energies in the effort to inaugurate and maintain economy in the expenditures of the various departments of the Government. Well, my friends, the question of "malfeasance in office" would not have any relation to a man's tendency toward economy or extravagance. The same is true as to making "neglect of duty" the cause of removal and the same as to "inefficiency." A man might be ever so efficient according to any legal interpretation of the term, but he might be one of those men like our beloved friend Mr. CANNON mentioned a day or two ago. He might be a man with a vision, and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois said that a man with a vision is generally a visionary. He might be ever so efficient, but at the same time be one of those men who has no idea of practical economy in the matter of spending money for the public welfare. But yet when he gets in, what can the Congress do except to let him stay or bring him up here, after notice and hearings, and give him a trial on the question of whether or not he has been "inefficient" or "neglected his duty" or been "guilty of malfeasance" in office? He might be the most liberal-minded man in regard to the expenditures of money that was ever connected with the Government, but Congress would have no remedy, and he would be in office for life.

Mr. CLEARY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will.

Mr. CLEARY. Does the President appoint any other official besides this whom he does not have the power to remove?

Mr. STEAGALL. The judges.

Mr. CLEARY. Regarding the matter of Congress being the judge of his capacity as to his malfeasance in office, do you not believe that if there was a hostile Congress they would easily charge these things, whether he was guilty or not, if they were fighting the President?

Mr. STEAGALL. That would be easily charged; but under this act he would have a right to be heard, and it would involve a regular trial before both Houses of Congress, and the Lord only knows how long it would take under the provisions of this act before they would ever be able to get rid of him. They do not retain the power to discharge or remove because of failure to economize, yet the enforcement of economy is the controlling purpose of this act. And if it passes—which I hope it will not, especially with the life-tenure provision which it now carries—certainly the Congress ought to strike out the hampering provisions of the act and retain the right to deal with these officials in case of failure on their part to take proper steps to enforce reforms and economy. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], if adopted, would give the President of the United States power in his discretion to remove this officer—the proposed comptroller general—whenever he believed the interests of the Government required it. The gentleman from Tennessee, my distinguished friend Mr. BYRNS, says that that power ought not to be given to the President, because it is the purpose by the provisions of this bill to eliminate entirely from the control of the President of the United States anything in reference to this high and exalted position and the distinguished person who may be appointed to discharge its duties.

Now, gentlemen, the President of the United States takes a solemn oath, when he enters upon the discharge of his duties, to support the Constitution and to execute the laws of the land. The gentleman from Tennessee says that this officer under this bill would have the right to construe the laws, to make recommendations in reference to them, and to submit proposed matters of legislation relating to the receipts and disbursements of public funds and audit the accounts. The President of the United States is the servant of the people of this country. No matter how high a position a man may hold in this Republic, he is still the servant of the people and responsible to the people, and ought to be, because it is through the ballots of the people that he is placed in the position he occupies. [Applause.] Then when the President of these United States, in obedience to the call of the people expressed by their ballots, assumes the duties of his high and exalted position, the greatest office in the world, he is still responsible to them, and he is the head of this Government and is charged with the execution of the laws and with the enforcement of the Constitution.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that now the Comptroller of the Treasury construes the statutes with reference to appropriations, and that there is no appeal whatever from his decision?

Mr. CANDLER. Yes; and the President of the United States has the right, in his discretion, to remove him. And I contend he ought to have a right to remove this officer if he fails to discharge the duties of his office acceptably to the President—the executive head of this Government who appoints him and is responsible for him.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It transfers the right of removal from the President to the Congress, the body that makes the appropriation, and we are charged with the responsibility to see that his duties are carried out.

Mr. CANDLER. Yes; and by doing so, instead of taking the position out of politics, it puts it in the hotbed of politics. If this amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is adopted, it will not only give the President the right to remove this officer, but the provision of the bill will also remain which gives the Congress the right to remove him by concurrent resolution, if they see proper to do so, and that will be a double security that he will be required to perform his duties faithfully and efficiently and in the interest of the people and for the good of the country. We all know what difficulty there would be to secure his removal by the Congress of the United States, by joint action of both Houses. We know the difficulty always encountered in removing a Federal judge. The chairman of the committee [Mr. GOOD] states that this provision in reference to the tenure of office of this officer is taken from the statute authorizing the appointment of United States judges, fixing their tenure of office, and providing for their retirement. I have seen since I have been a Member of Congress the serious difficulty there is in removing a judge of the United States court, regardless of what his conduct may have been, and very few have ever been removed in the history of this Republic. And just as it is very difficult to remove a United States judge, it would be very much more intricate and difficult to remove this officer by the joint action of the two Houses of Congress. In the case of an effort to remove a United States judge the House of Representatives prefers articles of impeachment, and the Senate of the United States tries the case as a jury, and by their votes determine his guilt or innocence and whether he shall be removed or not. Under this bill you give the right to this officer to have a trial before both Houses of Congress, their verdict to be rendered and enforced by concurrent resolution, to be passed by both the House and the Senate, and in such a case you would have 435 jurors in this House and 96 jurors in the Senate, and to have a hearing and trial and decision by them would be a never-ending proceeding, saturated with politics, in all probability, of the most partisan character. You who have seen election cases tried here know something of the politics and bitterness which would get into a trial of a comptroller general if one was ever tried by Congress in an effort to remove him. You might get a comptroller general who was or might become inimical to the President or unreasonable and bitter toward his administration or who was corrupt or very extravagant and wasteful.

Even the President or anybody else sometimes makes mistakes in the appointment of officers, and if you should get that character of a man in this office he might so construe or administer the laws or be so extravagant or corrupt or unreasonable in his recommendations or become so partisan himself as to bring discredit on the President of the United States, who had sworn to execute the law and uphold the Constitution; and if you fail to adopt this amendment then you would say to the President under such a condition, "Your hands are tied hard and fast, and you can not take any action in reference to an officer of that kind, and you can not remove him, although you are responsible for him." You do not want to put any man who is big enough for the people to elect President in that kind of a situation, do you?

Then, again, the theory of this Government is opposed absolutely to a life tenure of office, and I am opposed to it. I am opposed to United States judges having a life tenure of office. [Applause.] I think it would be better to bring them closer to their responsibility to the people by giving them a reasonable tenure of office rather than a life tenure. If they faithfully and efficiently and with justice administered the duties of their office they could, and no doubt would, be reappointed, or if it could be left to the people they could be reelected. I believe the best government is a government by and of the people, and therefore I believe all officers ought to come before the people, as we come before them, at the end of a definite period of time and receive their approval or disapproval, for at last, in the final analysis, it is to the people in a Republic like ours that all the officers of the Government are and should be responsible. [Applause.] So much for that. Now, permit me just a few words as to the bill generally. You Members with whom I daily so pleasantly associate know that during my service as a Member here I have stood for economy. It is believed this bill will bring about economy—save money for the people. Therefore I shall vote for it on its final passage.

What we need to-day is real economy, economy in governmental affairs and economy in the business world and economy in the private affairs of the citizen. If strict economy was observed in Government, in business, and private affairs, it would contribute much to remedy the extravagant tendencies of the present times, which are at least to some extent responsible for the oft-repeated cry about the high cost of living. The cost of living is high, and it ought to be and I hope can and will be reduced; but the cost of "high living" is extravagantly high, and if these extravagances of "high living" could and would be eliminated that would tend considerably to reduce the "high cost of living." It is time to begin not only to preach but to practice economy in Government and economy in everyday life. In and out of Congress we hear appeals for economy in Government expenses. There is room for it. War-time expenditures were often on an extravagant basis because results had to be obtained regardless of the cost. All of us, Democrats and Republicans, voted for those appropriations, and both political parties are responsible for them. We did not have time to fully investigate. Our country, the security of our institutions, and the sanctity and protection of our homes were at stake. We could not know what amount of money was absolutely necessary, and we all voted for a plenty so as to be on the safe side and to be sure to furnish enough to meet every necessity required to win the war, and we won it. That money is spent and gone.

It will do no good to criticize and grumble and complain about it. That will not get any of the money back into the Treasury. Therefore the frequent effort of our Republican friends to criticize and blame the Democratic administration for expenditures of war times for which they voted will do no good and get none of the money back. The congressional junketing here and overseas, investigating for partisan and political purposes, will not get any money back. It only increases expenditures by the useless waste of many thousands of dollars more, thereby adding that much more to the cost incident to the war. We had as well quit looking backward and courageously meet the problems now before us. Let us as rapidly as possible get back to normal conditions, repeal all unnecessary laws, and reduce expenses. I am an old-fashioned, unfrilled Democrat. I do not believe any more taxes ought to be collected from the people than are necessary to pay the expenses of the Government economically administered. I want to see taxes reduced now just as soon as possible. You can not reduce taxes, however, unless you reduce expenditures, and you can not reduce expenditures unless you practice strict economy. What is needed in order that we may economize is a standardized, businesslike method of making appropriations. When appropriations are made, know in advance that the money is available to pay them; and, if it is not, know at least where it is to come from to meet the expenditures when authorized. This budget bill under consideration proposes a method by which an effort, at least, is to be made to do business according to business methods, and I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to two points very briefly. The statement has been made that nobody knows what the powers of the comptroller general are. They are very definitely stated in sections 10 and 13 of this act. Section 10 declares—

> That all powers and duties now conferred or imposed by law upon the Comptroller of the Treasury or upon the Auditor for the Treasury Department, the Auditor for the War Department, the Auditor for the Interior Department, the Auditor for the Navy Department, the Auditor for the State and Other Departments, or the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall, so far as not inconsistent with this act, be vested in and imposed upon the accounting department and be exercised without direction from any other officer, and the balances certified by the comptroller general shall be final and conclusive upon the executive branch of the Government.

Section 13 provides, in addition—

> That the comptroller general shall investigate, at the seat of government or elsewhere, all matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of public funds, and shall make to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, a report in writing of the work of the accounting department.

That section covers additions to his powers beyond the powers now held by the Comptroller of the Treasury. His powers are very definite.

Now, as to the question of his removal by the President. The whole purpose of creating an accounting department outside of the Treasury Department, where the accounting department is now, is that we may have an independent audit, that the audit shall be made by an officer who shall not be subject to one of the spending agencies whose account he audits. The President as the Chief Executive has control of the administrative work and gives orders to the administrative officers. The Congress makes the appropriations which are spent by these administrative agents of the Government. The report of the comptroller general should be made to the power which makes the appropriations. The Constitution makes the House of Representatives particularly the originating power. We have control of the purse, and the Executive has no control of any money except moneys appropriated by Congress. The report should be made to the appropriating power; and the auditing power, it seems to me, with its judicial functions considered especially, should be as independent of the executive power as are other officers exercising judicial functions. The President of the United States has no right to remove a Justice of the Supreme Court or any other judge. Why should he have the right to remove the man who exercises judicial functions in interpreting the appropriating acts of Congress? The control should lie with the appropriating power, and the passage of the amendment now pending would divide that control, would give the President power to remove and at the same time it would retain in Congress the power to remove.

Now, as to the question of impeachment.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he leaves that point?

Mr. TEMPLE. Just for a question.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will this law do away with these offices of auditors of the various departments?

Mr. TEMPLE. It will transfer them, so that they will go with the accounting department and be removed from the Treasury Department.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. In all the departments, including the Post Office Department?

Mr. TEMPLE. None of these auditors is in any department excepting the Treasury Department. The Auditor for the War Department and the Auditor for the Navy Department are not connected with the War and Navy Departments. They are connected with the Treasury Department only. So with the other auditors. They are not auditors in the department for which they audit. They are in the Treasury Department.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The bill contemplates the transfer of those?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; taking them along with the comptroller general.

Now, as to the question of impeachment. That question never would arise. Congress, being able to remove the comptroller general by concurrent resolution, would never deny to itself the power to remove him by impeachment. If we can do it by a majority vote, Congress would not put up against that plan the plan of removing him by a two-thirds vote. There would be no quarrel within Congress on that point, although I do think that the gentleman's amendment would do absolutely no harm to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 60.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers. The gentleman from Missouri has just stepped out of the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands tellers.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is withdrawn.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 7, line 23, after the word "manner," strike out the period and insert the words "except by impeachment."

Mr. GOOD. There is a period after the word "impeachment"?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOOD. I accept the amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to make any extended remarks on this amendment, but a good deal of criticism has been directed to the amendment by some of my colleagues here. There is no question but that Congress can create an office and create a method of removal from the office in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution, but it can not create a method different from constitutional methods and say there shall be no other. That is the reason why I am offering this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 7, line 17, strike out all of line 17 down to the word "may."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, this amendment adopted, with those previously adopted, would leave the comptroller general in the same status that he has now, holding a continuing commission, running at the pleasure of the authority that might remove him from office. This covers the matter completely, so far as amendments may be concerned, to perpetuate this condition and leave the transfer on that basis. I have nothing further to add. I shall be glad to have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 7, line 17, after the word "office," strike out "during good behavior" and insert "for a term of six years," and strike out all the rest of the language in lines 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, and 26.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, in common with everyone who has given any study to our system of appropriations, I favor the inauguration of some budgetary system; but in that favor I would not create a body which could—

Bestride the narrow world like a Colossus.

Nor would I increase unduly the officers who hold their positions during their natural lives. As a general proposition I am opposed to creating any more positions to be held during good behavior, which is nearly always equivalent to saying during their natural lives, and then having them come in under some retirement bill, so that we not alone may have a system no more efficient than if elective or appointed for a term, but pay the officials, when they get to be a certain age, because they have become inefficient.

The amendment I have in mind changes the term "during good behavior" to the language "for a term of six years," it being my idea that these positions of comptroller general and assistant comptroller general of the budgetary system could be carried into best effect not by appointing somebody for life but for this period of six years. It has occurred to me that possibly we should get the best results from the chief magistracy of the Nation by making the term six years and providing that the President should be ineligible for reelection. But I am opposed to the creation of additional offices such as this for a life tenure, when the period of six years is certainly ample and sufficient to give this budgetary system the benefit of that which is the best in a man's make-up.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Did I understand the gentleman correctly to say that we are creating a new position and thereby increasing the number of offices?

Mr. GARD. I did not say anything about that. I said I was opposed to the creation of new positions with life tenure. That is the idea I tried to convey to the gentleman.

Now, we all know that in the history of the great Appropriations Committee of the House a man whose memory we all hold in high esteem, the late Mr. Courts, held the clerkship of that committee for many years. And there would not be the slightest intention, I am sure, to take away the splendid service of the gentleman who has succeeded him. But these things go along because men prove their worth and do not continue because we invest the positions with a life tenure. When we say that the comptroller general and assistant comptroller general shall hold their positions for six years it seems to me we do what it is desirable to do. We take them out of politics. We give them a fixed and definite term. If they are good and efficient public servants the President of the United States—any President who has the best interests of the country at heart—may reappoint them.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In making this a life-tenure office, do you not remove the strongest incentive that an appointee has to be efficient and faithful and fully effective as a public servant?

Mr. GARD. I think so. I think the more life-tenure positions we make the poorer will be our public service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that either of these amendments ought to prevail. I believe you must give a tenure to this office that will invite men of ability to accept it. The proposition offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] to appoint the comptroller general for a period of six years without the right of removal, it seems to me can not be defended from any standpoint. By the creation of this department it is intended to make it thoroughly independent of the executive departments. The gentleman's amendment if adopted absolutely reverses the whole plan of the bill and instead of having a budgetary system with a comptroller general to audit and control the accounts of the Government fearlessly and to do his work efficiently, we substitute for that a man who would hold his office not because of his ability but because of his political service.

That is the plan we are trying to get away from, and that has been the evil in our present plan. Unless you throw around the comptroller general all the safeguards that will make him absolutely independent and make those whom he appoints independent and fearless, I fear we will find the same condition existing that inheres in the present system; that is, that your auditors and the comptroller general dare not criticize an executive official. They can not become independent in action. The provision here is that the comptroller general shall hold his office during good behavior. That provision was placed in the Constitution of the United States so far as it related to judicial positions under the United States. This position is in many respects similar to those judicial positions. It is semi-judicial, and we should throw around it all the safeguards that the Constitution guarantees to Federal judges; that is, that they shall hold their office during good behavior. Place that provision in the law and the comptroller general can hew to the mark. He can pass upon requests for appropriations in a fearless manner, just as a Federal judge passes upon questions of law that come before him.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Did not the committee contemplate that the comptroller general might not only be brought into conflict with the executive department and with the executive branches of the Government, but sometimes with one side or the other of the aisle in Congress, and possibly both sides, in the impartial discharge of his duties?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely. That department ought to be independent and fearless to criticize wrong expenditures of money wherever it finds them. It ought to criticize inefficiency in every executive department where inefficiency exists, and one of the troubles with our present system is that the auditors dare not criticize. If they criticize, their political heads will come off.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the provisions of the bill have been pretty clearly thought out along that line, and so far as the tenure of office is concerned it ought to remain as the committee has reported it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 9 ayes and 49 noes.

So the substitute to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 8 ayes and 43 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert the figures "$7,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 4 ayes and 47 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 22, after the word "office," insert "or of any crime or conduct involving moral turpitude."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment only adds to the causes for removal, crime, and that conduct known generally as involving moral turpitude. I am in favor of the bill and in favor of the budget. I think it means a saving to the country of millions of dollars. It means economy in administration. This amendment provides that if the comptroller general or his assistant is guilty of a crime or conduct inimical or hostile to the best interests of the Government a concurrent resolution of Congress would reach and remove him. I understand the chairman of the committee has no objection to it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the amendment would accomplish any good or not. I do not see how it would do any harm. I have no objection to it.

Mr. BRIGGS. The need for legislation of this character has long been apparent to those who have given thoughtful consideration to the best method of reducing waste, extravagance, and inefficiency in the administration of the Government. It is probably too much to hope that all loss from these causes can be entirely eliminated, but it is unquestionably true that it is possible for vast sums of money to be recklessly and extravagantly expended under the old, inadequate systems and which, under the budget plan, can be saved the taxpayers of the country. Both Democratic and Republican Parties have recognized the necessity for the budget and have both declared in their national platforms in favor of legislation providing for the same. The President has recommended it, and the public generally favor it. It is in response to this demand of the people and to the evident necessity for the creation of a proper system of checks and balances if economies demanded and required are to be effected that both the Democrats and Republicans of the House have advocated and united in the support of this bill.

The present measure, which has been unanimously reported out of the committee, contains the vital elements of a true budget plan; that is, it provides:

1. For the creation of a bureau of the budget in the office of the President.

2. Makes it the duty of such bureau to assist the President in the performance of the powers conferred upon him by the act.

3. Directs that the bureau shall also make a careful investigation of all provisions of law dealing in any way with the preparation and transmission to Congress of estimates and the preparation and submission to Congress of financial data of any character in order to determine what changes should be made in such provisions of law, to the end that all requirements in respect to the reporting to Congress of financial data and estimates shall be brought together in one place, coordinated, revised, and brought into harmony with an alternative budget which the President is also required to submit to Congress. The result of such investigation shall be embodied in a report or reports to the President, who may transmit to Congress such report or reports, or any part thereof, with such recommendations regarding the action which in his opinion should be taken upon the matters conveyed by such report.

4. That on a date to be fixed by the President the heads of the several executive departments shall annually submit to the President their estimates of the needs of such departments.

5. On the first day of each regular session after the calendar year 1919 a document, to be known as the budget, shall be transmitted by the President to Congress, which document shall contain:

(a) Balanced statements of the revenues and expenditures of the Government for the preceding fiscal year, and of the resources and liabilities of the Treasury at the close of the year.

(b) His estimates of the revenues and expenditures of the Government for the current fiscal year, and of the resources and liabilities of the Treasury at the close of the year.

(c) His estimates of the revenues and expenditure needs of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year, and how, in his opinion, these needs should be met. The President shall also transmit with such budget such further data regarding the financial affairs of the Government and such recommendations as he may deem proper.

6. An alternative budget is also required to be submitted by the President in substantially the same form as the budget.

7. That after June 30, 1920, no estimate or request for any appropriation, and no recommendation as to how the revenue needs of the Government should be met, shall be submitted to Congress by any officer of the executive branch of the Government, except the President, unless at the request of either House of Congress.

8. The bill further provides for an accounting department, which shall be an establishment of the Government independent of the executive department and under the control and direction of the comptroller general of the United States. The office of the Comptroller of the Treasury is abolished and all such employees transferred to the office of the comptroller general. It is provided that this official shall hold office during good behavior, but may be removed at any time by concurrent resolution of Congress, after notice and hearing, when, in its judgment, the comptroller general or his assistant has been inefficient or guilty of neglect of duty or of malfeasance in office or, with the amendment which I have offered, of any felony or conduct involving moral turpitude, as well as by impeachment. This practically gives the comptroller general the same independence and immunity from partisan political control as is now enjoyed by the employees of the Government in civil service, and will enable him to discharge the duties of his office without fear or favor in spite of incurring the displeasure in powerful quarters of those whose policies or desires for expenditures are limited by the restraints which he, under the law, must impose.

But notwithstanding the opportunity accorded to the comptroller general to exercise fearlessly and fully the power vested in him to supervise the expenditures of the Government, he is yet made answerable to Congress for failure to discharge his duties or for a wrongful exercise of any of his powers, as well as for an inefficient exercise of those powers and duties; and by the amendment which I have offered it is further provided that Congress may by a concurrent resolution remove him if he should become guilty of any felony or of any conduct involving moral turpitude.

There might arise instances of unfitness not serious enough to be classed as a felony, but which would be within the meaning of the language "conduct involving moral turpitude."

9. The comptroller general is vested with all the powers and duties now imposed by law upon the Comptroller of the Treasury or upon the auditors for the different executive departments, and the offices of such last-named officials are abolished.

It is also provided that the comptroller general shall investigate all matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of public funds and shall make to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, a report in writing of the work of the accounting department, containing recommendations concerning the legislation he may deem necessary to facilitate the prompt and accurate rendition and settlement of accounts and concerning such other matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of public money as he may think advisable.

He is also granted the right to examine any books or other papers of any department or other Government agency.

Such, in substance, are the provisions of the bill.

Through its operation thus is:

1. A centralized responsibility imposed upon the Chief Executive of the Nation for the conduct of the administrative branch of the Government.

2. A statement furnished in complete form of all the revenues and expenditures for the preceding year, with also those for the current year and for the ensuing year, with a further statement of the resources and liabilities of the Treasury at the close of each such year.

3. And through the audit, investigation, supervision, and recommendations of the comptroller general, it ought to be possible to clearly present to Congress just in what branches of the Government duplication of work and effort, as well as waste and extravagance, exist, and the best methods of eliminating same.

Moreover, Congress will be more fully advised of the income of the Government, as well as of its needs, and will thereby be better enabled than it has ever been before to adjust the two and reduce taxation and expenditure where it can be done, avoiding in a great measure, if not completely, the deficiency appropriations which have for so long been the custom and practice in our Government.

At the present time the national debt of the United States amounts to the stupendous sum of approximately $25,000,000,000. A staggering debt, indeed, but not so great comparatively as the war debts of other countries who do not have the national wealth of $230,000,000,000 possessed by this Nation. But the debt is heavy enough, and so great that to pay the interest alone on it requires the enormous sum of more than $1,000,000,000.

It has been computed that for the period from April, 1917, when the United States entered the war, to April, 1919, a period of 25 months, the war cost this country about $22,000,000,000, or at the rate of $1,000,000 an hour, and making, on the average, a charge of $200 a person for the 110,000,000 people in the United States. This cost does not include the great sums given the Red Cross and other war-work agencies.

In addition, nearly $10,000,000,000 was loaned the allied nations. When this amount will be repaid no one now can say.

The war has practically ended, but war costs have not. Not only the people in their daily farming, industrial, and home life feel it, but the Government also is having to pay substantially the same relatively high costs for what it is compelled to have and do, and therefore, like the people, finds for the most part that the dollar now which it spends will scarcely go half as far as it did previous to the beginning of the war. This condition in turn has been reflected not only in the costs of materials, but in the necessities of employees of the Government, who are constantly presenting and urging upon Congress the need of increased salaries and wages to meet the alarming advance in the cost of living.

So that the appropriations for the conduct and operation of the Government are necessarily greater than they used to be for only the same return which it used to be possible to obtain for so much less.

Congress is making the greatest effort to check and reduce that cost, and has already adopted the most stringent measures to punish hoarders and profiteers, whose greed rises supreme above the welfare and, in some cases, to the very right to existence of their fellow countrymen. Such acts have been made offenses punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, and if grand juries and petit juries will indict and convict these profiteers some substantial relief from the practices of these offenders may speedily be afforded.

The continuance of the cost of the war, however, is not alone centered in the high cost of living, but must be recognized and further borne in the provision that must be made for the soldiers, sailors, and marines who gave and risked their lives that their countrymen and this Republic might continue to live and give to all mankind the example and security of a free people under the greatest constitutional and most enduring form of government. Already war-risk insurance, compensation, vocational education, and allowances to the soldiers, sailors, and marines and their dependents require the appropriation of many millions of dollars.

Notwithstanding a tremendous cutting down of appropriations for the current year and a reduction in appropriations of billions of dollars by reason of the signing of the armistice and the saving of vast amounts appropriated for carrying on the war, there is required for this year alone, according to the estimates of the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, over ten and a half billion dollars, with only total revenues of about seven billion and a quarter with which to meet them. In other words, it appears necessary to raise in some way more than three billion and a half dollars addditional to meet the current requirements, unless they can be reduced in some way which has not yet been made apparent.

The war, of course, required tremendous expenditures, but it was won, and the price of victory will be ungrudgingly paid by the American people. It can not, however, but be felt for a long, long time. Congress should, however, make every effort to dispense with unnecessary expenditures and avail itself of every agency which will not only save the people from further burdens and taxation, but, wherever possible, contribute to the reduction of those that exist. This the budget system in some measure promises to accomplish; therefore its establishment should and will no doubt be welcomed by every taxpayer in the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That all powers and duties now conferred or imposed by law upon the Comptroller of the Treasury or upon the Auditor for the Treasury Department, the Auditor for the War Department, the Auditor for the Interior Department, the Auditor for the Navy Department, the Auditor for the State and Other Departments, or the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall, so far as not inconsistent with this act, be vested in and imposed upon the accounting department and be exercised without direction from any other officer, and the balances certified by the comptroller general shall be final and conclusive upon the executive branch of the Government. The revision by the comptroller general of settlements made by the six auditors referred to in this section shall be discontinued, except as to settlements made before July 1, 1920.

Section 236 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 236. All claims and demands whatever by the United States or against them, and all accounts whatever in which the United States are concerned, either as debtors or creditors, shall be settled and adjusted in the accounting department."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this bill. While I am not as sanguine about saving millions of dollars, or any very large sum, as some gentlemen who have spoken, yet I believe it will effect economy in some directions, do away with some abuses, and fix to some extent the responsibility for expenditures.

There has been, I think, more misunderstanding with reference to a budget system in the country at large than with reference to any other question that has been before Congress. That is largely due to the extensive propaganda that has been carried on endeavoring to show that Congress was not doing its duty, and had no system of supervising accounts in this Government worth mentioning. Most of the writers and many of the witnesses that came before the committee which prepared the bill, as will be shown by the hearings, seem to have the idea that the British system is highly successful and highly popular. As a matter of fact, it is neither successful nor is it popular in England. The system which now prevails in this country at the present time, with whatever defects it may have, is vastly better than the system that prevails in Great Britain, and it is so acknowledged.

In this connection I want to correct another prevailing belief, and that is that the budget system is a cure for all the financial evils that affect our Government. It is not. It will palliate those evils. It will tend to prevent waste, but it will not strike at the greatest source of expenditures.

The expenditures of a government depend principally upon its policies and the methods by which those policies are carried out. With neither of these questions does a budget deal, except incidentally, and it touches the efficiency of government management remotely if at all. For example, the expenses of our Army and Navy depend principally upon the policy which we adopt as to whether we will have a great Army and a great Navy or only one of moderate size. They also depend on whether the Army and Navy affairs are carried on efficiently and without waste. For example, we have great numbers of automobiles and automobile trucks rusting away and being ruined because the Government has taken no steps to sell them; in fact, has refused to sell them, although it has admitted that it never will use them. So also we have a large number of vessels in the Navy being operated which ought to be junked in the same manner as England junked 150 vessels in her navy, and made a great saving thereby. But the budget system does not touch a matter of this kind. The expenses of the Agricultural Department depend largely as to whether it shall have an army of agents in various parts of the country for various purposes or whether, on the other hand, its operations shall be restricted. With such matters the budget has nothing to do. In fact, the wildest extravagance may prevail under the best budget system, and some budget plans will, as I shall hereafter show, rather tend to increase expenses than to reduce them. A large number of States have adopted a budget system, but those who have adopted a budget system are not conspicuous for economy, as a rule, and some of them are noted for the extent of their expenditures. In some of these States it has been brought about in the same manner as much of our Federal governmental expense has been caused, namely, by a multiplication of boards and commissions, which brought about a multiplication of officials and clerks. We have at Washington far more clerks than is necessary. In some departments I am satisfied that the number could be reduced one-third if the management of these departments was conducted with any degree of efficiency. But this will not be corrected by the adoption of a budget system, as is abundantly shown by the experience of such countries as England.

I want to return for a moment to the much-heralded and much-approved budget system of England. A large number of writers on this subject, and especially the author of one book that has been much quoted, regard this system as a model. Many of the witnesses that appeared before the Budget Committee seemed to have the same opinion, thereby showing their utter ignorance of the subject upon which they thought themselves competent to give Congress advice. Yet the London Times has described this system as the "road to ruin" and the English papers are filled with articles on the extravagance of the Government under its budget system. Public indignation in England has risen to such an extent that the Government has been compelled to abandon some of its extravagant schemes and policies in order to quiet the universal clamor against its extravagance. The Government, in fact, under the English budget system, makes no pretense of matching its expenditures with its revenues; and the London Economist has said that its course would "ultimately land the country in insolvency."

What has caused the failure of the English system and what is it that the English people now want? The fact is that under the English system the budget is made up by the ministry. It has one good feature about it, and that is that it prescribes a limit to the expenditures, but unfortunately this limitation does not rest upon the ministry that prepares the budget, and consequently it may be as extravagant as it wishes without any check, for, as a matter of actual practice, Parliament can not reduce the expenditures below the amount of the budget prepared by the ministry. The various items of the budget are not gone over by separate committees which work upon them for months as in this country. The details are not scrutinized by special committees, and there is no open discussion worthy of the name of the budget, for the reason that the details are never considered in Parliament as they are in our Congress, where the appropriation bills are read paragraph by paragraph, discussed, and amended after the special committees have done their best to perfect them. Under the method adopted in England the items are not first subjected to the scrutiny of special committees, and under their form of government a refusal to approve the budget would mean the fall of the ministry, necessitating either the formation of a new ministry or a dissolution of Parliament and a new election. The result has been that in the last 25 years there has not been any material change in the budget made in Parliament, and to use the words of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], Parliament has become merely a rubber stamp by which approval might be given to the budget. At the same time not a single budget has ever been submitted but what contained items of expenditure which in some cases, particularly in the last year, involved immense sums which never would have been approved if examined by a proper committee, and never could have secured the approval of Parliament if a vote could be had thereon based upon the merits of the proposition alone. As a consequence, a select committee, which was appointed by Parliament for the purpose of budget reform in England, and the most eminent writers in that country who have considered the subject, are universally in favor of adopting the leading features of the American system, believing that their adoption would, without any doubt, greatly reduce the expenditures of Great Britain.

An extensive propaganda has been carried on in this country for the purpose of making the people at large believe that Congress was chargeable with the extravagance which has prevailed in our governmental affairs, and, unfortunately, this propaganda has been very successful. Nothing could be further from the real fact. Congress is constantly engaged in a struggle with the various departments to keep down expenses. Every department chief, no matter what his politics, desires to extend the activities of his department and to multiply the number of his subordinates. He considers his particular department as one of the most important and necessary of all the various divisions of our Government operations, and to a certain extent this is creditable to him, but it invariably results in increased demands upon the Public Treasury, and often in an increased personnel for which there is no necessity. The estimates brought in by the various heads of the departments as necessary for their operation are invariably greatly reduced by Congress. It is often said that larger estimates are brought in than is necessary, because the department heads feel that Congress will reduce them anyway. It is true, although contrary to public belief, that the usual tendency of Congress is toward economy, but the department heads always have a full opportunity to show through their experts just what they need, and are never satisfied with what is given them. They appeal from the decision of the House to the Senate, where, as a rule, they get the appropriations raised, although not to the extent that they desire. In many instances, as every Member of Congress knows, they have instituted a propaganda over the country in support of provisions which would allow them to engage in new activities and new expenditures, and have even gone so far as to attempt to build up a "back fire" among the people at home against Congressmen who were not inclined to grant what they wished. The long and short of the whole matter is that a budget framed by the spending departments, which in this country constitute the administration, will always be extravagant, and the extravagance of our present Government is largely owing to the fact that although Congress has endeavored to keep the expenditures down, the insistence of the departments and the administration has had its weight and effect.

At this point I wish to call your attention to one feature which I deem a weakness in the present bill. I would have much preferred that this budget should have been framed by Congress in the first instance and not by any budget bureau, as constituted by the bill, which I very much fear would be too much under the influence of the various heads of the departments and the administration in general. If in fact it should be controlled by them, the result will not make for economy but for the reverse. It will be observed that the officers and heads of this system are to be appointed by the President in the first instance. True, the auditor created by this bill may be removed by Congress only, and to that extent he is independent of the administration, but there is a similar officer under the English system with equally extensive powers and it has been found that after all he is simply an accounting officer and does not undertake to do more than to pass upon the legality of the expenditures. I am unable to see how he will be in a position to do more. He is not given any authority to investigate, and although he may have under this bill the authority to criticize, I doubt very much his being able to definitely ascertain and prove the facts upon which such criticism should be based.

But while this bill does not in this respect meet my approval, I shall vote for it on account of its having been supported by the unanimous report of the Budget Committee, and I am willing to take it and look to the future for evidence of how it will work out. If it works well, the system will be preserved, but the committee which brought it before us practically concedes that it needs other legislation to supplement it in order to give the budget system the effect desired.

As a supplement to this bill the Budget Committee has reported a resolution which is intended to effectuate and carry out its objects. This resolution, I anticipate, will meet with more opposition than the bill which we are now considering. While it is not now before the House, it is worth while to give it some attention in advance, for unless the provisions of the present bill are supplemented by further action of Congress it will not, in my opinion, have any great effect.

This resolution provides for one single appropriating committee to take the place of all the appropriating committees which we now have, so far as their power to make appropriations is concerned. In my judgment the resolution ought not to be adopted without modifications. I do not believe it is possible for one appropriating committee to perform all the duties which are now performed by the 10 great committees which now make appropriations. I can not understand where or how they will get time to discuss estimates in detail or to master completely the various subjects that would be brought before it. I do not know how it could obtain the knowledge in detail which the members of these several committees now have with reference to the activities of the departments with which they are respectively concerned, and I am very sure that it would have no opportunity in the multitude of matters that would come before it to institute the inquiries and carry on the investigations necessary to obtain the information which such a committee ought to have to properly perform its duties. I think, however, that with an amendment to this resolution it might be made acceptable to the House and used with great benefit. When it is brought up for action thereon I shall offer an amendment providing in substance that instead of this large committee being in charge of all of the details of the appropriations it shall be simply an allocating and limiting committee with reference to the appropriations.

Its functions will be to fix the total amount which may be expended for all governmental purposes during the fiscal year and to allot the proportion thereof which may be appropriated by each committee. It would, in short, be a congressional budget committee, which revised the estimates of the budget bureau, both for the whole Government and for the separate departments. The details as to how these several amounts allocated to each committee should be expended would be left to the various appropriating committees, as now, who would be, in my judgment, better prepared and unquestionably would have far more time to devote to the details than if this one committee undertook to perform all this work. For the purpose of performing its work this budget committee of the House—for I would have it a budget committee and not an appropriating committee—would have before it all of the estimates and information furnished by the budget bureau, so that it could act quickly. Its failure, however, to act quickly would not prevent the appropriating committees from going on with their work in the usual manner.

This plan would have all of the benefits proposed by this resolution as it now stands, and it would have the immeasurable advantages of having every detail of the appropriation scanned in a manner which would be quite impossible if this duty was undertaken by a single committee, with still further opportunity for reductions in the appropriations, if possible.

The resolution providing for the appointment of a committee of 35 members to make all appropriations presents a far-reaching measure. It takes away from those who have hitherto spent months and in many cases years in familiarizing themselves with every phase of our appropriations in the past their most important powers, and all that would be left to them would be the power to authorize appropriations, not knowing whether they would be granted. The real determination of the policies of Congress would rest with this great appropriating committee, which would finally determine whether the appropriations authorized should be made.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not true that the committees familiar with the subject matters would authorize all of the appropriations and that the appropriations would be made by the appropriating committee, and the only power taken would be merely the matter of appropriations? Nothing could be appropriated unless authorized for the War Department, the Indian Department, the Navy Department, or any other department.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the appropriating committee is to be simply a ratifying committee, approving the authorizations which are made, then I see no advantages in it. It would accomplish nothing but to go through a form. If, on the other hand, it prunes and selects the appropriations, the authorizations are mere suggestions.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Authorization could be made for a specific work, but it would be for the appropriating committee to say how much should be appropriated.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then who would know best which was the proper amount, the committee who studied it and authorized it or the other committee that showed no familiarity at all with the subject?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would say it is the committee that is made up of specialists who have studied with reference to the work of a particular department, men who have been familiar with that work for years, who have made continuous study of it ever since they have been in Congress and knew every detail.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If, however, this large appropriation committee was composed of representatives from the appropriating committees of the House as now constituted, would it not meet the gentleman's objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; it would not meet my objection, because if the work was carried on as the gentleman seems to expect, it would then put the work relating to a particular department in the hands of 2 or 3 instead of 21, as the committees are now constituted, because this big committee would necessarily be divided into subcommittees. There would be two or three who would fix the appropriations; the same for the Indian Affairs; the same for the Department of Agriculture and all of the other departments; instead of a full committee as now constituted.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do not understand that the change in the rules calls for the appointment of a certain designated number from the committees, and it occurred to me that the rule should so provide.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think that would be necessary in any event, and that it would be necessary to subdivide this big appropriating committee, so that there would be as many subcommittees as there are now appropriating.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that there are some large committees to-day who do not have the power of appropriation. Take the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, for example. Their power has not been curtailed, it seems to me, to any great extent beyond the powers of committees that do have appropriating authority.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is hardly necessary that that committee should have appropriating powers, as they deal with comparatively little connected with financial matters, except possibly to make up the deficit from the Government's running of the railroads.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the war-risk insurance act was reported out by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and that carried a large appropriation, larger than the whole appropriation for the Indian affairs.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the House has generally agreed that the war-risk insurance never ought to have been given to that committee. The Committee on Interstate Commerce is a great committee, with a distinguished chairman, but it has too much to do, it is overworked, and at times unavoidably delays the business of the House.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Be that as it may, the power of the Interstate Commerce Committee has not been curtailed because it did not have appropriating power.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is curtailed, but in that particular case it would not make any difference, because any sum authorized to be expended by the War Risk must be expended and must be appropriated, but if this big committee is only to make absolutely necessary appropriations, it would not matter so much.

This appropriating committee, if limited as I propose, would not interfere with the several appropriating committees taking up in detail all of these measures and fixing the limit of expense. It would revise the budget system as it came from the director of the budget. It would determine how much the Government should expend in a single year as a total.

Mr. HASTINGS. I entirely agree, but I want to ask the gentleman, if it will not interfere with him, to discuss what these other 400 Members of Congress would do at the short session of Congress, when all the time during that session of Congress is consumed in making appropriations? What would the other 400 Members be doing?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They would wait mostly, although they would have some duties.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is no general legislation at that session, as everybody knows.

Mr. TILSON. At the present time there are only about 147 Members on these appropriating committees, to begin with. What do all the other members of the committee do? Are not the ordinary Members around them doing just as much work as anybody else? Now, why is it claimed we reduce these 147 men to complete impotence when we have a much larger number of men who have not been on such committees at all, who are very influential Members of this House and are doing good work all the time?

Mr. BLANTON. Where are they to-day?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not yield to the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Oklahoma, of course, did not speak in a literal sense of the meaning that these Members would have absolutely nothing to do, and there is a larger number on the appropriating committees than stated by the gentleman from Connecticut. They would have work to do, but not much, under the circumstances. Those on the other committees never do have the same amount of work. Did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desire me to yield?

Mr. CANNON. I just want to ask a question. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the most important committee of this House, which requires an immense deal of work and constant study to report legislation to bring revenues into the Treasury. What would my friend say to a proposition that there should be several committees called by slightly different names, instead of the Committee on Ways and Means, one to deal with revenues to come from customs, another from direct taxes, and so on and so on? That would give all something to do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, the gentleman is suggesting a proposition that nobody seems seriously to contemplate. The Ways and Means Committee, it is true, has a great amount of work on its hands, but it is unavoidable and its work can not be divided, because this committee in passing on one revenue bill must know how much all our other revenue acts would produce. If left to different committees, the total would be too much or too little. Besides, the methods of raising our revenues are so interwoven that each has a bearing on the other and they can not be separated. I could easily cite many examples. I would say also that the Ways and Means, while its work never ends, is concerned directly with the work of only one department—the Treasury. This proposed committee would deal with all departments and should be familiar with every detail in relation to them. Yet these appropriating committees as now constituted are, for the most part, considered so important and as requiring so much time from a Member who belongs to one of them that he is not permitted to be a member of any other committee.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that what I have said will not be taken as a criticism of the work of the Budget Committee. I have intended rather to assist them in their labors. The committee and its chairman are entitled to great credit for the work which they have done, and I hope that what I have said will not be taken as detracting in the least from the credit to which they are entitled. I have not entered this discussion for the purpose of criticism but rather in the hope that I might assist the committee and the House in the formation of this most important measure. If the modification which I have proposed is adopted it will, in my opinion, not only accomplish all that would be accomplished by the resolution as now drawn but would be likely to result in greater saving than the plan as now presented. The Appropriations Committee as now constituted is overworked. Its distinguished chairman, who introduced this bill, and many of the members of that committee are compelled to work night and day during the greater portion of the session. Yet their duties are only a small part of what would be cast upon this one big appropriating committee which is proposed, and it would be simply an impossibility for such a committee to give proper consideration to all of the thousands of items of our appropriation bills which now are divided among so many committees. The result would often be that not knowing and not having time to ascertain whether an appropriation, for example, for military or naval purposes could properly be reduced, it would be compelled to adopt the estimate furnished by the department, whereas the Military or Naval Committee, as the case might be, being familiar with every detail pertaining to the appropriation, is not obliged to accept the reasoning or conclusions which are presented by the departmental officials. I hope not only the Budget Committee but the whole House will give careful consideration to this modification proposed.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STEAGALL: Page 8, beginning in line 10, strike out all of section 10.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up the time of the committee unnecessarily. I had intended to offer this amendment to the preceding section but was out of the Hall for a moment when that section was voted on. If my amendment is adopted, which I hardly anticipate, it is my purpose then to move to strike out the remaining sections and the section just adopted, leaving only the last section of the bill, which should be renumbered. I do this because I for one am opposed to the life-tenure proposition involved in the creation of this office of comptroller general, and I am also opposed to authorizing the head of any department to employ as many people as he sees fit and fix their salaries without let or hindrance from the Congress, the President, or anybody else.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I rise to speak in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, from the nature of the amendments offered to this budget bill and the tone of the criticism of it, it seems to me that a few remarks under the heading of "Lest we forget" would be in order at this time. It seems to me that some of our good Democratic friends and Republican friends also ought to hark back to the last time we asked the people of the United States to elect a President of the United States. Let me refresh the memory of my Democratic friends by reading a plank in the last Democratic national platform for 1916, as follows:

ECONOMY AND THE BUDGET.

We demand careful economy in all expenditures for the support of the Government, and to that end favor a return by the House of Representatives to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee chosen by its membership, in order that responsibility may be centered, expenditures standardized and made uniform, and waste and duplication in the public service as much as possible avoided. We favor this as a practical step toward a budget system.

Let me also read a paragraph from President Wilson's address to Congress at the opening of our session on the first Monday in December, 1917——

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman permit a statement?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In just a moment. The President appealed to Congress in this language:

And I beg that the Members of the House of Representatives will permit me to express the opinion that it will be impossible to deal in any but a very wasteful and extravagant fashion with the enormous appropriations of the public money which must continue to be made if the war is to be properly sustained unless the House will consent to return to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee, in order that responsibility may be centered, expenditures standardized and made uniform, and waste and duplication as far as possible avoided.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption now?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In just a moment. I want to put in one more quotation on this subject. Now, while the Republican national platform of that year—1916—contained a good deal of what might be called—well, I will not call it bunk——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Good reading matter.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me call my Republican friends' attention to a plank in their last national platform, because if it were not meant in good faith this is a good time for the country to know it. The language is as follows:

ECONOMY AND A NATIONAL BUDGET.

The increasing cost of the National Government and the need for the greatest economy of its resources in order to meet the growing demands of its people Government service call for the severest condemnation of the wasteful appropriations of this Democratic administration and of its shameless raid on the Treasury and of its opposition and rejection of President Taft's oft-repeated proposals and earnest efforts to secure economy and efficiency through the establishment of a simple, businesslike budget system—to which we pledge our support and which we hold to be necessary to effect any real reform in the administration of national finances.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, we are putting the recommendations of the Republican national platform into execution now.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption now?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I ask for two minutes' extension.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is becoming interesting as a historian. I should not be surprised some time if he should possibly make reference to the Constitution of the United States or the Bible and possibly the Ten Commandments.

Do we understand the gentleman to say that the Republican platform was all bunk?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I did not say it was all bunk. But I do say if they do not carry out this provision in good faith that part of it at least would be.

Mr. STEAGALL. I understood the gentleman to say so, and I want him to produce the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to prove that the Democratic platform is all bunk, and then I wish to suggest that neither platform nor any platform of any party that ever held a convention ever declared for life tenure in office, or for any department of this Government having the right to appoint as many employees as it pleased.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I desire to say that the Select Committee on the Budget has heard some of the most able and distinguished people of the United States on this subject. There is not a line in this bill that has not had exhaustive consideration. And we have gone into this matter as intelligently, conscientiously, and thoroughly as any committee could. We have examined the systems of other countries and of our various State and city systems and the works of the most distinguished writers on the subject, and have come to the unanimous conclusion that these provisions, as embraced in this bill, are not only proper but necessary in order to carry out in good faith our party platform promises to the American people, and in order that we may honestly enact the pledges upon which we were elected to this Congress two years ago last fall and again last fall. Now, when our country is confronted with the frightful and appalling debt of over $26,000,000,000; when there is the most imperative need for economy in every direction; when every farseeing and patriotic citizen in this country is warning the country and Congress against waste and extravagance, and appealing for a retrenchment of expenditures in every possible way, I know that this Congress is not going to repudiate our promises to our country or to our constituents. In this dire financial situation of our Nation, I know this House will keep the faith and pass this bill substantially in the form in which the committee has brought it before the House.

Any Member of either this House or of the Senate who votes or works against this measure not only violates his party's platform but I prophesy that he will have a mighty hard time ever explaining his actions and that he will have occasion to regret it as long as he lives, and I am going to try to see that every Member of this House goes on record by a roll-call vote on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. OSBORNE: Page 9, line 4, strike out the word "them" and insert the word "it"; page 9, line 5, strike out the word "are" and insert the word "is"; page 9, line 5, strike out the word "debtors" and insert the word "debtor"; page 9, line 6, strike out the word "creditors" and insert the word "creditor."

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, this section reads as follows:

SEC. 236. All claims and demands whatever by the United States or against them, and all accounts whatever in which the United States are concerned, either as debtors or creditors, shall be settled and adjusted in the accounting department.

My amendment goes not only to the grammatical construction but to the fact. "United States" is singular and not plural. This matter was settled long ago, not only by the rules of grammar but by the rules of war. We fought four years to establish the fact that the United States is one country and not a collection of municipalities.

I submit my amendment for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from California and to the committee that our committee had nothing to do with the formulation of the language in this paragraph. The section is in all respects the present law except as we struck out the word "Treasury" in line 6 and put in the word "accounting." We have not attempted to change the language in a single particular, and when the gentleman says that we should use the word "is" instead of the word "are," and that "United States" is singular instead of plural, I call his attention to section 2 of Article III of the Constitution of the United States, where it would seem that the framers of the Constitution had about the same notion as the framers of the law which we have followed. Section 2 provides:

The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.

Now, we use the word "them" here just as the framers of the Constitution used the word "their."

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OSBORNE. Is it not a fact that the Constitution in that regard was amended between 1861 and 1865?

Mr. GOOD. That provision has never been amended.

Mr. OSBORNE. It has been amended in fact.

Mr. GOOD. That provision stands as the framers of the Constitution made it.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield? Are we not better to-day than they were?

Mr. GOOD. Well, they were pretty good. The framers of the Constitution were men of ripe scholarship; many of them had graduated in the best colleges of America, and a great many of them—31 I believe it was—had graduated from the large universities of the Old World, and they were trained in the school of statesmanship. And I have never yet, as far as I am personally concerned, been willing to quarrel with their grammar, and I am not now.

Mr. CANNON. Then the gentleman does not think that hypercriticism has any place?

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield further?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. OSBORNE. Does not the gentleman think that in a matter of this kind, if there was an error in the first place, it should be changed in enacting a new section, and that the United States is, in fact, a Nation, and should not be designated as "them" or be mentioned in the plural form? I think so.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman from California that the Congress that enacted this legislation followed the language in the Constitution. They referred here to the United States as "them," and, of course, if we use that, we must also use the plural all the way through.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on this amendment?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do. I wish to ask the gentleman a question as to what claims and demands this section relates to. It says:

All claims and demands whatever * * * shall be settled and adjusted in the accounting department.

Mr. GOOD. Of course, that has been construed a great many times by the comptroller. Those are claims and demands for the payment for which an appropriation has been made. Of course, it would have no relation to a claim or demand that necessarily had to go to the Court of Claims. It is only those that are authorized by law and for which an appropriation has been made and which can be settled under the decision of the comptroller to determine.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Of course, the Congress itself passes upon claims and demands against the Government and often authorizes their payment. It would seem that this language as it stands would authorize the accounting department to determine the question of the legal or equitable liability of the Government in some cases.

Mr. GOOD. That judicial construction has never been given by the comptroller, and this language has been on the statute books for a long time; a similar provision was carried in the law as far back as 1817. Practically that language has been on the statute books, and all we are changing now is to strike out the word "Treasury" and insert the word "accounting" instead.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The construction may have been given, but certainly the language would justify another construction. Some other comptroller or some other official might change the construction.

Mr. GOOD. We accepted that for 100 years and more. It has been on the statute books that long, and it has received judicial construction and a department construction, and all we are here attempting to do is to confer that power which the Treasury Department now has to settle claims of this character on the accounting department.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Well, I think in this bill some changes for the better have been made, and in the very framing of this bill the committee has properly disregarded precedents and departed from old customs. It seems to me the committee should have gone a little further and corrected the ambiguity and the patent mistakes in the law. I say that in connection with the amendment suggested by the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE]. I think he is entirely right in suggesting the change of those words to make them singular instead of plural, and I would suggest some change in this section, so that no other construction but the one that has been given will be possible.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the accounting officers have authority under the law to state two classes of accounts; one for which a lapsed appropriation has previously existed; the other a liability which had arisen under specific statute authorizing, for instance, the appointment of an officer, but no appropriation having been made therefor.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. But this section says "all claims and demands whatever."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That is within the range of the accounting system. That would be the construction there.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana and Mr. DOWELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire recognition?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think this budget bill is wise legislation. I think it follows along the lines of economy. In discussing the question of economy yesterday a statement was made on the floor criticizing in a mild way, but nevertheless criticizing, the demands of the bituminous coal miners for an increase in wages. I hold no brief for the United Mine Workers of America, Mr. Chairman, but I want to make a very brief statement about the underlying causes of the present dispute between the bituminous miners and operators.

In April, 1916, through their representatives the organized miners and the operators entered into a two-year contract. The wages paid labor in other industries soon went beyond the wages agreed upon in 1916, and the operators began to pay bonuses in order to attract labor to their mines and to keep up the output. The situation growing out of the payment of bonuses became so acute and unsatisfactory that the operators themselves were glad to make some arrangement by which the 1916 contract could be supplemented by a provision permitting the payment of a sufficient wage to attract labor. Hence in March, 1917, a supplementary agreement was entered into by which all contract miners were paid 10 cents per ton additional. Under this supplemental contract the machine men were advanced from 52 cents to 62 cents per ton, the men engaged in pick work were advanced from 64 cents to 74 cents per ton, and the day men were advanced from $2.98 to $3.60 per day. This contract continued in effect until November 1, 1917.

In October, 1917, the coal market was under the control of the Fuel Administration. The operators desired an increase in the price of their coal. The general wage level had rapidly risen, and Dr. H. A. Garfield, then Fuel Administrator, brought about an agreement by which the miners, effective November 1, 1917, had their wages advanced and the operators were permitted to advance the price of coal. This so-called Washington agreement made this advance: Contract miners were given 10 cents per ton additional. Thus machine men were increased from 62 cents to 72 cents per ton, pick men were increased from 74 cents to 84 cents per ton, and day men were increased so that their day wages amounted to $5 per day. Since then no further advance in wages has been made.

It will thus be seen that the total increase since April 1, 1916, more than a year before our entrance into the war, was only 20 cents per ton, or 29 per cent for pick men and 38.4 per cent for machine miners and that the day men have not been advanced beyond $5 per day, although in percentage that amounts to 68 per cent increase; the day men only include about 27 per cent of the total employees.

It is interesting in connection with these figures to know that while the advanced increase of labor was less than 44 per cent that the advanced retail sale price of coal was more than 110 per cent.

This Washington agreement contains this clause:

> This agreement is subject to and will become effective only on the condition that the selling price of coal shall be advanced by the United States Government sufficient to cover the increased cost in the different districts affected and will take effect on the first day of the pay period following the order advancing such increased prices.

The whole tenor of this Washington contract is that the coal miners should receive their proportion of the increased revenue obtained by the coal operator for the sale of his coal.

Many months ago Dr. Garfield deemed the war sufficiently over that he abandoned all restrictions upon the selling price of coal and disbanded the Fuel Administration and retired to private life. The coal operators are no longer bound by any war restrictions, and I am reliably informed that free coal is frequently sold at $2.75 per ton at the mouth of the mine and sometimes brings $4 per ton. This is in sharp contrast to the $2.35 per ton fixed at the time the Washington agreement was entered into.

The fourth clause of the Washington agreement provides that the mine workers' representatives agreed that the present contract be extended during the continuation of the war and not to exceed two years from April 1, 1918.

Actual hostilities ceased on November 11, 1918, and practically all of the bureaus organized during the war have long ago been disbanded, including the Fuel Administration. It certainly can not be contended that this agreement was meant to last until the war should technically be terminated by the exchange of peace treaties. If such be the case, it could be contended that it not only means that peace be concluded with Germany, but that it should continue until we made peace with Austria.

The United Mine Workers of America have steadfastly and faithfully observed the provisions of this contract and have waited until almost a year after the close of hostilities before asking an increase and long after the operators have ceased being hampered by governmental control.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am sorry I can not. In a Terre Haute, Ind., newspaper of last week I find an advertisement by a coal operator for men to do pick work. In the same paper is an advertisement for plasterers at $1 per hour, and an advertisement for men to work at a creosoting plant for $5 to $8 per day.

It must be remembered that coal miners frequently only get to work two or three days per week, and in computing their wages this must be taken into consideration. If this is done, it is clear to the unbiased mind that the day laborer in the coal mine is not paid a wage commensurate with the carpenter, the plasterer, bricklayer, railroad engineer, shipworker, and many laborers in other industries.

He is engaged in a dangerous occupation. For over a quarter of a century the United Mine Workers of America have, by means of collective bargaining with the coal operators, made amicable agreements for the production of coal, fair and beneficial alike to the operators, miners, and the public.

The machinery for adjusting disputes, including the present one, is still intact. In the past they have bargained and compromised and used a good supply of common sense on both sides. I am not undertaking to say that all the demands of the miners should be granted, but I have recited the above facts in order to show that it is quite within the range of practicability for an adjustment to be made of the present controversy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. GOOD. There is an amendment pending. Let us perfect the amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, while there may be some difference of opinion as to the grammatical construction of this sentence, there ought to be no difference of opinion as to what the committee has done in placing this section in the law they are asking us to enact. The committee simply quote from the old law a paragraph for the purpose of changing a word and making that law harmonize with the budget bill which we are considering. In quoting it they ought to have quoted it as it was on the statute books. They are simply seeking to amend it to make it harmonize with the present legislation, and the question of the grammatical construction of the paragraph is not, and ought not to be, before the House.

Besides, this paragraph is taken out of its context for the purpose of making this amendment. Hence in only reading it we do not get the best idea of what it means. But when we read that paragraph in its place, which is in the legislation designed to create the Treasury Department and to regulate accounting, it is easily understood then what is meant by "all claims against the Government," made by the Government or against the Government, shall be settled in this department. It is simply a part of the mechanism by which accounts in the Treasury Department shall be settled, so that in the consideration of this measure we ought not to concern ourselves with the grammatical construction of the sentence but let us perfect it in order to make it harmonize with the scope and purpose of this bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOWELL. What is the necessity for inserting an accounting department instead of the Treasury Department?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Why, the very purpose of this bill is to create an accounting department that shall be independent of all the executive departments of the Government. If these accounts are to be settled in the Treasury Department, it would maintain the old régime, whereas striking out the word "Treasury" and inserting the word "Accounting" would bring this law into harmony with the budget scheme.

Mr. DOWELL. But in this amendment do you not add to the accounting department another duty, aside from accounting? As I understand it, under the budget system you are establishing an accounting department that has for its purpose the accounting of all accounts of all the departments of the Government. In this you put the duty upon the accounting department of settling claims both for and against the United States, entirely a different duty. Who has the accounting of that department after it has been passed upon by the accounting department? Could it not be done by the Treasury Department as well as by the auditing department, to check it up?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No. If the gentleman will refer to section 10 of this proposed measure, he will find the provision there, as follows:

All powers and duties now conferred or imposed by law upon the Comptroller of the Treasury or upon the Auditor for the Treasury Department—

Shall be exercised, and so forth.

Mr. DOWELL. I understand that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Now, you want to make this old law harmonious with that. Hence, you strike out the word "Treasury" and relieve them from this accounting and auditing, and put it where it belongs, in this general auditing department created under this budget bill.

Mr. GOOD. And the Comptroller of the Treasury is the man who has been functioning with regard to this provision of the statute all along.

Mr. DOWELL. That is true; but it is all done in the name of the Treasurer, and can it not be done in the same manner with this accounting department? And is there any difference now from the old system of the Treasurer making these settlements both for and against the Government, when they have the accounting department here to determine the exact amount of it? And is there any difference now in the plan, under this new controlling system and under the old?

Mr. GOOD. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I move to strike out the last three words of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas). That would be an amendment in the third degree. The gentleman can get in on the next section. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amendment by Mr. OSBORNE: Page 9, line 4, strike out the word "them" and insert the word "it"; page 9, line 5, strike out the word "are" and insert the word "is"; page 9, line 5, strike out the word "debtors" and insert the word "debtor"; page 9, line 6, strike out the word "creditors" and insert the word "creditor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the offices of the six auditors enumerated in section 10 shall be abolished, to take effect July 1, 1920, but the then incumbents of those offices shall be transferred, at their present salaries, to become officers of the accounting department. All other officers and employees of these offices shall become officers and employees in the accounting department at their grades and salaries on July 1, 1920. All books, records, documents, papers, furniture, office equipment, and other property of these offices shall become the property of the accounting department. The accounting department shall occupy the rooms now occupied by the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury and the six auditors referred to in section 10 until otherwise provided.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I do this, however, to discuss another subject.

If I understood the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], he was speaking in favor of the contention of the miners who are now threatening a Nation-wide strike on November 1. If I understood the first contention that was made by these men in their demands upon their employers, it was to decrease the hours of the workday, so that the work day should consist of only six hours. If that should be granted it would of itself decrease the production 25 per cent.

I understand further that the next contention was that the work week should be five days instead of six; in other words, that in working a week and receiving pay for a week, the men should work only five days, and should have two days off out of the week. If that had been granted by their employers, it of itself would have decreased the output and the production another 16⅔ per cent, making a total decrease in production of 41⅔ per cent. These contentions are expected to take effect, and if not granted the strike is to ensue, on the 1st day of November, when the cold weather has set in from one side of this country to the other.

Mr. DOWELL. I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not talking upon the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, if the gentleman does not want to permit me to answer the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], he has a right to hold me down to the pro forma amendment, but I hope he will permit me to speak on this subject for a few minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman surely is not in favor of having women and little children freeze to death in this country during December, January, and February.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is clearly out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. DOWELL. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I will try to hold myself within the scope of the pro forma amendment. This particular section, Mr. Chairman, is embraced within a new piece of legislation before the House proposed to reduce the expenses of the Government. If the committee are warranted in their assertion, it will save expense to this Government. I want to say that the first thing we must consider in saving expense to this Government is instead of decreasing production to increase production. That has been the trouble with this country, and that has been the trouble with Congress all along, that we have sat here in our seats supinely, month after month, and have permitted the production of the country to be decreased all the time, instead of taking steps, instead of lending our voices to a proposition that would bring about the maximum production in this country. You can not bring about maximum production by decreasing the hours of the workday from eight to six, and you can not bring about maximum production in this country by decreasing the work week from six days to five days.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I renew my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 9, line 11, after the word "at," strike out the words "their present," and after the word "salaries," in line 11, insert "of $4,000 each," so that as amended it will read:

"SEC. 11. That the offices of the six auditors enumerated in section 10 shall be abolished, to take effect July 1, 1920, but the then incumbents of those offices shall be transferred, at salaries of $4,000 each, to become officers of the accounting department."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, four of the auditors at present receive $4,000 per annum. Two of them receive $5,000 per annum. Under the act of 1894 their salaries were uniform, and under the law prior to that time uniform salaries prevailed. Political exigency brought about an increase of the salary of the Auditor for the War Department $1,000 a year some years ago, so that since that time that auditor has been receiving $5,000. A like political exigency and personal favoritism brought about an increase of the salary of the Auditor for the Post Office Department from $4,000 to $5,000.

My amendment proposes to restore the uniform rule that had prevailed during the greater portion of the history of the country, and to make these salaries all alike at $4,000 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the comptroller general shall appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees in the department as may from time to time be provided for by Congress, and perform all other duties of a head of an independent Government establishment. All such appointments, except to positions carrying a salary of $5,000 a year, shall be made from lists of eligibles furnished by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service laws and regulations. No person appointed by the comptroller general shall be paid a salary in excess of $5,000 a year, and not more than three persons appointed by him shall be paid a salary at that rate. Until March 5, 1921, no person who at the time of the passage of this act holds office as one of the six auditors referred to in section 10, and who in pursuance of section 11 is transferred to the accounting department, shall be removed from office or have his compensation reduced, except for cause. All officers and employees of the department, whether transferred to the department in pursuance of section 11 or appointed by the comptroller general, shall perform such duties as may be assigned to them by the comptroller general. The comptroller general shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for carrying on the work of the department.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 21, after the word "appoint," insert the word "and"; after the word "remove," in line 22, strike out the words "and fix the compensation of."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to prevent the comptroller general from fixing the salaries of the officers and employees in his department. I do not know why we Members of Congress should shift this function to the comptroller general. We do know that this power has been abused for years, and especially during the last two years. We find in one department of the Government where ordinary men of $1,200 a year capacity have been paid salaries by the Secretary of Labor ranging up to $10,000 a year.

Let me bring one illustration from another department to your attention. There is no man in this House who thinks more than I do of the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Sherley. There is no man in this House who has rendered more valuable work for his country as chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations than that gentleman from Kentucky. He did it on a salary of $7,500 a year. He sought in the last election to be permitted to continue that valuable service for his country on a salary of only $7,500 a year. If he had been reelected he would be in this House to-day rendering the same kind of valuable services to his country for only $7,500 a year.

And yet as soon as he went out of office he was placed immediately by Director General Hines in the railroad office down here and paid a salary of $25,000 a year. I want to say that we can not depend on our heads of departments to use good judgment in fixing salaries of officers and employees in their departments. If the distinguished and able gentleman from Kentucky, whom we all love, admire, and respect, was willing of his own accord, voluntarily, to offer his services to the Government for the coming two years at $7,500 a year—the very best service there was in him—why should he be paid for rendering no better service—because no man could render better service than Swagar Sherley rendered in the House last year—if he was willing to render the best service of which a man is capable for the coming two years at $7,500, why should he be paid out of the people's Treasury $25,000? Why should he be paid twice the salary of a Cabinet officer? No reason except that we failed to do our duty in retaining our proper function to fix salaries.

I want to say to my good friends on the other side of the aisle that if you mean what you say, that you want to retrench expenses, if you were sincere in your promise to the people that you would retrench and see that the expenses of the Government were decreased, why will you put into a measure you have brought in a provision leaving it in the comptroller general's power to fix salaries of his own employees and officers in his department?

I know there is a provision in the bill to the extent of fixing a maximum limit on it, but there is still power to fix the compensation, a function which this Congress should exercise, and only the Congress.

I want to say that the time should be here when we should quit passing the buck; we ought to assume the responsibilities of our own positions; and as one Member of Congress I am not yet ready to turn the power and responsibility that is in this Congress over to the head of some department. I hope this provision will be stricken out, though I am hoping in vain, as I realize that on same I will vote in a hopeless minority of probably one.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Texas in support of his amendment, I wish to state in opposition to it that the law already makes it impossible for the comptroller general to exercise any considerable range of discretion in fixing the salaries of clerks and employees in these offices. Nearly all the clerks and employees in these offices now have fixed statutory salaries. There is, perhaps, a very small number under the charge of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, in relation to a minor character of work, that do not have a fixed statutory salary. That is small, however, and hardly worthy of consideration.

After the transfer is made, as proposed in this bill, the statutory salaries will remain and the appropriations stand for those salaries. The comptroller will have the same authority and power then that the head of a department has now to promote from the lower grades in the office to higher statutory salaries, and he will have no power unless Congress abolishes the law fixing statutory salaries and give a lump sum, which I am very sure it will not do. The idea that there is danger here of a wrong exercise of power is misplaced because of the fact that the statutory salaries exist.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. VAILE. If salaries are fixed by statute, why is it necessary here to provide in this act, line 22, that the comptroller general shall appoint, remove, and fix a compensation of such officers and employees, and so forth?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. He may appoint to the statutory salaries; he may promote a clerk from $1,200 to $1,400 or $1,500, and he can fix the salary within those limits when he does so. But unless Congress should give him a lump-sum appropriation, out of which he could fix salaries at his own discretion, he will not be able to exercise the power. He does not now have the appropriation to do anything of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 1 aye and 59 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the comptroller general shall investigate, at the seat of government or elsewhere, all matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of public funds, and shall make to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, a report in writing of the work of the accounting department, containing recommendations concerning the legislation he may deem necessary to facilitate the prompt and accurate rendition and settlement of accounts and concerning such other matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of public funds as he may think advisable. He shall make such investigations and reports as shall be ordered by either House of Congress or by any committee of either House having jurisdiction over revenue, appropriations, or expenditures. The comptroller general shall also, at the request of any such committee, direct assistants from his office to furnish the committee such aid and information as the committee may request.

All departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, offices, agencies, or other establishments of the Government, except the legislative branch and the Supreme Court, shall furnish to the comptroller general such information regarding the powers, duties, activities, organization, financial transactions, and methods of business of their respective offices as he may from time to time require of them; and the comptroller general, or any of his assistants or employees when duly authorized by him, shall, for the purpose of securing such information, have access to and the right to exmaine any books, documents, papers, or records of any such department, bureau, board, commission, office, agency, or other establishment. The authority contained in this paragraph shall not be applicable to expenditures made under the provisions of section 291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Page 11, line 11, after the period in line 11, add "the comptroller general shall specially report to the House every expenditure or contract made by any head of a department in any year in excess of the appropriation to such department and in violation of law."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is intended to effectuate the very purpose and object of a budget system. A budget system is intended to have the Government of the United States live carefully and economically within its estimated revenues. We have a law requiring that no department head shall exceed the appropriation made to the department in any of the expenditures of the department or in the making of contracts that would go beyond the appropriations. It is made an offense to do so. No one seems to pay much attention to it, however. Of course, during the war period we all passed it by without question, because the terrible exigency that confronted us required such treatment, and in every case of extreme condition like that the same treatment would in all probability be accorded. It does seem to me, however, there ought to be a requirement on the part of the comptroller general to lay before Congress every infraction of this existing law, so that Congress may take notice of it and act upon it or pass it by, as it deems proper.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Surely.

Mr. GARD. I am in thorough accord with the purpose of the gentleman's amendment. I call his attention to his amendment. It provides that the comptroller general shall make this report to the House. Does not the gentleman mean that he shall report to the Congress?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; the criticism is well taken. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert, instead of the word "House," the word "Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the modification will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman's amendment, but am wondering whether or not it would interfere with a practice the Congress has permitted some heads of departments, to divert money from one appropriation to another. In the framing of the bill for the Department of Agriculture it is usual to permit the Secretary under some conditions to divert 10 per cent of one fund to another use in his line of work. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] should be adopted, would not such provisions be impossible? If it were made unlawful for the Secretary to exceed under any circumstances the amount of money appropriated for a particular use, would it not make impossible the giving of authority to divert a portion of one appropriation to another use?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Is not a transfer required to be authorized before it can be made from one department to another?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. This is not a transfer from one department to another, but from one purpose to another in the same department, and appropriation bills themselves permit such transfer. My inquiry is, Would this amendment if adopted make such legislation as we have many times enacted be permitted?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Would not the same reason and objection apply to that, and, therefore, that would not be an expenditure in excess of the appropriation and in violation of law.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It would be in excess of the appropriation. The gentleman is aware that many of the appropriation bills are prepared by paragraphs, each one setting out a particular line of work to be carried on by the department, and the amount of money available for that particular purpose is stated in the paragraph. There are many of those, and the total amount carried by the bill is the footing of the amounts of the different paragraphs. Some of the appropriation bills carry authority to the Secretary under certain circumstances to take from one appropriation 10 per cent of its amount and use it for some other purpose. That is permitted by law. His use of money in that way would not be contrary to law, but it would be a use of money in excess of the appropriation made for the particular purpose. Under a narrow interpretation of the amendment offered by the gentleman, might not the Secretary find himself unable to take advantage of that ordinary provision?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I do not believe that construction would be placed upon it. After all, it is all done by authority of law. By authority of law the Secretary is permitted to transfer from one appropriation an amount not more than 10 per cent for some other service in his department.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It is in excess of the amount of money appropriated for that purpose forbidden by the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GOOD. It is not when you take the whole law together—that he could not only use the exact sum but 10 per cent of another sum for that purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Was not that done only for duration of the war and in one department?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No; the Agricultural bills have carried that provision for a longer period than the gentleman thinks.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is only in the Agricultural Department that it does apply.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I know of it in that department.

Mr. GOOD. It also obtains in the Reclamation Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported as modified?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment as modified.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 11, after the period, in line 11, add:
"The comptroller general shall specially report to the Congress every expenditure or contract made by any head of a department in any year in excess of the appropriation to such department and in violation of law."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I can not believe that the construction referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] would be applied to this amendment. I think there is good in the amendment and I am inclined to accept it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any objection to the amendment offered, and I think it ought to be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUCE: Page 10, line 22, strike out the first "and" and insert after the word "disbursement" the words "and application"; page 11, line 3, strike out the word "and"; and in line 4, after the word "disbursement," insert the words "and application."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, this is the first of a group of amendments I submit for the attention of the committee in the hope that if the measure as now written does not accomplish its purpose fully these amendments will contribute something thereto. I want to add my name to those recorded as expressing gratitude to the committee for the great service it has rendered to the Congress and to the Nation. The report of the hearings, to which I have devoted much time, strikes me as the most valuable contribution to political science that has of late come from any press, and I want to put into the RECORD this statement in order that students of political science may have their attention directed to it and may profit by the great mass of information and suggestion which it contains. Also, I want to express my personal gratitude to the gentlemen of the committee for bringing out so clearly in their questions and statements in those hearings the defense of Congress against the multifarious assaults of uninformed critics. It would be well worth the while of the House to have this defense segregated from the rest of the volume and by some skillful writer put into readable form. This judgment, I think, may assure the gentlemen of the committee of my complete sympathy with what they have attempted to accomplish. But after earnest study, after reading their bill again and again, I fail to find that they anywhere have expressed in it what they gave us to understand was its purpose. They told us that in here creating two new agencies, one a bureau of the budget and the other a comptroller general, they desired to secure study and criticism of the operations of government which would accrue to the common advantage. Let me cite for example the words of their chairman in his own report:

The comptroller could and would be expected to criticize extravagance, duplication, and inefficiency in executive departments.

We want the comptroller to do that. We are passing this law in order that he shall do that, but there is not one word in the bill which tells him to do that. There is not one word in the bill which tells the budget bureau to do that. It may be that I am treading on dangerous ground, that there is some practical reason why this bill was written without anywhere giving a concrete and specific definition of the duties of these officers. Fools rush in where angels fear to tread, and possibly I am approaching something that the committee has considered and perhaps not thought wise to put into the bill. If its members will show me anywhere in it a clear statement of what these officers are to do in the way of criticism I will gladly withdraw my suggestions of amendment, suggestions offered not in hostility but for the purpose of illuminating what seem to me should be the very heart and center of this measure. Sir, the other day I referred on the floor of this House to my Sabine farm, and if my friend the chairman of the committee would go down there with me I would take him through the portals of my barn and would show him hanging on the wall a hoe and rake, a stub scythe—the same one I stuck in the hornet's nest—a pruning knife and pruning shears, and all the other instruments for getting rid of wasteful growth. Then if he were a candidate for work on my farm, what would you think if I turned my back on him and went out of the door without saying another word? An employer under those circumstances, after showing those instruments of work, would say, "Now go to it."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LUCE. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LUCE. My desire is that we shall get into this bill a declaration to those men "to go to it," to exercise criticism. In his speech on this bill, a most admirable speech, which I hope will get into general circulation, the chairman stated:

> Men will be employed as auditors who will owe their positions to their training and ability and who do not secure their positions as reward for political services. They will be fearless in their examinations—

And so forth.

Yet nowhere does the bill itself say they are to be fearless in their examinations, or, indeed, that they are to make any examinations at all for critical purposes. In the course of the hearings a member of the committee [Mr. GARNER] said:

> I agree with you that that is what ought to be had. There should be in the executive branch of the Government some adverse agency to scrutinize every estimate that is made, with discretion to recommend to the President that the estimates be cut down.

There is not in the bill a single intimation that the bureau of the budget is to make any such recommendation. Everything to the effect that these things are to be done is a matter of inference and implication.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I do.

Mr. JUUL. I would ask the gentleman if he does not think section 13 covers the subject matter, where, in line 20, it states:

> That the comptroller general shall investigate at the seat of Government or elsewhere all matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of public funds, and shall make the Congress, at the beginning of each regular session—

And so forth.

Mr. LUCE. I think that is entirely by indirection. There is nowhere any statement that he is to apply the results of his investigations. Let me point out further. This section begins by providing that the comptroller general is to investigate all matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of public funds. From time immemorial the word "disbursement" has in the popular significance implied a restriction to the paying out of money, a purely ministerial function with no exercise of judgment. I am reminded of the anecdote of the schoolboy who was writing an examination paper on physiology. He was told to state what he knew about brains, and he said, "Brains are the most precious part of the human anatomy, and therefore we ought to be exceedingly sparing in their use." [Laughter.]

The trouble with this section is that it does not require the use of brains in the way of exercising the critical faculty.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman must have overlooked the fact that we are taking over the duties of the comptroller and auditor's offices, under which they are operating to-day, and there is a law defining the duties of the comptroller and auditor already in existence, and there is no necessity for repeating it in this bill.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, in the hearings on this subject there was frequent quotation from authorities upon the English system, and all the inference is that this system before you was borrowed from and modeled upon the English system.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not true, though. We did not model it on anything except the facts in the case.

Mr. LUCE. May I before going further—because I do not wish to take the time of the House uselessly—ask the chairman of the committee if it is his intention that the comptroller general shall criticize?

Mr. GOOD. It certainly is.

Mr. LUCE. That is just what the English comptroller general does. It is insured that he shall criticize. He is not a mere ministerial officer. As Mr. Collins told the committee, he inquires into questions of legality, regularity, extravagance. He is the critic and he represents the House of Commons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Texas that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I had read from Mr. Collins's statement that in England the comptroller general is the critic; that is to say, the faultfinder, the man looking for trouble; but in this bill, according to the intimation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], it is not clear that he is to be a critic. The gentleman from Illinois says you are taking over certain functions that are now provided by law. Those functions have never been considered as including criticism. Are we to say that the gentleman from Iowa is right or the gentleman from Illinois is right? Is this official to criticize or not to criticize? And when you put a man in that position and he looks to the law for his guidance, where would he find any instruction that he is to criticize?

I speak advisedly in this matter, because experience in my own State fortifies me. Some years ago we provided a finance commission in the city of Boston. It stands outside of the city government. It is a censorious body, which makes its whole duty to find fault with what is done in administering the public affairs of the city of Boston. It worked so well that we created a similar body for the State of Massachusetts. At first that did not function usefully, and then we replaced it with a supervisor of administration, who now excellently performs the duties of a censor. It is his business to find fault, and he, with a large corps of assistants, spends the whole year in studying the departments in order to find fault and tell where money can be saved.

Now, that is what these gentlemen have assured us they meant to do, so far as we may follow the words of the chairman of the committee, and I accept his judgment in the matter. But I point out to you that this has not been done. For instantly the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes a statement raising a doubt as to whether we have conferred such duties on this official.

All I am asking is, if you mean to authorize this man to criticize, to study, and investigate for the purpose of securing economy, that the committee shall, if they do not approve my way of directing it, suggest some way of their own, so that no man when he goes into that office can rely upon the statute and say, "This law imposed on me but a purely ministerial function, made me a human adding machine, and my only duty is to total up the figures that are laid before me and to transmit them to the Congress."

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. However valuable the gentleman's suggestions may be, do they not come too late, for after a measure is reported here to the Committee of the Whole House by one of the committees, is it not a good deal like the law of the Medes and Persians—unchangeable?

Mr. LUCE. Should I to-day or ever submit to this House a proposal that does not commend itself to a majority of the House and to at least a part of the committee, I shall feel that I have made a mistake and shall waive my own judgment. If I can not prove to the committee that the addition of a few words of injunction will make it clear beyond any question that they mean to create a censoring office, then I will withdraw these amendments and ask no further attention to them.

The first of these amendments contemplates adding to the present phraseology "receipt and disbursement," the word "application," so that we shall say that the comptroller general shall investigate the receipt and disbursement—that is, the ministerial act of paying out the money—and shall also investigate the application of the funds; in other words, make it clear to him that he is to examine how these funds are used. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the gentleman's remarks with great interest, because I have a very high opinion of his ability and judgment. If by adding the words we are strengthening the arm of the comptroller general to make a more thorough examination, to search into an expenditure, and see whether or not money is being paid out in violation of law or uselessly expended, then I would have no objection, of course, to the adoption of the amendment. I am not real sure that I have any objection as it is. But let us see whether or not it really strengthens the provision in that respect. The law provides, Revised Statutes, section 3678:

All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no other.

No executive has the power under that provision of the law to spend a single dollar of appropriation except for the purposes for which the appropriation is made. Now, keeping that provision in mind, let us read the provision found in section 13 of the bill:

That the comptroller general shall investigate, at the seat of government or elsewhere, all matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of public funds, and shall make to Congress—

And so forth.

Now, the gentleman would insert the words "and application," so that it will read, "The comptroller general shall investigate at the seat of government or elsewhere all matters relating to the receipt, disbursement, and application of public funds." I want to submit to the gentleman that the investigation of all matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of the public funds includes any application that shall be made of them.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose the disbursements have been made in California, in Texas, and everywhere else. Are we to have an army of people to go down there or out there and see that the work was done? Is that what the gentleman means?

Mr. GOOD. No. The gentleman does not have reference to that particularly. It is the contention of the gentleman by this amendment simply, as I understand it, to give the comptroller more power in the way of criticizing expenditures that have been made. It is his point that the words we have employed, giving the comptroller the power to investigate matters relating to the receipt and disbursement, does not in itself imply the power to criticize and to make an investigation as a foundation for criticism.

Now, in referring to the dictionary I find the definition best fitted to the word "application" used here is "specific use," and I take it that is what the gentleman has in mind in offering the amendment here; that the comptroller general shall not only investigate the receipts and expenditures, but the specific use for which the expenditures have been made. That brings us again back to this section of the Revised Statutes that I read, that "sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the object for which they are respectively made, and no other"; and the comptroller general would not be worth his salt if he believed that moneys were used for a specific use not provided for in the appropriation and did not report it to Congress and hold that an expenditure under it could not be made at all. If he failed to do it he would be removable from office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 66.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to offer another amendment?

Mr. LUCE. Yes. I have several amendments relating to the same subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUCE: Page 11, line 4, insert after the word "advisable" a new sentence as follows: "In such regular report or in special reports at any time when Congress is in session he shall make recommendations looking to greater economy or efficiency in public expenditure."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire recognition?

Mr. LUCE. Yes, Mr. Chairman. Even if every one of these amendments shall be voted down, I trust a service will have been rendered by putting into the RECORD a statement by gentlemen representing the committee regarding their purpose, in order that reference may be made to it in the performance of the duties of this new office, so that it may be very clear what the committee intended.

If you look at the bill you will find that its first section requires a report in writing with recommendations concerning legislation that the comptroller general may deem necessary to facilitate a proper and accurate rendition and settlement of accounts, and concerning such other matters relative to the receipt and disbursement of the public funds as he may think advisable. The critical function on the part of the comptroller is wholly covered by the words "such other matters," leaving it entirely to his own judgment as to whether he shall recommend in matters of economy and efficiency or not. It may be that the words "such other matters" adequately meet the exigency, but if they do not meet the exigency I respectfully suggest that the explanatory sentence which I have proposed will throw light upon what Congress expects from this law.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again reported, if the Chair please.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Th Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUCE: Page 11, line 9, after the word "committee," insert the words "or the bureau of the budget." Page 11, line 10, after the word "committee," insert the words "or bureau." Page 11, line 11, after the word "committee," insert the words "or bureau."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, as the bill now stands, I can discover no connection between the bureau of the budget and the comptroller general. Apparently the comptroller general is to deal directly with Congress, and there is nowhere that I can discover any provision that the ideas or discoveries of the comptroller general shall be put at the command of the bureau of the budget in order that the President may be assisted in shaping his recommendations. This complete separation of these two branches may not have been intended by the committee. If no fundamental objection presents itself for putting the comptroller general's office at the service of the bureau of the budget, I trust the committee will consent that the bureau of the budget may profit by the investigations, observations, studies, and criticisms of the comptroller general; and until I learn whether or not that seems objectionable to the chairman I will not comment further on the proposal.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, it was the opinion, I think, of everyone who appeared before the committee that the ideal system of Government finance, so far as appropriations and expenditures go, embraces two distinct and separate functions. In the first place, it is the duty of the office that pays out the money to make an estimate of what its requirements will be. Congress acts upon that estimate. Then comes this separate and distinct office, semijudicial in character, which determines whether or not expenditures made are legal, and then audit the account. That department is intended as a check against extravagance. That department is intended to have a reflex influence upon the bureau of the budget. The bureau will know at all times that that department is watching it, and that for every appropriation that is made there will have to be a legitimate use.

Now, the gentleman's amendment brings in a new element. It would tie up these two separate things together. I do not believe there should be the closest relations between the two departments. I have found that when a man goes into a lawsuit it is just as well not to tell the opposite side what your testimony is before it is submitted to the jury. And so, in presenting the matter of the budget the President ought to be required at all times to present only a budget that he can justify, knowing that if he does not present a budget that he can justify in every particular Congress will attack it and that Congress will require the bureau of the budget to show how the expenditure of money asked for is necessary. It seems to me that with these checks and balances against estimates and expenditures Congress will be placed in a position to judge as to the necessity for expenditures at all times. The amendment would give the Executive a power over the audit and control that it is not the intention or theory of the bill that the Executive shall have at all. If it is to be the office of criticism, of course it should be friendly criticism, intelligent criticism, but it ought not to be a mock trial. It ought to be upon real and substantial facts that are developed, and only in that way will it function in a healthy and economical manner, in my opinion.

Mr. LUCE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LUCE. We are getting just what I am seeking, a record of what the committee means. Now, let us put a concrete proposition. Supposing the comptroller general ascertains that in some one of these buildings down here, in some department, 100 employees are at work where 50 could do the job. Under his program nothing is to be done about that until report is made to Congress. Does the gentleman see any objection to informing the bureau of the budget of that fact, in order that the President may prune his estimates accordingly?

Mr. GOOD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the appropriation has already been made, and the next estimate will be pruned, because the comptroller general will call the attention of Congress to the matter in his report, and the comptroller general will go before the committee having jurisdiction of that appropriation and will point out the fact that there is an expenditure that is useless and worthless and that ought to be eliminated.

Mr. LUCE. But, Mr. Chairman, the report of the comptroller general is to come in here on the day that Congress opens, while the budget must be prepared weeks in advance. What is the objection to allowing the bureau of the budget to learn of the waste and extravagances and the opportunities for retrenchment that have come to the knowledge of the comptroller general?

Mr. GOOD. The bureau of the budget will learn that fact.

Mr. LUCE. How?

Mr. GOOD. Just a few examples of the kind that the gentleman has called attention to, when they are exploded on the floor of the House or by the report of the comptroller general, will make the bureau of the budget more efficient, and unless you have that power to enforce efficiency I do not believe you will get efficiency. Besides, the fiscal year will only have about six months to run after the report of the comptroller is made.

Mr. LUCE. May I ask one question more?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LUCE. Do I understand that you contemplate that the bureau of the budget shall be a criticizing body?

Mr. GOOD. No; the bureau of the budget is the body that initiates the estimates. It may be that it will criticize certain departments and expenditures to the President, but not so far as its published reports or public criticism are concerned. I do not see how that can be its function.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman brings it out very clearly that the bureau of the budget is not to criticize. The comptroller general is to criticize, but the criticisms made by the comptroller general are not to be put at the command of the bureau of the budget, and therefore will not affect the estimates laid before them, but are to be retained for the information of Congress.

Mr. GOOD. Of course, if the bureau of the budget is worth anything at all, it will have to indulge in a great deal of criticism that goes to the President at all times, but the bureau of the budget does not make reports, except a request for appropriations through the President. That is not a criticism, but a request for the appropriation of money, and in that request for appropriation there is no place for criticism, because the President will submit what he thinks is an ideal plan and an estimate of appropriation for only those things that are absolutely necessary.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that under the provision on page 3 the bureau of the budget, the director and the assistant can confer and consult with or get any information they desire from the comptroller general, and the comptroller general will have to give it to them.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, that did not escape my attention; but if the gentleman will read subsection (b) he will find that the power of the bureau of the budget in that particular is restricted to the operation of the department itself. He may investigate the way the comptroller general is doing the work.

Mr. KITCHIN. He must investigate and give any information concerning it which he has.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman show me that point?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman will see it for himself if he will read it.

Mr. LUCE. I have read it, but I do not see what the gentleman says.

Mr. KITCHIN. It says:

(b) All departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, offices, agencies, or other establishments of the Government, except the legislative branch and the Supreme Court, shall furnish to the President such information regarding the powers, duties, activities, organizations, financial transactions, and methods of business of their respective offices as he may from time to time require of them.

Could not the President require of the comptroller general any information regarding his duties? And if he finds that there are 100 offices down here that should be dispensed with, can not the President get that information from him, and would he not give that information to the President, and then could not the President authorize the bureau of the budget to check all of that information? The succeeding lines say:

And the director of the bureau of the budget, or any of his assistants or employees, when duly authorized by the President shall, for the purpose of securing such information, have access to and the right to examine any books, documents, papers, or records of any such department, bureau, board, commission, office, agency, or other establishment.

Mr. LUCE. My own study of the section does not lead me to the conclusion that they can do what the gentleman thinks they can do.

Mr. KITCHIN. Could they not do it?

Mr. LUCE. I do not believe it can be honestly twisted to that purpose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Whether that is the purpose or not, under that language could they not get any information from the comptroller general that he had, and would it not be for the President to call upon the comptroller general or for the director of the budget to call on the comptroller general for any information that he had, and would it not be the duty of the comptroller general under that language to give it to them?

Mr. LUCE. If that was done, the comptroller general would do the very thing that the gentleman from Iowa says he does not want done. We can not have in both fish and fowl. It must be one thing or the other.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am trying to show the gentleman what the act says he must do. I think the gentleman will find that language, if he reads it very carefully, covers his proposition.

Mr. LUCE. I have read it several times.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment, because I think it would be in harmony with section 3, but I do not think it is necessary while section 3 remains in the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say by my answer that I would not have the comptroller advance any decision when requested. He does that every day and will continue to do it. The proposition of the gentleman is that the comptroller general shall, at the request of the bureau of the budget, send all his force there, if necessary, to direct assistants, to furnish it with information at any time. I think that would disorganize the comptroller's office.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that the bureau of the budget is simply a clerical force placed at the disposal of the President of the United States to furnish him with information as to how he shall make up the estimates for expenditures to be required for the conduct of the Government for any given year. There is no reason why the clerical force of the President for that purpose should be authorized to require the Comptroller and the Auditor of the Treasury to furnish it with information. The purpose of the clerical force of the President is to acquire what information it can by study of the departments. I apprehend that it will be the purpose of such a bureau as is to be furnished to the President to require of every bureau in the Government every particle of information that can be obtained to tell what the needs of the bureau may be.

On the other hand, it will be the function of the comptroller and auditor to supply the Congress, that is to be the critic of the administrative branch of the Government under this law, with such information as will enable it to intelligently criticize the acts of the administration.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The President could at any time get the information.

Mr. MADDEN. Undoubtedly he could get it without asking for it, because section 3 of the bill provides amply for furnishing such information as is provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

There is no disposition on the part of the committee to prevent the administrative branch of the Government from getting information. But the purpose is to separate the comptroller and auditor from the executive branch of the Government and leave it free as an instrumentality through which the legislative branch of the Government can get information which it has not been able to get heretofore, and thus leave the people's representatives to criticize any waste or extravagance of the administration by whomever it may be presided over.

And so I say that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is not only unnecessary, but I think it will be unwise to adopt it. It is unnecessary because the law already contemplates that the information shall be furnished by the comptroller and auditor in section 3, but it would be unwise to adopt it because it ties the executive and the legislative hand and foot through the comptroller and the auditor, and that is exactly what we want to avoid.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 11, after the word "request," insert a new sentence, as follows: "On a date to be fixed by the President he shall annually make a report to the bureau of the budget pointing out where appropriations may be reduced without injury to the public service, or where expenditure may be incurred for the sake of ultimate gain in economy or efficiency."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Is it not true that the committee has already adopted an amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] at this place?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not remember whether the language is the same, but the Chair's recollection is that the amendments are very similar.

Mr. GARD. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts should follow the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to have his amendment submitted, although it is almost in the same language. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to press his amendment?

Mr. LUCE. I do, Mr. Chairman. I desire to press the amendment in order that I may still further insure that the Congress contemplates doing the thing which it was advised not to do by the specialists who appeared before the committee. Mr. Collins pointed out to the committee that the first of the three weaknesses of the British audit system is that the comptroller does not report contemporaneously with the discovery of irregularity. The attempt to separate the comptroller general from the bureau of budget is strictly contrary to the experience of England. It also is directly contrary to what was recommended to the committee by Gov. Lowden, of Illinois, who appeared before the committee and pointed out the value of the Illinois system. It is contrary to the experience of Massachusetts. It seems to me unfortunate that the committee should thus hamper the attempt to put at the command of the Executive as well as of Congress all the benefits of studies, investigations, and criticisms. Of course I expect that the amendment will be rejected, but in order that at some future occasion we may look back upon this amendment and determine which of us was right I present the amendment, still wishing that the committee would permit the President to know regularly and promptly all the discoveries and opinions of the comptroller general.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman, I think, forgets or overlooks the fact that the comptroller general is required to make his report to Congress. The President has that report, and the bureau of the budget has that report.

Mr. LUCE. Pardon me, but does the President have it before he puts in his budget?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no. He has it at the same time that the President puts in his report.

Mr. LUCE. Then how does that help him make up his budget?

Mr. GOOD. The President is supposed to have a competent force to make up his budget. If we are going to take a part of this office to help the President make up his budget, I greatly fear that we are going to confuse the two, and instead of having the checks and balances we have been talking about, we will have neither a check nor a balance. I can not see the value of the gentleman's suggestion, nor do I see where the provisions of the bill in this instance are in conflict with suggestions made by a single person who appeared before the committee.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does not the existing law provide that the Comptroller of the Treasury shall make preliminary rulings whenever a question of that sort is brought to his attention, and does not this bill provide that the power now held by the Comptroller of the Treasury shall be conferred upon the comptroller general of the United States?

Mr. LUCE. I have not so read the bill. If that is the case, I shall be glad to have it go into the RECORD.

Mr. TEMPLE. It is in the existing law, which section 10 provides shall continue in the powers of the comptroller general.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall vote for the pending bill because I believe in a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts. Budget systems have been instituted in at least 42 of our several States, and always with the most salutary results. It is the business way of doing the business of both the State and the Federal Government.

This legislation is one of the most important pieces of constructive legislation presented to Congress in the last quarter of a century, and the committee is to be congratulated upon the splendid bill it has presented for consideration. It is not, of course, a perfect bill, but lays the foundation for a constructive policy in national legislation that will mean much for the future welfare of our great Nation—a policy that will mean larger economy and greater efficiency. The taxpayers of our country are looking to Congress for relief in our enormous tax burdens which have evolved as a result of our Great World War. We must meet every emergency and every legitimate need, but must eliminate all waste and extravagance in every bureau and department of our Government. Bureaus and departments instituted to aid the Great War program and no longer needed should be quickly eliminated. The budget system as outlined in this bill will, in my judgment, help to fix the responsibility of our estimates and give to Congress a clearer conception of the real needs of our Government, and to meet these needs with an intelligent appreciation of our real duty. Our national expenses have increased with leaps and bounds until now they are simply enormous. We are told by reliable statisticians that the aggregate expenses of our Government from the days of the Declaration of Independence to the opening of the Great World War was approximately $26,000,000,000, while Mr. GOOD, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has just stated on the floor of the House that the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year of 1920 will probably be between five and six billions of dollars. Such an enormous expense placed upon the taxpayers of our country demands that it be instituted and carried out along the lines of the most approved business methods, and it is well known that every well-organized business concern to-day is run on the budget system. It clearly outlines its needs and makes a thorough estimate of what its income would be, and arranges the lines of activities accordingly. While it is true that a government will not be able to hew the lines as closely as business concerns, and we do not anticipate that it will, yet in a large sense the Government ought to have a clear conception of what its resources are and what its legitimate needs are, and then apply in an intelligent way the ways and means to provide for that need. The American public demands of Congress that it shall do its business along business lines, and a budget system is the one long step in this direction.

Let us, therefore, not only institute the budget system, but let us curtail expenses wherever possible without decreasing too much our efficiency. Indeed, let the American people feel that Congress is sympathetic with the tremendous burdens that they are now carrying in the taxing line. As I understand this bill, it does not in any way depreciate the importance or efficiency of the several committees in determining the various appropriations for governmental needs, but rather emphasizes the obtaining of the very best possible estimate from responsible sources for the determination of their legislation, and would therefore help these various committees in their difficult deliberations and final determination of the facts. This bill, as I understand it, will help to remove the large amount of duplication which is now so apparent in the activities of our Government. There is no question to-day but what the Government is taxing itself millions of dollars in duplication of work and efforts which should be promptly removed, and which no doubt would be removed to a very large degree through a system such as this bill would institute. This one element alone would be sufficient justification for passing this bill unanimously by Congress.

The independent audits provided for in this bill are, in my judgment, of tremendous importance, and are a distinct advance in the determination of our expenditures, and to ascertain correctly how our large appropriations should be expended, and will help us to eliminate the tremendous waste and extravagance which are so liable to creep in under a system of expenditures such as our Government has had in the past. As a whole, it is a piece of legislation which the country has demanded and which our Government needs, and which the people will appreciate, and which our Congress in years to come can be proud that it has this day initiated. It should have the unanimous support of the House and be speedily enacted into law. [Applause.]

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the amendments will be put en grosse. The question is on the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Texas opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not opposed to the principles of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman who is opposed to the bill desire to offer a motion to recommit? If not, the Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Select Committee on the Budget with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment: On page 7, line 17, after the word "office," insert the words "for six years," and on page 8, strike out lines 1 to 7, inclusive, and on page 9, line 21, after the word "appoint," strike out the comma and insert the word "and," and on line 22, page 9, after the word "remove," strike out the comma and the words "and fix the compensation of."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recommit the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division, and pending that I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair is of opinion that there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 21, nays 258, answered "present" 2, not voting 150, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. GOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. GOODWIN, is sick, and in his behalf I ask leave of absence for him for the day on account of illness. I am authorized to state that if he were present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that Representative SNYDER, of New York, is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would have voted for the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have three legislative days in which to insert their own remarks on the budget system in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have three legislative days in which to insert their remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GOOD. The request is that they may insert their own remarks——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On the bill?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. That they may insert their own remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by publishing a letter that I have received from a major in the Army containing valuable information, as I view it, in regard to war-risk insurance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from an officer in the Army relative to war-risk insurance. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD an editorial from the Arkansas Methodist, of Little Rock, Ark., edited by Dr. A. C. Miller, in regard to Americanism.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL COMMUNICATION.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the minority views from the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the bill (H. R. 9822) authorizing a conference on international communication.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to file minority views of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the bill (H. R. 9822) authorizing a conference on international communication. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if he is filing that this afternoon?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; right now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to have the report printed in the RECORD for the information of the Members, because there is some doubt if we can get the printed report back by to-morrow, and the bill may come up to-morrow.

Mr. ROGERS. I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 22, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill to provide for the payment of the bonus and travel pay to enlisted men of the naval service who have been or may hereafter be discharged for the purpose of reenlisting therein, as provided for the Regular Army in the act of September 29, 1919 (H. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, October 22, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we look to Thee for Thy guidance to-day. We pray for the grace of patriotism—a patriotism founded upon regard for Thy law and reverence for Thy name and a supreme concern for Thy will. We pray that our Nation, established in righteousness, may continue to accomplish the will of God and may receive from day to day the blessing and direction of the great God of righteousness and truth. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 1st instant, a statement regarding foreign marketing work of the Bureau of Markets, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CURTIS. I present a resolution of the letter carriers of Emporia, Kans., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted by the Rural Letter Carriers' Association of the fourth congressional district at their meeting held in Emporia September 1, 1919.

EMPORIA, KANS., September 1, 1919.

DEAR SIRS: We, the rural letter carriers of the fourth congressional district of the State of Kansas, now in session, beg leave to have you make this statement in Congress: "That the rural letter carriers are subjected to such an increased cost of living and equipment and upkeep of same that we are in dire need of immediate help, and must have it if we are to be able to keep up with the present cost, and that we ought to have at least 40 per cent increase on the salary now received."

T. D. LITTLE,
C. C. PHELPS,
A. W. REED,
Committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution from Old Hickory (Thirtieth Division) Association, favoring immediate ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OLD HICKORY (THIRTIETH DIVISION) ASSOCIATION.

Resolution favoring immediate ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Whereas it was the high honor of the Thirtieth Division, American Expeditionary Forces, to play an important part in bringing the long and terrible war with Germany and her allies to a successful close; and

Whereas we believe it is necessary to the future peace and welfare of the United States and of the world that the treaty of peace with Germany, including the league of nations covenant, be ratified by the United States without further delay, leaving all imperfections or imagined errors therein to be corrected hereafter by the use of the adequate machinery provided therein for that purpose: Be it

Resolved, First, that it is the sentiment of this association that the treaty of peace with Germany, including the league of nations covenant, should be immediately ratified in its present form without amendment or reservation, and the Senate of the United States is respectfully urged to do its part to that end, in order that the spiritual and material blessings of peace may once more be restored to the world, in order that the danger of future wars may be lessened and in order that we as a nation may live up to the high purposes for which we entered the war and for which so many members of our division gave their lives upon the battle fields of France and Belgium.

Second, that copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the United States Senators from North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee, and copies be given to the press.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of the Retail Grocers and Butchers' Association, of Cheyenne, Wyo., praying for the enactment of legislation to decrease the high cost of living, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of Newark, N. J., praying for the passage of Senate Resolution 189 for the protection of the colored race, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Michigan Baptist Ministers' Association, of Flint, Mich., and a petition of the Association of Congregational Churches, of Saginaw, Mich., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the establishment of a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the city council of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for Federal regulation of the manufacture and distribution of sugar, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Berkeley, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Woodston, Kans., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Subordinate Lodge No. 292, International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders and Helpers of America, of Parsons, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Cummins bill for the operation of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Rural Letter Carriers' Association of the Fourth Congressional District of Kansas, praying for an increase in salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

STEPHEN A. WINCHELL.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1374) for the relief of Stephen A. Winchell, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 274) thereon.

EXTENSION OF PASSPORT CONTROL.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States.

The bill is of great importance, and I think there is no objection to it. The committee was unanimous in reporting it favorably. It passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 284 to 1, I believe, and its passage is recommended by the State Department and by the President. The purpose of the bill is to extend the present passport arrangements until suitable legislation in reference to immigration is perfected and passed by the two Houses, which ought to be done as soon as possible, but it will take some time to enact such legislation. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the consideration and passage of the bill will require much time?

Mr. LODGE. I have just reported the bill from the Committee on Foreign Relations. I do not think it will take more than a few moments to pass it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the bill may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That if the President shall find that the public safety requires that restrictions and prohibitions in addition to those provided otherwise than by this act be imposed upon the entry of aliens into the United States, and shall make public proclamation thereof, it shall, until otherwise ordered by the President or Congress, be unlawful—

(a) For any alien to enter or attempt to enter the United States except under such reasonable rules, regulations, and orders, and subject to such passport, visé, or other limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe;

(b) For any person to transport or attempt to transport into the United States another person with knowledge or reasonable cause to believe that the entry of such other person is forbidden by this act;

(c) For any person knowingly to make any false statement in an application for a passport or other permission to enter the United States with intent to induce or secure the granting of such permission, either for himself or for another;

(d) For any person knowingly to furnish or attempt to furnish or assist in furnishing to another a viséed passport or other permit or evidence of permission to enter, not issued and designed for such other person's use;

(e) For any person knowingly to use or attempt to use any viséed passport or other permit or evidence of permission to enter not issued and designed for his use:

(f) For any person to forge, counterfeit, mutilate, or alter, or cause or procure to be forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered, any passport, visé, or other permit or evidence of permission to enter the United States;

(g) For any person knowingly to use or attempt to use or furnish to another for use any false, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered passport, permit, or evidence of permission, or any passport, permit, or evidence of permission which, though originally valid, has become or been made void or invalid.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act, or of any order or proclamation of the President promulgated, or of any permit, rule, or regulation issued thereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than five years, or both; and the officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by like fine or imprisonment, or both; and any vehicle or any vessel, together with its or her appurtenances, equipment, tackle, apparel, and furniture, concerned in any such violation, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 3. That the term "United States" as used in this act includes the Canal Zone and all territory and waters, continental or insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

The word "person" as used herein shall be deemed to mean any individual, partnership, association, company, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation, or body politic.

SEC. 4. That in order to carry out the purposes and provisions of this act the sum of $600,000 is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect upon the date when the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 22d day of May, 1918, entitled "An act to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States, contrary to the public safety," shall cease to be operative, and shall continue in force and effect for a period of one year thereafter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment, in section 5, page 5, line 3, after the word "operative," to strike out "and shall continue in force and effect for a period of one year thereafter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I ask to have printed in connection with the bill the report of the House committee, which took some testimony and presented an excellent report. I also ask that the message of the President, the letter of the Secretary of State to the President, and the paraphrase of telegrams from our ambassadors relating to the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[House Report No. 382, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, having had the same under consideration, reports it back to the House with certain amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The amendments are as follows:

Page 3, line 7, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$5,000."

Page 3, line 8, strike out "twenty" and insert "five."

Your committee, in considering legislation of this character, has had the benefit of the testimony of the Secretary of State, of Hon. Wilbur J. Carr, Director of the Consular Service, and of R. W. Flournoy, jr., Chief of the Division of Passport Control of the State Department. Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON, of Washington, the author of House joint resolution 205, for which the present bill is in the nature of a substitute, also appeared before the committee in behalf of legislation of this character.

The act of Congress entitled "An act to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States contrary to the public safety," approved May 22, 1918, established a strict system of passport control for all travelers to and from the United States, whether American citizens or not. By its terms, this act ceases to be operative with the termination of the present war. The recommendation of the Secretary of State is to the effect that so far as persons entering the United States, whether American citizens or aliens, are concerned, the act should, for the national welfare, be extended for a period of one year beyond the termination of the war. Your committee, after careful consideration, has decided that, in spite of certain administrative difficulties, it is wiser not to extend the act in so far as the controlling of American citizens is concerned. On the other hand, your committee has been fully convinced that urgent considerations of public welfare make desirable the extension of the act so far as incoming aliens are concerned for the period of at least one year.

It will be noted that the existing act is applicable to four classes of persons: (1) Outgoing Americans, (2) outgoing aliens, (3) incoming Americans and (4) incoming aliens.

The recommendation of the State Department, as previously stated, was that control over the first two classes should cease with the promulgation of the treaty of peace. Your committee agrees with this conclusion, but goes further and recommends that the third class—incoming Americans—be also freed from restraint or control when the present war technically comes to an end.

The Secretary of State testified that for some time—probably for some years—the other great Governments of the world would doubtless continue in effect the very rigid passport requirements which have prevailed since 1914. This being true, it is quite probable that American travelers abroad will, as a matter of common precaution, and as a practical matter, need passports after the present law lapses; but your committee, while fully recognizing this fact, felt that so far as our own legislation was concerned, the control of the movements of American citizens desiring to travel abroad should again become unhampered and unembarrassed at the earliest possible moment.

The bill recommended by your committee follows almost verbatim the language of the present act. The only changes of consequence are the following:

(1) Whereas the present act imposes a penalty for violation of not more than $10,000 fine, or not more than 20 years' imprisonment, your committee recommends a maximum of $5,000 fine and 5 years' imprisonment. This recommendation is upon the theory that the very drastic penalties provided in the present act were made to meet war conditions and war emergencies, and that as the proposed bill becomes operative only with the arrival of peace, the original penalties may safely and properly be greatly reduced.

(2) Section 2 of the original act, which dealt wtih the movements of American citizens, is altogether eliminated for reasons above indicated.

(3) Section 4 of the proposed bill appropriates the sum of $600,000 to meet the necessary expenses of carrying out the provisions of the bill for the remainder of the present fiscal year.

(4) Section 5 of the bill provides that it shall take effect when the provisions of the present act cease to be operative and shall continue in force and effect for one year thereafter.

The first section of the bill provides that it may cease to become operative within the year, if so ordered either by the President or by Congress.

The reasons for continuing passport control in the case of incoming aliens for at least one year seem to your committee to be numerous and compelling. As stated by Secretary Lansing, it is recommended by the Department of State "because of the great unrest and disorder throughout Europe at the present time, and the fact that many persons are seeking admission to the United States, of whom a large number seem to be unsuitable for future citizenship or else are engaged in very radical propaganda against our institutions."

The State Department has obtained from our representatives abroad their opinion as to the importance of continuing the legislation. Herewith are appended statements of Ambassador Davis, at London; Ambassador Wallace, at Paris; Minister Garrett, at The Hague; Minister Schmedeman, at Christiania, Norway; Minister Stovall, at Berne, Switzerland; and others:

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Under present circumstances I recommend strongly that present visé requirements and verifications of passports of American citizens returning to the United States continue until situation becomes more normal. The consul general concurs fully.

It is understood British authorities still retain certain control over persons leaving England, and if question of validity of American passports were left to the British port authorities much inconvenience might result for the bearers. Furthermore, existing system of thorough interrogation of applicant and inspection of passports by consular officers necessarily must discourage presentation of false papers. Department already aware that the Bolshevik authorities in Russia are acquiring genuine American passports, intending to use them to send their agents to the United States and elsewhere; some of these passports undoubtedly will appear here.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C..

Referring particularly circular telegraphic instruction 324, March 7: I believe not advisable at present discontinue alien visés and relax control of aliens traveling to United States, because such course would promote immigration which is undesirable, at least until demobilization American Army and adjustment labor conditions. After conclusion of peace, therefore, visés should be maintained, but verifications completely abolished. However, foreign Governments will probably require for some time that passports be presented as documents of identity. In this respect note that many new form passports are presented for renewal more than 30 days after expiration, holders explaining that more punctual personal application not feasible. In order that more urgent matters might receive prompt attention, would it not be well to grant such extensions upon satisfactory explanation of delay, rather than to incur the additional clerical work by requiring that applications for emergency passports be made point of interrogation?

JUNE 4.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington:

The department's circular instruction of May 22 acknowledged. A summary of opinions of consuls and attachés with regard to visé requirements for aliens traveling to the United States after conclusion of peace follows:

The consul general at Rotterdam: The present requirements should remain in force at least until far stricter immigration laws have been enacted by Congress, as thousands of persons of all nationalities will endeavor to emigrate to the United States, and unless examined for visé great numbers of undesirables will undoubtedly obtain admission. Moreover, unless strict control is observed, Bolsheviki elements of enemy countries will swarm into the United States and endanger the country's welfare. Enemy subjects should not be permitted, except in special cases, to enter for a considerable period.

The consul at Amsterdam: All aliens proceeding to the United States should obtain American visé for as long a time after the conclusion of peace as danger exists from Bolshevism and other forms of agitation and revolution detrimental to the welfare of America.

The military attaché: Aliens proceeding to the United States should be bearers of passports with American visé for one year after the definite conclusion of peace, because of immense exodus of population from Germany and other central European countries, since it is obvious that a majority of these people will attempt to proceed to the United States by way of the Netherlands. It is safe to assume that a large percentage of the people from Germany and central countries, as well as from southern parts of Russia, will be undesirable, many of them for political reasons.

The naval attaché: At least for the near future, all aliens proceeding to the United States should be bearers of passports with the American visé. At present there is too much Bolshevism and other agitation to warrant dispensing with this control. There may be a great wave of emigration to America after the conclusion of peace. In such case the viséing of passports would give great opportunity so to restrict emigration to America as to keep out the dregs of Europe.

End of summary.

The minister at The Hague entirely concurs with the above consensus of opinion. He believes that agitators, Bolsheviki, and propagandists will continue actively and factiously at work. It is likely that other countries will try to get rid of these persons and that the worst of them will go to the country to which the entry is easiest and where there is the least to explain. American control organizations have been built up during the war and have at their disposal voluminous suspect lists and facilities for identifying undesirables and dangerous persons. The visé control would, therefore, seem to present the most ready as well as the least objectionable method of meeting the after-the-war problems of emigration to the United States and it need in no wise keep out persons who are desirable.

However, it is obvious that the value of the control will depend not only on its efficiency but on the uniformity with which it is carried out. A good control in one country or one part of a country will be entirely nullified by looser control elsewhere. The concentration of control in each country and an immediate and speedy interchange of information between the controls should be worked out by the department, and especially instructed men without other and irrelevant duties should be put in charge of the work.

GARRETT.

MAY 28, 1919.

I agree fully with the military and naval attachés that the visé passports of foreigners going to United States should be continued for a very considerable period after the conclusion of peace: (A) To exclude Bolshevist and German propagandist. (B) To protect further American labor after demobilization. (C) Because control at port of entry can not be so efficient. (D) Statistics gathered by investigation of applicants here are of great value. (E) It affords unusual opportunity to inquire into many business activities which would not be possible otherwise. Furthermore, we are of opinion that the abolition of seamen control is unfortunate, in that it affords comparatively easy means for undesirables to reach our shores. Whatever it may cost the Government, it is our opinion that return would far outweigh expenditure.

[Paraphrase of telegram received from the American consul, Archangel.]

MAY 29, 1919.

We are all strongly of opinion that aliens going to the United States after conclusion of peace should be required to have passports viséed. It is regarded as certain that a large number of aliens will try to enter the United states from this part of the world to spread Bolshevik propaganda. Consuls are decidedly in the best position to distinguish these from desirable emigrants or travelers.

MAY 26, 1919.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington:

Military attaché, consul general, and I recommend aliens going to the United States be required to have passports viséed, in order that they may be examined in their native lands and undesirables more effectively eliminated than possible for immigration authorities in ports of United States. We regard it most important that funds for investigation be continued. The military attaché recommends that they be placed entirely in the hands of the consul general.

SCHMEDEMAN.

[Paraphrase of telegram received from the American Legation, Switzerland.]

MAY 24, 1919.

Recommend that passports for aliens be strictly supervised after peace. The peril of Germans and Bolsheviki will not cease for at least a year. Vitally necessary, because of rumors of rapprochement between Germans and possible future enemies of United States.

STOVALL.

The Secretary of State asserts positively that it will be the policy of the department, if the law is extended, to exclude only those aliens whose admission to the United States the department believes would prove prejudicial to the best interests of our country. There would be no attempt or desire to regulate the amount of immigration and the number of immigrants by this means. Upon this important point it may be well to quote the testimony before the committee of the Secretary of State:

"The CHAIRMAN. * * * Assuming that this act is limited to incoming aliens, what would be the policy of the department, if you are prepared to indicate, as to dealing with immigrants who apply for visés from the various parts of Europe? Would you expect to grant a visé to everyone who could prove himself not dangerous to public morals or society, or what would be the scheme by which visés would be granted or withheld?

"Secretary LANSING. Of course, so far as the Department of State is concerned, it would be, as far as could be determined, the character of the individual and whether he was a proper one to admit to entry into this country.

"The CHAIRMAN. His political character or his personal character?

"Secretary LANSING. Well, it might be both. For example, if I were considering an anarchist it would be his political character, or if I were considering the case of a criminal, that would be his personal character. So both enter into the problem.

"The CHAIRMAN. And the State Department would deal with both?

"Secretary LANSING. As far as possible. But, of course, the immigration authorities would have the ultimate say when he reached this country.

"The CHAIRMAN. Would you attempt to exercise that control as part of a general policy indicating how much immigration should come to the United States?

"Secretary LANSING. Not at all, unless we had a request from the immigration authorities. I assume, so far as that is concerned, we would adopt, in general, their rules.

"The CHAIRMAN. Of course, this law would give you the power to choke immigration off completely if you chose to exercise it?

"Secretary LANSING. Of course; and that is the very thing I wanted to point out, that that is a matter for Congress and not a matter for the Department of State, and we would adopt very closely the immigration rules, I think.

"The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you would simply aim to exclude the unfit?

"Secretary LANSING. Yes, sir; the unfit.

"The CHAIRMAN. You will not try to regulate the rise and fall of the immigration tide through the medium of this act?

"Secretary LANSING. Not at all."

Testimony before the committee indicates that there is a very large number of aliens in Germany, Russia, and other unsettled countries who are planning to come to the United States at the earliest possible moment. Many of them, your committee believes, would be undesirable additions to our population at this time. Many of them could probably not be effectively excluded under the immigration laws. The only way to check them is to stop them before they start, by means of the passport-control system. Your committee feels strongly the importance of watching very carefully the character of immigration which shall be permitted to come to our shores during the crucial year which will follow the coming of peace. Within that year Congress can, and probably will, determine its future policy with respect to the admission or exclusion of applicants for admission to the United States. The bill recommended, therefore, is primarily to preserve the status quo while Congress is considering its permanent program of regulation.

Scarcely less important than the retention of the passport control is the provision of funds to make that control effective. The work is delicate, difficult, and expensive. To perform it properly will require the services of at least 225 special employees of the Department of State, scattered in accordance with the needs of the service over the great ports of the world from which the tide of immigration flows to the United States. Seventy-five of these special employees will be employed at $3,000 per annum, and 150 of them at $2,500 per annum. Their salaries, together with their traveling expenses, contingent expenses, and a small sum for additional employees within the department itself to administer the act, involve an expense of about $75,000 a month. Your committee in recommending a $600,000 appropriation, therefore, is reckoning upon the expenses necessary for the period of eight months from November 1 to June 30, the close of the fiscal year.

While the exact expenses of administering the present act and the receipts accruing therefrom can not be segregated with accuracy owing, in part, to the fact that our diplomatic and consular officers have divided their time between this work and their other duties, it seems reasonably clear that the expenses of administering the act have been substantially balanced by the receipts therefrom. In other words, the service has been substantially self-supporting. There is every reason to assume that this condition will continue during the extension period. Thus the appropriation recommended probably entails not the slightest actual financial burden to the Government.

Finally, your committee is satisfied that, by eliminating from the provisions of the proposal all American citizens and all aliens within the United States who desire to return to their own country, the law will operate without hardship to any, but, on the contrary, most beneficently to our national welfare. Everyone knows the danger to our institutions which may result if the extreme radical or "Red" element of Europe is allowed to come without let or hindrance to the United States. The State Department tells us frankly that it will not administer the law so as to regulate immigration as such; rather will it withhold its permission only in the case of those who by character or otherwise can not safely be allowed to form a part of our population.

For the foregoing reasons, your committee believes that this legislation should be promptly enacted.

Appended herewith as a part of this report are a message from the President of the United States recommending legislation, and a letter from the Secretary of State to the President to the same effect:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, suggesting that the passport-control act of May 22, 1918, be extended for one year after peace shall have been concluded between the United States and the Central Powers of Europe, and that ample appropriation be made for an effcient execution of that act and the regulations made under it during the remainder of the fiscal year.

This recommendation brings up for your consideration a very important question of policy which has an intimate relation to the welfare of the country. Information from the agents of the Government in foreign countries indicates that as soon as the existing restrictions upon travel are removed many persons will seek admission to this country, and that among the number are not only persons undesirable from the point of view of becoming future citizens, but persons whose origin and affiliations make it inadvisable that they should be permitted to enter the United States. The act of May 22, 1918, which makes possible the prevention of undesirable individuals from departing for the United States will automatically cease to be operative upon the establishment of a condition of peace. Individuals will then be free to come here for whatever purpose they choose, and many will come for purposes which we can not approve and which may, indeed, be dangerous to the country and to its institutions.

The immigration officials enforcing the immigration laws at the ports of the United States will not be able successfully to prevent the entry of all improper and dangerous persons because of the impracticability of developing a system of intelligence and investigation abroad to work in sufficiently close relationship to the immigration organization in the United States to be thoroughly effective in distinguishing between those individuals whose right to admission should not be questioned and those whose admission would be injurious to the country. The experience gained during the war shows that an efficient system of passport control, administered by the Department of State through the diplomatic and consular officers in foreign countries, can be depended upon to exclude practically all persons whose admission to the United States would be dangerous or contrary to the public interest. If the Congress concur in the view that the national welfare requires that the class of persons to which I have alluded should not enter this country, it is my belief that the simplest and most effective method that can be adopted would be to continue the system of control now being carried on by the Department of State, working in close cooperation with the Commissioner General of Immigration.

It is obvious that effectiveness of control can only be obtained through supplementing the regular diplomatic and consular personnel with a sufficient number of reliable and capable men, and such men as would be useful can be had only through the payment of adequate compensation. The Secretary of State estimates the expenditure required for the remainder of the current fiscal year at $750.000, including a number of additional employees in the Department of State who would be charged to supplement the administrative organization now maintained there. I quite agree with the view that it is entirely useless to make any outlay upon this work unless sufficient money is provided with which to make control effective. It would be most unwise to permit the public to rest under the impression that an effective control was being exerted over persons seeking admission to this country when, in fact, owing to inadequate personnel and an inefficient administration of the law, dangerous persons were freely crossing our boundaries.

It is important that I should add that the increase in the number of persons desiring to come to the United States has already almost overwhelmed the existing organization abroad, and that it is very doubtful whether the system of control can be kept in operation for more than a few weeks longer without additional appropriation.

With the relaxation of restrictions upon transportation which are gradually taking place, the burden of examining applicants for passport visés will become so great as to be entirely beyond the capacity of the number of officers whose employment existing appropriations make possible. Therefore it is of the utmost importance that if the Congress should decide, as I hope it may, that the public interest requires that the existing system of control should be maintained and extended, it will enact the necessary legislation preferably by joint resolution and make ample appropriation at the earliest possible moment.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
25 August, 1919.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 20, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In pursuance of the act approved May 22, 1918, entitled "An act to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States contrary to the public safety," there was built up under the direction of the Secretary of State, and in close cooperation with the immigration authorities of the Department of Labor, and the appropriate officers of the Departments of the Treasury, Justice, War, and Navy, a system of passport control with respect to aliens entering the United States. Under this system all aliens desiring to proceed from any foreign country to the United States have been required to obtain a visé of the American consular officer at the port of departure upon their passport. Aliens have not been permitted to enter the United States, even if by chance they might reach any of its ports, unless a properly viséed passport could be produced.

The act mentioned provides for passport control only during the period when the United States is at war. Consequently the question now arises whether it would be consistent with the best interests of this country to discontinue the system described. With a view of determining upon a recommendation to be made to Congress, I have sought the views of the heads of the American diplomatic missions abroad and inclose, for your information, paraphrases of telegrams embodying their opinions.

As will be noted, all of the diplomatic missions so far heard from recommend the continuance of the visé regulations. It is believed that during the continuance of the war large numbers of undesirable and dangerous persons have been kept out of the United States through the enforcement of the visé regulations. The elements of unrest and disorder, which have always existed to a certain degree, but have been kept more or less under subjection, have in the unsettled conditions arising from the war broken their bounds in various quarters, particularly in Russia and central Europe, and there is every reason to believe that large numbers of aliens who do not believe in the form of government now existing in the United States may attempt to come to this country, many of them for the express purpose of carrying on anarchistic agitation. Reports indicate that anarchistic organizations in foreign lands are engaged in a propaganda which extends beyond the limits of their own country and includes the United States, and there is no doubt that they are attempting to send agents to this country to spread their propaganda.

After considering the reports of the representatives of this country abroad and conferring with some of our ministers on this subject, I do not believe that the time for abandoning the safeguard afforded by the passport-control system has yet arrived or that it will arrive immediately upon the conclusion of peace. It furnishes valuable assistance in preventing undesirable people from coming to this country and is effective not only because it is more feasible for officers stationed in the country from which individuals seek to emigrate to obtain information concerning their antecedents, character, and objects than it is for officers in the United States to obtain such information, but also in cases which appear suspicious it is much easier to refuse a visé than to deny admittance to the suspected person after he has arrived at a port of entry of the United States.

I do not wish to be understood as holding that the visé system could or should supplant the exclusion provisions of the immigration law, but I am convinced from the operation of the system during the war that it can be for some time in the future, until conditions shall have become more settled, a very valuable adjunct in preventing the admission of agitators and other dangerous persons. In any continuance of the passport-control system the cooperation of the Bureau of Immigration of the Department of Labor, which has been so freely extended to this department, must necessarily be continued.

Two things are necessary to the continuance of the passport-control system: (1) The extension by special act or joint resolution of the act of May 22, 1918, and (2) the appropriation of a sum sufficient to pay the salaries of such additional employees as may be needed for the efficient carrying on of the work, both here and abroad, and paying the other expenses incident to the enforcement of the act. With reference to the first point it is suggested that it might be wise to extend the provisions of the act of May 22, 1918, for a period of one year after peace has been concluded with the Central Powers in Europe. If at the end of that time a further extension should be found necessary, the matter can again be submitted for the consideration of Congress.

With reference to the second point, Congress appropriated the sum of $75,000 "for carrying out the provisions of the act" mentioned, "including contingent and miscellaneous expenses and personal services and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere." This appropriation not only ceased to be available on June 30, 1919, but was never more than a small item of the cost of the enforcement of the law, inasmuch as consular and immigration, military and naval officers were utilized in connection with the other duties pertaining to the war which they were discharging. It is not possible, however, to continue this longer without further appropriation, for the expense is too heavy a charge upon the regular appropriations to permit of a continuance of the work. The work here and abroad has already developed beyond the capacity of the existing organization to deal with. A careful examination of the needs, both in this department and in the Diplomatic and Consular Service abroad, convinces me that an appropriation of not less than $750 000 will be necessary if the system of control be extended after the ratification of the treaty of peace through the existing fiscal year. The extent to which the work may be developed will be readily apparent when it is considered that the total number of immigrants admitted to this country during the fiscal year 1919 was 141,132, while the total number admitted in the year preceding the beginning of the war was 1,218,480, or more than nine times the number being admitted at the present time. It is thought, however, that some time will elapse before immigration and travel reach their prewar condition, hence the estimated expense is much less than it would be were it to be based upon even half the prewar immigration. An itemized estimate of the probable expenditure both here and abroad is inclosed. It may be plainly pointed out that it is useless to attempt to continue the system unless ample provision is made for its efficient enforcement. Regulations of the importance of those of passport control inefficiently executed or not executed at all are not only useless but, in the existing situation, may be dangerous.

The above observations relate principally to the question of continuing the visé system after the conclusion of peace. It is a serious question whether it can be continued until the conclusion of peace. Several of the diplomatic and consular offices in places from which there is a large emigration have telegraphed to the department that it is impossible for them to carry on the work properly with their present personnel. They are in immediate need of assistants, but this department has no available funds from which they can be paid. Unless funds are obtained for this purpose in the near future it will be necessary to drop the visé work altogether, even before the conclusion of peace. Judging by reports received from diplomatic and consular officers, it is believed that this would be most unfortunate.

It is proper to observe that the visé work brings a considerable revenue into the Treasury. Under the tariff of consular fees, a fee of $1 is required for the execution of each visé application and an additional fee of $1 for each visé. During the six months ended June 30 it appears that fees to the amount of about $200,000 were collected under the provisions just mentioned. As the numbers of immigrants coming to the United States have been constantly increasing since the first of the year, it is believed that visé fees are now being collected at the rate of $500,000 per annum. When immigration reaches normal proportions, the amount of the fees collected will, of course, greatly exceed the amount just mentioned. The work connected with the issuance of passports to American citizens also brings in a considerable revenue. At the rate at which this work is now proceeding it is estimated that fees to the amount of $277,500 are now being collected annually for the issuance of passports by the department and the diplomatic and consular officers abroad and the execution of passport applications. Thus it appears that the Treasury is now annually receiving in connection with the passport work fees to the amount of about $777,500.

I recommend that, if you approve, this matter be laid before Congress at the earliest possible moment, in order that it may determine whether the existing system shall be continued and, if so, make provisions for its efficient execution.

ROBERT LANSING.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

[Public, No. 154, Sixty-fifth Congress, H. R. 10264.]

An act to prevent in time of war departure from or entry into the United States contrary to the public safety.

Be it enacted, etc., That when the United States is at war, if the President shall find that the public safety requires that restrictions and prohibitions in addition to those provided otherwise than by this act be imposed upon the departure of persons from and their entry into the United States, and shall make public proclamation thereof, it shall, until otherwise ordered by the President or Congress, be unlawful—

(a) For any alien to depart from or enter or attempt to depart from or enter the United States except under such reasonable rules, regulations, and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe.

(b) For any person to transport or attempt to transport from or into the United States another person with knowledge or reasonable cause to believe that the departure or entry of such other person is forbidden by this act.

(c) For any person knowingly to make any false statement in an application for permission to depart from or enter the United States with intent to induce or secure the granting of such permission either for himself or for another.

(d) For any person knowingly to furnish or attempt to furnish or assist in furnishing to another a permit or evidence of permission to depart or enter not issued and designed for such other person's use.

(e) For any person knowingly to use or attempt to use any permit or evidence of permission to depart or enter not issued and designed for his use.

(f) For any person to forge, counterfeit, mutilate, or alter, or cause or procure to be forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered, any permit or evidence of permission to depart from or enter the United States.

(g) For any person knowingly to use or attempt to use or furnish to another for use any false, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered permit, or evidence of permission, or any permit or evidence of permission which, though originally valid, has become or been made void or invalid.

SEC. 2. That after such proclamation as is provided for by the preceding section has been made and published and while said proclamation is in force, it shall, except as otherwise provided by the President, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President may authorize and prescribe, be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to depart from or enter or attempt to depart from or enter the United States unless he bears a valid passport.

SEC. 3. That any person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act, or of any order or proclamation of the President promulgated, or of any permit, rule, or regulation issued thereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than 20 years, or both; and the officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by like fine or imprisonment, or both; and any vehicle or any vessel, together with its or her appurtenances, equipment, tackle, apparel, and furniture, concerned in any such violation, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 4. That the term "United States," as used in this act, includes the Canal Zone and all territory and waters, continental or insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

The word "person" as used herein shall be deemed to mean any individual, partnership, association, company, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation, or body politic.

[Senate Document No. 79, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

Message from the President of the United States transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State suggesting that the passport-control act of May 22, 1918, be extended for one year after peace shall have been concluded between the United States and the central powers of Europe.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State suggesting that the passport-control act of May 22, 1918, be extended for one year after peace shall have been concluded between the United States and the central powers of Europe, and that ample appropriation be made for an efficient execution of that act and the regulations made under it during the remainder of the fiscal year.

This recommendation brings up for your consideration a very important question of policy, which has an intimate relation to the welfare of the country. Information from the agents of the Government in foreign countries indicates that as soon as the existing restrictions upon travel are removed many persons will seek admission to this country, and that among the number are not only persons undesirable from the point of view of becoming future citizens but persons whose origin and affiliations make it inadvisable that they should be permitted to enter the United States. The act of May 22, 1918, which makes possible the prevention of undesirable individuals from departing for the United States, will automatically cease to be operative upon the establishment of a condition of peace Individuals will then be free to come here for whatever purpose they choose, and many will come for purposes which we can not approve and which may, indeed, be dangerous to the country and to its institutions.

The immigration officials enforcing the immigration laws at the ports of the United States will not be able successfully to prevent the entry of all improper and dangerous persons, because of the impracticability of developing a system of intelligence and investigation abroad to work in sufficiently close relationship to the immigration organization in the United States to be thoroughly effective in distinguishing between those individuals whose right to admission should not be questioned and those whose admission would be injurious to the country. The experience gained during the war shows that an efficient system of passport control administered by the Department of State, through the diplomatic and consular officers in foreign countries, can be depended upon to exclude practically all persons whose admission to the United States would be dangerous or contrary to the public interest. If the Congress concur in the view that the national welfare requires that the class of persons to which I have alluded should not enter this country, it is my belief that the simplest and most effective method that can be adopted would be to continue the system of control now being carried on by the Department of State, working in close cooperation with the Commissioner General of Immigration.

It is obvious that effectiveness of control can only be obtained through supplementing the regular diplomatic and consular personnel with a sufficient number of reliable and capable men, and such men as would be useful can be had only through the payment of adequate compensation. The Secretary of State estimates the expenditure required for the remainder of the current fiscal year at $750,000, including a number of additional employees in the Department of State who would be charged to supplement the administrative organization now maintained there. I quite agree with the view that it is entirely useless to make any outlay upon this work unless sufficient money is provided with which to make control effective. It would be most unwise to permit the public to rest under the impression that an effective control was being exerted over persons seeking admission to this country when, in fact, owing to inadequate personnel and an inefficient administration of the law, dangerous persons were freely crossing our boundaries.

It is important that I should add that the increase in the number of persons desiring to come to the United States has already almost overwhelmed the existing organization abroad, and that it is very doubtful whether the system of control can be kept in operation for more than a few weeks longer without additional appropriation.

With the relaxation of restrictions upon transportation which are gradually taking place, the burden of examining applicants for passport visés will become so great as to be entirely beyond the capacity of the number of officers whose employment existing appropriations make possible. Therefore it is of the utmost importance that if the Congress should decide, as I hope it may, that the public interest requires that the existing system of control should be maintained and extended, it will enact the necessary legislation preferably by joint resolution and make ample appropriation at the earliest possible moment.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
25 August, 1919.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 20, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In pursuance of the act approved May 22, 1918, entitled "An act to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States contrary to the public safety," there was built up under the direction of the Secretary of State, and in close cooperation with the immigration authorities of the Department of Labor, and the appropriate officers of the Departments of the Treasury, Justice, War and Navy, a system of passport control with respect to aliens entering the United States. Under this system all aliens desiring to proceed from any foreign country to the United States have been required to obtain a visé of the American consular officer at the port of departure upon their passport. Aliens have not been permitted to enter the United States, even if by chance they might reach any of its ports, unless a properly viséd passport could be produced.

The act mentioned provides for passport control only during the period when the United States is at war. Consequently the question now arises whether it would be consistent with the best interests of this country to discontinue the system described. With a view of determining upon a recommendation to be made to Congress, I have sought the views of the heads of the American diplomatic missions abroad, and inclose for your information paraphrases of telegrams embodying their opinions.

As will be noted, all of the diplomatic missions so far heard from recommend the continuance of the visé regulations. It is believed that during the continuance of the war large numbers of undesirable and dangerous persons have been kept out of the United States through the enforcement of the visé regulations. The elements of unrest and disorder, which have always existed to a certain degree, but have been kept more or less under subjection, have in the unsettled conditions arising from the war broken their bounds in various quarters, particularly in Russia and Central Europe, and there is every reason to believe that large numbers of aliens, who do not believe in the form of Government now existing in the United States, may attempt to come to this country, many of them for the express purpose of carrying on anarchistic agitation. Reports indicate that anarchistic organizations in foreign lands are engaged in a propaganda which extends beyond the limits of their own country and includes the United States, and there is no doubt that they are attempting to send agents to this country to spread their propaganda.

After considering the reports of the representatives of this country abroad and conferring with some of our ministers on this subject, I do not believe that the time for abandoning the safeguard afforded by the passport-control system has yet arrived or that it will arrive immediately upon the conclusion of peace. It furnishes valuable assistance in preventing undesirable people from coming to this country, and is effective not only because it is more feasible for officers stationed in the country from which individuals seek to emigrate to obtain information concerning their antecedents, character, and objects than it is for officers in the United States to obtain such information, but also in cases which appear suspicious it is much easier to refuse a visé than to deny admittance to the suspected person after he has arrived at a port of entry of the United States.

I do not wish to be understood as holding that the visé system could or should supplant the exclusion provisions of the immigration law, but I am convinced from the operation of the system during the war that it can be for some time in the future, until conditions shall have become more settled, a very valuable adjunct in preventing the admission of agitators and other dangerous persons. In any continuance of the passport-control system the cooperation of the Bureau of Immigration of the Department of Labor, which has been so freely extended to this department, must necessarily be continued.

Two things are necessary to the continuance of the passport-control system: (1) The extension by special act or joint resolution of the act of May 22, 1918, and (2) the appropriation of a sum sufficient to pay the salaries of such additional employees as may be needed for the efficient carrying on of the work, both here and abroad, and paying the other expenses incident to the enforcement of the act. With reference to the first point it is suggested that it might be wise to exend the provisions of the act of May 22, 1918, for a period of one year after peace has been concluded with the Central Powers in Europe. If at the end of that time a further extension should be found necessary, the matter can again be submitted for the consideration of Congress.

With reference to the second point, Congress appropriated the sum of $75,000 "for carrying out the provisions of the act" mentioned, "including contingent and miscellaneous expenses and personal services and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere." This appropriation not only ceased to be available on June 30, 1919, but was never more than a small item of the cost of the enforcement of the law, inasmuch as consular and immigration, military and naval officers were utilized in connection with the other duties pertaining to the war which they were discharging. It is not possible, however, to continue this longer without further appropriation, for the expense is too heavy a charge upon the regular appropriations to permit of a continuance of the work. The work here and abroad has already developed beyond the capacity of the existing organization to deal with. A careful examination of the needs, both in this department and in the Diplomatic and Consular Service abroad, convinces me that an appropriation of not less than $750,000 will be necessary if the system of control be extended after the ratification of the treaty of peace through the existing fiscal year. The extent to which the work may be developed will be readily apparent when it is considered that the total number of immigrants admitted to this country during the fiscal year 1919 was 141,132, while the total number admitted in the year preceding the beginning of the war was 1,218,480, or more than nine times the number being admitted at the present time. It is thought, however, that some time will elapse before immigration and travel reach their prewar condition, hence the estimated expense is much less than it would be were it to be based upon even half the prewar immigration. An itemized estimate of the probable expenditure both here and abroad is inclosed. It may be plainly pointed out that it is useless to attempt to continue the system unless ample provision is made for its efficient enforcement. Regulations of the importance of those of passport control inefficiently executed or not executed at all are not only useless but, in the existing situation, may be dangerous.

The above observations relate principally to the question of continuing the visé system after the conclusion of peace. It is a serious question whether it can be continued until the conclusion of peace. Several of the diplomatic and consular offices in places from which there is a large emigration have telegraphed to the department that it is impossible for them to carry on the work properly with their present personnel. They are in immediate need of assistants, but this department has no available funds from which they can be paid. Unless funds are obtained for this purpose in the near future, it will be necessary to drop the visé work altogether, even before the conclusion of peace. Judging by reports received from diplomatic and consular officers it is believed that this would be most unfortunate.

It is proper to observe that the visé work brings a considerable revenue into the Treasury. Under the tariff of consular fees, a fee of $1 is required for the execution of each visé application and an additional fee of $1 for each visé. During the six months ended June 30, it appears that fees to the amount of about $200,000 were collected under the provisions just mentioned. As the numbers of immigrants coming to the United States have been constantly increasing since the first of the year, it is believed that visé fees are now being collected at the rate of $500,000 per annum. When immigration reaches normal proportions the amount of the fees collected will, of course, greatly exceed the amount just mentioned. The work connected with the issuance of passports to American citizens also brings in a considerable revenue. At the rate at which this work is now proceeding it is estimated that fees to the amount of $277,500 are now being collected annually for the issuance of passports by the department and the diplomatic and consular officers abroad and the execution of passport applications. Thus it appears that the Treasury is now annually receiving in connection with the passport work fees to the amount of about $777,500.

I recommend that, if you approve, this matter be laid before Congress at the earliest possible moment, in order that it may determine whether the existing system shall be continued, and, if so, make provisions for its efficient execution.

Faithfully, yours,

ROBERT LANSING.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 22d day of May, 1918, entitled "An act to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States contrary to the public safety," are, so far as they relate to entry into the United States, continued for one year after peace has been concluded with the Central Powers of Europe.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Under present circumstances I recommend strongly that present visa requirements and verifications of passports of American citizens returning to the United States continue until situation becomes more normal. The consul general concurs fully.

It is understood British authorities still retain certain control over persons leaving England, and if question of validity of American passports were left to the British port authorities, much inconvenience might result for the bearers. Furthermore, existing system of thorough interrogation of applicant and inspection of passports by consular officers necessarily must discourage presentation of false papers. Department already aware that the Bolshevik authorities in Russia are acquiring genuine American passports, intending to use them to send their agents to the United States and elsewhere; some of these passports undoubtedly will appear here.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Referring particularly circular telegraphic instruction 324, March 7: I believe not advisable at present discontinue alien visas and relax control of aliens traveling to United States, because such course would promote immigration which is undesirable, at least until demobilization American Army and adjustment labor conditions. After conclusion of peace, therefore, visas should be mantained, but verifications completely abolished. However, foreign governments will probably require for some time that passports be presented as documents of identity. In this respect, note that many new-form passports are presented for renewal more than 30 days after expiration, holders explaining that more punctual personal application not feasible. In order that more urgent matters might receive prompt attention, would it not be well to grant such extensions upon satisfactory explanation of delay, rather than to incur the additional clerical work by requiring that applications for emergency passports be made point of interrogation?

WALLACE.

JUNE 4.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington:

The department's circular instruction of May 22 acknowledged. A summary of opinions of consuls and attachés with regard to visa requirements for aliens traveling to the United States after conclusion of peace follows:

The consul general at Rotterdam: The present requirements should remain in force at least until far stricter immigration laws have been enacted by Congress, as thousands of persons of all nationalities will endeavor to emigrate to the United States, and unless examined for visa great numbers of undesirables will undoubtedly obtain admission. Moreover, unless strict control is observed, Bolsheviki elements of enemy countries will swarm into the United States and endanger the country's welfare. Enemy subjects should not be permitted, except in special cases, to enter for a considerable period.

The consul at Amsterdam: All aliens proceeding to the United States should obtain American visa for as long a time after the conclusion of peace, as danger exists from Bolshevism and other forms of agitation and revolution detrimental to the welfare of America.

The military attaché: Aliens proceeding to the United States should be bearers of passports with American visa for one year after the definite conclusion of peace because of immense exodus of population from Germany and other central European countries, since it is obvious that a majority of these people will attempt to proceed to the United States by way of the Netherlands. It is safe to assume that a large percentage of the people from Germany and central countries as well as from southern parts of Russia will be undesirable, many of them for political reasons.

The naval attaché: At least for the near future all aliens proceeding to the United States should be bearers of passports with the American visa. At present there is too much Bolshevism and other agitation to warrant dispensing with this control. There may be a great wave of emigration to America after the conclusion of peace. In such case the visaing of passports would give great opportunity so to restrict emigration to America as to keep out the dregs of Europe.

End of summary.

The minister at The Hague entirely concurs with the above consensus of opinion. He believes that agitators, Bolsheviki, and propagandists will continue actively and factiously at work. It is likely that other countries will try to get rid of these persons and that the worst of them will go to the country to which the entry is easiest and where there is the least to explain. American control organizations have been built up during the war and have at their disposal voluminous suspect lists and facilities for identifying undesirables and dangerous persons. The visa control would therefore seem to present the most ready as well as the least objectionable method of meeting the after-the-war problems of emigration to the United States and it need in no wise keep out persons who are desirable.

However, it is obvious that the value of the control will depend not only on its efficiency but on the uniformity with which it is carried out. A good control in one country or one part of a country will be entirely nullified by looser control elsewhere. The concentration of control in each country and an immediate and speedy interchange of information between the controls should be worked out by the department, and specially instructed men without other and irrelevant duties should be put in charge of the work.

GARRETT.

MAY 28, 1919.

I agree fully with the military and naval attachés that the visé passports of foreigners going to United States should be continued for a very considerable period after the conclusion of peace: (A) To exclude Bolshevist and German propagandists. (B) To protect further American labor after demobilization. (C) Because control at port of entry can not be so efficient. (D) Statistics gathered by investigation of applicants here are of great value. (E) It affords unusual opportunity to inquire into many business activities which would not be possible otherwise. Furthermore, we are of opinion that the abolition of seamen control is unfortunate in that it affords comparatively easy means for undesirables to reach our shores. Whatever it may cost the Government, it is our opinion that return would far outweigh expenditure.

MAY 29, 1919.

We are all strongly of opinion that aliens going to the United States after conclusion of peace should be required to have passports viséed. It is regarded as certain that a large number of aliens will try to enter the United States from this part of the world to spread Bolshevik propaganda. Consuls are decidedly in the best position to distinguish these from desirable emigrants or travelers.

MAY 26, 1919.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington:

Military attaché, consul general, and I recommend aliens going to the United States be required to have passports viséed in order that they may be examined in their native lands, and undesirables more effectively eliminated than possible for immigration authorities in ports of United States. We regard it most important that funds for investigation be continued. The military attaché recommends that they be placed entirely in the hands of the consul general.

MAY 24, 1919.

Recommend that passports for aliens be strictly supervised after peace. The peril of Germans and Bolsheviki will not cease for at least a year. Vitally necessary, because of rumors of rapprochement between Germans and possible future enemies of the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 3272) authorizing any land-grant railroad company or its successors to convey for public-road purposes certain parts of its right of way; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 3273) for the relief of Clarence Chambers; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 3274) to increase the limit of cost for the construction of the United States post-office building at St. Johnsbury, Vt.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 3275) for the relief of the Greenwood Bros. Café; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 3276) for the relief of J. G. Swinney; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 3277) granting a pension to James D. Ash; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 3278) to insure greater safety for life and property during transportation on railroads, to make investments of money in railroads more secure and profitable, to reduce the costs of transportation on railroads, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 3279) granting an increase of pension to Albert N. Raymond; and

A bill (S. 3280) granting a pension to Robert Clark; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 3281) granting an increase of pension to Mary S. Brown (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 3282) for the relief of Alvin Harder; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DIAL:

A bill (S. 3283) to make the rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class within the limits of any post-office delivery district 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, on Friday of last week I obtained unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD an analysis of the labor provisions of the treaty with Germany. At that time I also submitted a few observations in connection with this analysis.

I have here, Mr. President, a telegram addressed to Lewis E. Pierson, of 93 Eighth Avenue, Brooklyn. With the permission of the Senate I shall read it.

NEW YORK, October 16, 1919.

Mr. LEWIS E. PIERSON,
93 Eighth Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.:

In this moral and political crisis the League to Enforce Peace, William Howard Taft, president, A. Lawrence Lowell, chairman, has great and necessary responsibility of leading and securing expression of public demand for prompt ratification of the peace treaty and league of nations covenant without amendments and without reservations that would require resubmission to Paris conference or separate peace with Germany. Business uncertainty and industrial unrest will continue throughout the world until ratification starts life again in normal channels. Will you join others in contributing $1,000 toward expenses of campaign?

HERBERT HOUSTON,
Treasurer.
GEORGE WICKERSHAM,
VANCE MCCORMICK,
CLEVELAND DODGE,
OSCAR STRAUS,
Finance Committee,
Bush Terminal Sales Building, New York.

Mr. President, as an evidence of just how a telegram of this character affected the gentleman to whom it was addressed—and, by the way, he is the chairman of the board of directors of one of the leading commercial banks of New York City and a prominent official of the United States Chamber of Commerce—I propose to read his answer to the telegram, dated October 20, 1919:

OCTOBER 20, 1919.

Mr. HERBERT HOUSTON,
Treasurer League to Enforce Peace,
Bush Terminal Sales Building, New York.

SIR: Responding to your circular telegram, I decline to subscribe $1,000 for propaganda to coerce United States Senators to reach a hasty and insufficiently considered vote on the league of nations provisions of the peace treaty.

I can not believe that the people of this country, or even the membership of your league, will sanction such pressure on patriotic Senators sworn to the faithful performance of their constitutional duty, when it is realized that no debate has yet revealed the menace to the country contained in the labor provisions of the treaty.

These provisions clearly provide for an irresistible force to secure enactment into international law within 18 months by all nations in the league of every pronouncement of the labor conference created by the peace treaty.

Under the treaty the labor conference is specifically required to set up machinery for world propaganda in favor of its pronouncements, to be supported by funds contributed by all nation members of the league. The labor conference also is required to create a court of inquiry, charged with the duty of ascertaining the reasons why any nation delays in enacting the international laws the labor conference proposes.

The United States will be one out of over 40 nation members proposed for the conference, and will have 4 out of over 160 votes. With nearly every other nation in the world either committed or strongly inclined to advanced and even radical socialism openly advocating the elimination of property rights, the danger to our institutions is obvious. It is clear that our representatives will be out-voted and our Nation, whatever its intentions, will continually be involved in domestic, as well as international, strife with radicals, even Bolshevists, at home and abroad, just when we need and should expect peace.

It is not the ideals underlying the league of nations that are opposed, but rather the logical effects of the operations of the specific league proposed. I am confident that the Senators clearly understand that with unanimous consent required but few, if any, changes in league provisions can be secured after the treaty is ratified.

I believe that instead of coercion the Senators should receive commendation for their patriotic stand for a full opportunity for thorough study and understanding of their duty at this time.

I am forwarding a copy of your telegram and of this response to the Senators from my State.

Very truly, yours,

LEWIS E. PIERSON.

Mr. President, I commend this telegram and Mr. Pierson's answer to the careful study of the Senate.

SUGAR SUPPLY.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I have received a telegram bearing upon the question of the sugar supply, which is short and I believe it will be of interest to Senators. Therefore I send it to the desk and request that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., October 21, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In reply to the published telegrams of Attorney General Palmer, I beg to state that the beet-sugar manufacturers are not and have never been profiteering. On the contrary, we are disposing of our sugars voluntarily as rapidly as produced at prices far less than we could command in the open market had we desired to take advantage of the present crisis in the demand for sugar. I send this after conference with the president of the American Beet Sugar Co.

HENRY T. OXNARD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this connection I will say that I have received a number of telegrams from the beet-sugar manufacturers of the West, and I want now to protest in the name of the beet-sugar manufacturers of the country against the Attorney General's attempt to make the people of the United States believe that the beet-sugar manufacturers of the West are profiteers. They are perfectly willing to agree with the Government of the United States on the price at which sugar shall be sold. They are not holding their sugar back as charged. In fact, the first intermountain sugar plant began manufacturing sugar on the 6th day of this month, and it ill becomes any official of the Government, in my opinion, to attempt to make it appear that the beet-sugar industry is trying to profiteer in any way, shape, or form in the selling of its products. On the contrary, the industry is against unjust prices, even though the conditions in our country and the world would justify greatly increased prices.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to indorse what has been stated by my colleague and to supplement the statement by a few further observations.

One of the representatives of the beet-sugar manufacturers called on me some time ago and urged that everything be done possible by Congress to induce the President or some executive agency of the Government to purchase as much as possible of the Cuban sugar crop in order that the prices for sugar in the United States be brought down to the lowest possible figure. I know that that representative of the beet-sugar organization was anxious to have the Government fix as low a price as it cared to, and he said that the representatives of the beet-sugar companies would be perfectly willing to sell now, as they had been during the war, at such prices as the Government might deem necessary for the public welfare.

SOCIALISTIC ACTIVITIES.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a few days ago the second gas bomb in the attack of the packers was exploded on the floor of the Senate, and a number of gentlemen were accused of being socialists and reds. I think a resolution was at that time submitted which provided for investigation. I hope that an investigation may be made and made speedily. Some of these gentlement have no chance to reply to the attacks made upon them on this floor at the instigation, I believe, of the packers. Mr. Basil Manly, one of the gentlemen attacked, has written me a letter concerning it, and I think it is fair that the letter should be read to the Senate. No man has done more patriotic work in this war than Mr. Manly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SCRIPPS ECONOMIC BUREAU,
Washington, D. C., October 21, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM S. KENYON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR KENYON: I have just seen in this morning's papers the account of Senator WATSON's attack upon the so-called reds in the Federal Trade Commission.

This is, of course, nothing more nor less than an attempt to block the passage of the Kenyon bill for limiting the predatory activities of the packers.

If Senator WATSON is as inaccurate in his statements in reference to others as he is in his detailed account of my alleged activities, he is grossly misinformed.

I never attended a meeting of the Fabian Club, either during my connection with the investigation of the packers or at any other time. During my employment with the Federal Trade Commission Stuart Chase was in the employ of the Food Administration, and I was only in his office on two occasions, both of which were on important business for the Federal Trade Commission.

During my work in Chicago as an investigator for the Federal Trade Commission I attended only one meeting, in company with Francis J Heney and one or two others, which I recall very distinctly was a huge patriotic mass meeting under the auspices of the National Security League in the interest of the Liberty loan.

I am not a socialist and have never been a member of any socialist organization. It is true that for many years I have been engaged in exposing what I considered to be wrongs against the public interest, and have thus incurred the enmity of certain very powerful interests. However, I do not yield to Senator WATSON or to anyone else in my desire to preserve this Nation as a democracy of, by, and for the people for the purposes set forth in the Declaration of Independence and proclaimed in the Constitution.

Yours, very sincerely,

BASIL MANLY.

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, on my own responsibility, I present a letter from a gentleman in New York City, in relation to a member of the conciliation commission to settle the longshoremen's strike in New York and vicinity. I ask that the letter be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? There being no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, October 20, 1919.

Senator LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As you possibly may know, all shipping in the port of New York is now tied up by a strike of the longshoremen and freight handlers, so that thousands of tons of perishable food are spoiling on the wharves, to say nothing of immense quantities of merchandise ready for shipment to foreign and domestic ports.

Secretary of Labor Wilson has just appointed a conciliation commission of three members to try to settle this strike, and one of these members is a man named F. Paul Vaccarelli, about whom I wish to give you the following information:

Vaccarelli, under the name of Paul Kelley, has been known for several years in this city as a leader of a notorious gang of thieves and thugs, and if you will take the trouble to ask Mr. William E. Flynn, now of the Department of Justice Secret Service, and at one time a deputy police commissioner of New York City, you will find that Paul Kelley has a most elaborate and unsavory police record, including, I think, charges in which he has been more or less implicated in almost every known crime, including murder.

This Paul Kelley gang hung out for years in the notorious Mandarin Club, on Doyers Street, in the Chinese district of this city, only a short distance from Third Avenue, where murders, robberies, and other crimes were openly planned and freely discussed with any visitors who were properly introduced.

Vaccarelli's gang were largely used by Tammany politicians in terrorizing their opponents in certain districts, especially about election time, which probably is the reason why he is not in the penitentiary at the present time.

Mayor Mitchel, now dead, who preceded the present Mayor Hylan, through the police department, practically broke up this Paul Kelley gang, who thereupon removed to a saloon on the corner of Forty-third Street and Seventh Avenue, of this city, only a block away from the Hotel Astor, where they were apparently under police protection.

Vaccarelli was the adviser and confidant of his gang, sharing in their plunder and aiding them to get out of their scrapes by giving bail and securing the services of pliant attorneys, who appeared for them in court when arrested. Later he became connected with the Longshoremen's Union, which embraced the roustabouts and freight handlers on the water front, comprising about as tough and lawless body of men as can be found in this great city. He became an officer of this union, and as such politically useful to Tammany Hall even more than before. Unless I am very much mistaken, I think there are several untried indictments against Vaccarelli still pigeonholed in the New York City district attorney's office here, which is now controlled by Tammany influences.

It is an outrage on all decent people for a thug and gangster like Vaccarelli, who is responsible for many murders, robberies, and assaults upon innocent people, to be thus selected and honored by the United States Secretary of Labor. Can you beat it?

Yours, very truly,

WM. HALL ALLEN.

P. S.—The inclosed clippings from to-day's New York Times, page 1, may interest you in this connection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I send to the desk and ask to have printed without reading the news dispatch referred to in the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The dispatch is as follows:

[From the New York Times, Oct. 20, 1919.]

"The conciliation commission appointed on Saturday night by Secretary of Labor William B. Wilson to try to settle the longshoremen's strike got down to work early yesterday morning.

"COMMISSION MEETS TO-DAY.

"The first meeting of the full commission will be held at 10 o'clock this morning at the mayor's office, F. Paul Vaccarelli, the third member, being absent from the hearing yesterday. He said last night that he had not been officially notified of his appointment in time for the session yesterday.

"Replying to the attacks made upon him by T. V. O'Connor and Joseph Ryan, president and vice president, respectively, of the International Longshoremen's Association, and John F. Riley, strike chairman, who have protested his appointment on the commission, Mr. Vaccarelli said that the indorsement of these officials of the association would be considered a liability, and the strikers would show no more confidence in him than they have in the efforts of the officials to get them back to work.

"Speakers at the hearing yesterday protested against Mr. Vaccarelli as a member of the commission. He is president of the Harbor Boatmen's Union, and was formerly an official of the International Longshoremen's Association. When the strike was first called he was accused of having a hand in it, but he made emphatic denial of any connection with the longshoremen."

THE IRISH QUESTION.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask permission by unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Michael J. O'Brien, the historiographer of the American Irish Historical Society of New York in answer to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN IRISH HISTORICAL SOCIETY,
New York City.

HON. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
United States Senator from Mississippi,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: If the reports of your speech in the Senate in this morning's papers are correct, it is clear that you are entirely without knowledge of the facts of your subject, and it is for the purpose of informing you of a few of those facts that I am writing you this letter.

I regret to learn that you have received "threatening letters" because of your attitude on the question of Ireland, and that you assume they came from Irish sources. Most people will be surprised at this, since it is not in the Celtic nature thus to threaten an honorable opponent, however ignorant of his facts or however ungenerous he himself may be, and I can assure you with perfect confidence that if any Irishmen are responsible for such threats they do not represent genuine Irish feeling. But, doubtless you have heard before of "the devil dressing himself in the livery of heaven" so as to strike his opponents in the dark, and I recommend for your consideration the probability that these anonymous letters originated with an entirely different source than that to which you have attributed them.

The burden of your speech is upon what the Irish did or did not do in the Revolutionary War. You profess to believe they had no part in that struggle; that there were so very few Irish in this country at the time that their cooperation was utterly negligible. As one who has given many years of research to this subject, I am willing to admit that heretofore there has been much doubt and confusion as to the actual facts, and I admit also that some exaggerations have been indulged in by Irishmen whose enthusiasm was greater than their knowledge of the facts.

But let me tell you, sir, that there is no longer room for doubt on this subject, and in order that you may satisfy yourself on that point I am sending you a copy of a recent publication entitled "A Hidden Phase of American History." Almost without exception the critics agree that this book is a fair and impartial study of the case, and you will not find one statement within its covers where the authority is not fully shown. It stands as a challenge to every opponent of the principle that America is much indebted to Ireland; and, furthermore, you will find absolute proof in this book that America owes more to Ireland for the part played by her sons in the struggle for our independence than she does to any other country on earth.

In your opinion, statements such as this are only "part of the braggart nature of the Irish," who are "always contending that they have done everything, everywhere, at every time." I have never known, and I am certain no living person has ever known, that the Irish have made any such ridiculous contentions. * * *

Since you regard as incredulous anything that the Irish may say on this matter, suppose we cast aside every statement on the subject from an Irish source and find out what our enemies at the time of the Revolution had to say on the subject. Doubtless you regard English opinion worthy of credence, and it is English testimony I shall quote here.

(1) Let us first put on the witness stand the most competent of all English witnesses of the time, no less a person than Gen. Sir Henry Clinton, commander in chief of the English armies in America. On the 8th of March, 1778, Lord George Germain, secretary of war, wrote Clinton, directing him "to draw off from the American Army the number of Europeans which constituted its principal force." On the 23d of October, 1778, Clinton replied to this letter, relating the difficulties of carrying out these instructions, and in referring to the Continental Army Clinton said: "The emigrants from Ireland are, in general, to be looked upon as our most serious antagonists." This document is in the English archives at the public record office in London, and, as I have no doubt you have sufficient influence with "the powers that be" to secure a copy, I suggest that you send for it, since it is a rare historical document. But, as you may not wish to go to that trouble, I am sending you a photographic reproduction of the page from Clinton's letter in which this remarkable statement appears.

(2) Let us consult the testimony of Ambrose Serle, confidential agent of the British cabinet, who was sent to this country in 1776 by Lord Dartmouth, secretary of state, with instructions to determine and report upon "the strength, character, and personnel of the Rebel Army." Serle's letters to Lord Dartmouth indicate that he was an astute and observant official, and one in whose statements perfect reliance could be placed. In his very first letter to the home government, dated New York, September 25, 1776, Serle said: "Great numbers of emigrants, particularly Irish, are in the Rebel Army * * * and here they do Great Britain much injury by bringing over numbers and trades, and so adding strength, already too great, to the force of America against her." This document is among the records in the Tower of London, and, so as to save you the trouble of sending some one to that unsavory place to secure a copy, I am also sending you a photograph of Serle's written statement.

(3) You impugn as unworthy of consideration the statements of Galloway and Robertson that "one-half the Revolutionary troops were Irish." You do this in such a way as to make it clear that you believe no such testimony was ever given, and it is evidently your intention to create the impression throughout the country that this assertion emanates solely from "the braggart nature of the Irish." Now, while I myself believe that this estimate was exaggerated, I will prove to you that the testimony was actually given * * *. This testimony was given under oath before a committee of the lords and commons in the year 1779; Galloway's statement was printed in the Royal Gazette of October 17, 1779, and Robertson's in the Parliamentary Register, or Proceedings of the House of Commons, and you will find photographs of both statements in A Hidden Phase of American History, at pages 78 and 90, respectively. In face of this you will no longer dare to assert, will you, Senator WILLIAMS, that this testimony was never given?

But as to what weight should be given to this testimony there may be some doubt. I have tried to verify it, but without success. I examined every available muster roll of the Revolutionary Army; I took down the total number of men and the number of Irish in each and every unit, and on the most careful and conservative computation, and casting aside all predilections in favor of the Irish, I found that at least 38 per cent of the American Army of Liberty were of Irish birth or of Irish descent. You can see for yourself how this proportion was arrived at, if you care to trouble yourself about the facts.

You say "there were 10 Irishmen in the British Army to every one in the American Revolutionary Army." That, sir, is an absolutely false assertion, and you have no warrant or authority whatever for it, since not even the worst enemy of the Irish has ever dared to make such a statement. It is perfectly true there were Irishmen in the British Army, as unfortunately there have been at all times, but that you may know with what reluctance these men fought against the colonists, I quote from the Pennsylvania Packet of November 27, 1775, a letter from Cork, Ireland, detailing the failure of the recruiting officers to fill up the regiments destined for the American service: "Many of the drafts that have come here to fill up the regiments ordered abroad swear they will never draw a trigger against the Americans, amongst whom they all have relations." The same writer prophesied wholesale desertions of Irish soldiers from the British regiments, and I have found abundant evidence to show that the Irish soldiers took every opportunity of "deserting to the rebels." See Force's American Archives (4th series, vol. 3), the New York Historical Society Collections for 1875, and the Royal Gazette for October 18, 1780.

Another of your statements is that "two-thirds of the Irish in America (in Revolutionary times) were Scotch-Irish and English-Irish from Ulster." That is another falsehood, as is amply proven by the records quoted in A Hidden Phase of American History. If it were so, how do you account for the preponderance of Irish names on the muster rolls, over and above those of supposed Scotch and English origin? How do you account for the great number of Revolutionary soldiers bearing the oldest names known to Irish family nomenclature? Let me illustrate by a few of these names and the number of Revolutionary soldiers of each name whom I have found on the rolls: Kelly, 695; Murphy, 494; Connor; O'Connor, 327; McCarthy, 331; Ryan, 332; Reilly, 286; Sullivan, 266, Dougherty, 248; Connolly, 243; Burke, 221; O'Brien, 230; O'Neill, 178; Fitzgerald, 184; Donnelly, 155.

Of 100 surnames of as ancient Irish origin as these, I have counted on the rolls a total of 12,293, and when the fact is considered that numerous other Irish names are represented on the rolls, I leave it to your own imagination to conclude what a gross injustice you have done to the Irish who fought and bled that this country of ours may be freed from foreign yoke.

I call your particular attention to the list of officers of Irish blood in the Revolutionary Army and Navy—nearly 1,500 in all—and to the further fact that Washington selected as his personal secretaries and aides such men as Reed and Carey, sons of Irish immigrants, and Moylan, McHenry, and Fitzgerald, natives of Ireland. Were these men, as well as Sullivan and Barry, O'Brien and Butler, and the many other trusted officers of the patriot army and navy your "Scotch-Irish" and "English-Irish"?

From A Hidden Phase of American History you may acquaint yourself with these and a thousand other facts concerning the Irish in the Revolution, and after you have read the book I assume you will not be unwilling to make the amende honorable and retract your previous statement. By your intemperate utterances as a public man, you have greviously injured the finest feelings of millions of people who have stood by their country in all the wars in which America has been engaged, and since even the commander of the English armies admitted that "the Irish emigrants" who enlisted in the "rebel" forces were his "most serious antagonists," surely it will not be incompatible with the dignity of even a Senator of the United States to admit that he was wrong.

Very respectfully, MICHAEL J. O'BRIEN.

LVIII——461

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9783. An act to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Senate has appointed a special committee to devise a plan for a budget system, the bill will be referred to that committee.

SOCIALISTIC ACTIVITIES—FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may make a brief statement relative to the resolution introduced on the 20th instant by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and referred to in the letter sent to the desk by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we on this side of the Chamber could not hear the request of the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement touching the remarks of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] on the subject of "red" activities in the Federal Trade Commission. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I shall heartily support the resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to investigate charges against employees of the Federal Trade Commission. I do more than that; I urge that it be reported without delay. The speech of the Senator, in my judgment, will do more harm to efforts to reduce the high cost of living than anything that has occurred since I have been a Member of the Senate. The Federal Trade Commission has made known certain facts in regard to the methods of the five meat packers which are being considered by the Senate Agricultural Committee. The facts can not be contradicted, and an attack on a few minor employees will not deceive the public or prevent the consideration of these facts on their merit.

Mr. President, I was appointed by the President as a member of the Federal Trade Commission when it was first organized. The commission took over all employees of the old Bureau of Corporations, which was a part of the Department of Commerce, and was organized, I think, by Mr. Frank Hitchcock, then Assistant Secretary of Commerce, who was afterwards chairman of the Republican National Committee and Postmaster General. Most of these employees are still there; they were placed under the civil service, and nearly all are Republicans. Mr. Walter Durand, one of the economists who was condemned by the Senator, is a brother of Mr. E. Dana Durand, former Director of the Census, and before that connected with the Bureau of Corporations. Mr. Dana Durand was employed by the packers while his brother was engaged in this investigation.

I do not remember the other employees of the commission referred to by the Senator. The administrative part of the commission, under a resolution which I offered while a member, was placed entirely under the secretary of the body, and the commissioners did not come in contact with the minor employees. I did not know their views; but if the charges of the Senator from Indiana are true, they should be discharged at once, not only in the commission, but in all other Government agencies.

When the investigation of the packers began, Mr. Edward N. Hurley was chairman. He was afterwards chairman of the United States Shipping Board, and did as much as any man in this country to help win the war. I have never known an abler man or one who was more anxious to do constructive work for the benefit of the people of this country. Mr. Hurley has made a great success in business. The Federal Trade Commission is composed at present of former Gov. Fort, of New Jersey; Mr. William B. Colver, of Minnesota; Mr. Victor Murdock, of Kansas; and Mr. Houston Thompson, of Colorado. I served with the first three members for several months, and while we did not agree at all times on all matters, I found them to be conscientious and able men, with only one thing in view—to serve their country. Gov. Fort, a Republican, had been governor of his State and a member of the supreme court of New Jersey. Mr. Colver is a very able man, and whatever else may be said of him, no one charges that he is not the friend of the consuming public. Mr. Murdock was for many years in Congress, a leading Republican and Progressive—a man who has the confidence and respect of everyone who knows him. Mr. Houston Thompson had been Assistant Attorney General, where he rendered most able service. He has been a Republican in politics, but, I understand, voted for President Wilson. There is no politics in the commission, so far as I know. The commission's work in cost accounting during the war saved this country hundreds of millions of dollars in Government purchases. The chief economist is Dr. Francis Walker, a son of Gen. Walker, of Massachusetts, who was Director of the Census Bureau just after the Civil War and a man of ability and character. Mr. Roberson, who, with Dr. Walker, planned the investigation of the meat packers, was with the old Bureau of Corporations through several Republican administrations. He is a man of ability and is one of the most useful men I have met in the Government service. The administrative office of the commission during my service there was in the entire charge of Mr. Leonidas Brackens, who is from the Senator's own State. He had full charge of the employees and directed investigations. He is a man of ability, education, and integrity. There may be a few exceptions; but, taking them as a whole, there are no more efficient or honorable employees in this Government than those of the Federal Trade Commission.

There are very few employees of the commission from my section of the country and there is no commissioner from the South.

Mr. President, I have been greatly surprised at statements made on the floor of the Senate about efficient and honorable employees of the Government who can not defend themselves. I am glad to say that the first statement I made in the Senate was in the defense of the members of the Tariff Commission, with whom I had been officially associated. I knew them to be honorable, upright, and able men. The men I defended were Republicans, but my association with them and the Government agencies with which they were connected convinced me that a great injustice had been done them. For my part, I think the injury done to the man who is stabbed in the dark is no greater than the injury inflicted upon the character of efficient public employees by charges in Congress which investigation beforehand would show to be groundless. I shall always be guarded in my remarks in criticizing public officials.

Lawyers, when they have a poor case and can not controvert the facts, resort to denouncing and ridiculing the attorney and plaintiff on the other side, and the Senator's effort to discredit the Federal Trade Commission will hinder but will not deter those who are trying to bring some constructive legislation that will protect the consuming public. The combination of the meat packers is doing more to prevent the reduction of the high cost of living than any other monopoly in this country. They are spending millions in lobbying, advertising, and in other directions in their propaganda to prevent legislation that will curb their power. If they would reduce their profits and give the people the benefit of the millions they are spending in this way, there would be no necessity for such legislation; but they have resorted to the plan which wrought havoc to the railroads by trying to defy the Government and prevent needed legislation through lobbying and paid advertisements. In some papers the press report giving facts about the packers' methods is placed underneath the criticism and attacks of the five packers on the Federal Trade Commission and its members. The Federal Trade Commission stands between the consuming public and the monopolies of this country. If you discredit the commission by charges against its employees and the commissioners or otherwise, it will do more to perpetuate the monopolies and continue the high cost of living than anything that can be done.

Mr. President, there has never been a lobby in this country so powerful as that of the packers. One of the greatest lobbies ever before Congress was when the packers were powerful enough to secure legislation allowing them to control their private cars, which, like the pipe lines of the Standard Oil companies, enabled them more than any other thing to prevent competition and perpetuate monopoly. The packers have not only hired agents but they are spending millions of dollars in advertising and other ways in trying to influence the public. Their lobby to prevent the passage of the Borland resolution to investigate the packers has never been surpassed. The packers have tried to employ men who had influence with Members of Congress or the Government agencies. They have not stopped at anything in their propaganda. They have sent their employees to cities and towns and by distorting the facts have had resolutions passed by civic bodies and other organizations. They have forged telegrams that were never signed. The organization of the packers is so great and the combination so complete that they can put out of business any wholesale or retail grocer in any part of the country. There is no individual in the State of Indiana or in the country whose living expenses are not made higher by reason of the monopoly of the packers. The prices of all of the hogs and cattle raised by the farmers in Indiana and the entire country are fixed by this combination of packers.

If the Senator from Indiana does not know, many others do, that the packers are good friends when it comes to contributions for campaign funds, but enemies of the public when it comes to reducing the cost of living.

Mr. President, I think every man who is writing or speaking against our form of government should be sent out of this country, and for my part I am opposed to any immigration into this country for some time because of the large foreign element in sections of the United States who do not understand our form of government. I favor the deportation of all Bolshevists, anarchists, and such people, and I am proud to say that in my section we have none of that class. I regret that they are such a menace to other sections of our country.

I agree with all the Senator has said about Bolshevists, anarchists, and socialists, and I shall join him in every effort to get rid of such people in the Government service and the country. However, if the Senator discredits the Federal Trade Commission, destroys its usefulness, and the legislation to regulate the packers is defeated, then I fear the Senator will have aided the cause of socialism and Bolshevism a thousand times more than all the Government employees he has mentioned. But I hope that while we are ridding the Government of this undesirable class the distinguished Senator from Indiana will join with other Senators who are trying to enact constructive legislation to regulate the packers, prevent them from continuing to make the cost of living high, help defeat the object of their campaign to discredit this legislation, and protect the people from this monopoly.

The Senator began his remarks by saying, "What I say in support of this legislation is in no wise a defense of the packers." The packers are now spending millions of dollars to discredit and destroy the Federal Trade Commission, but none of their efforts have been as effective as those of the Senator from Indiana. If the Senator can discredit the commission in this investigation he has accomplished more for the packers than they could for themselves with all of their millions spent in lobbying and propaganda. He will also advance the aims of Bolshevism and socialism if he causes the people of our country to lose confidence in their public officials.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in the remarks of the Senator from Georgia. The speech that he has delivered is in the nature of confession and avoidance. He has said that he is in favor of the adoption of the resolution introduced on Monday.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the resolution, because an investigation of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission will show that they are faithful, honorable, and patriotic employees of this Government, with perhaps a few exceptions.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator reiterates, Mr. President, that he is in favor of the resolution, and therefore he and I are together on that fundamental proposition. The statement I made had no reference whatever to the Federal Trade Commission as such. I distinctly stated that I was not seeking by this resolution at this time to involve the members of the Federal Trade Commission as such. As to what may develop in the course of an investigation I do not know; but I did state on my responsibility as a Senator that I had carefully investigated the matter to which I referred in my remarks and that I had every reason to believe, after a faithful investigation, that the charges I made were true. All I ask is an investigation in order to prove the truthfulness of these propositions.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if he personally investigated the charges which he made against Mr. Basil Manly, and if he has heard the letter of Mr. Basil Manly read this morning?

Mr. WATSON. I heard a part of the letter of Mr. Manly read.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator say that he personally investigated the charges against Mr. Manly before he made his speech?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. KENYON. And that the charges are correct?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Would the Senator object to giving us the sources of his information as to Mr. Manly?

Mr. WATSON. When that committee meets I will give the source of my information.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator say that those sources of information did not come from the packers or their representatives in this city or anywhere else?

Mr. WATSON. I say that they did not. I do not know a packer, one of the big five; I never met one.

Mr. KENYON. Did the Senator meet any of their lobby in the city of Washington before he prepared his speech?

Mr. WATSON. I did not. I have had communication with but one man in any wise connected with the big packers.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator say that none of his information as to these men came from the representatives of the packers?

Mr. WATSON. I say that.

Mr. KENYON. It did not?

Mr. WATSON. It did not. In other words, my information about the Federal Trade Commission came from the inside of the Federal Trade Commission itself. That is where I got it, and after I got it I hunted out one man in this town and asked him whether or not he had information along the same line.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, does the Senator then charge that the refutation of Mr. Manly—who had no chance to reply to the attack except by this letter—is untrue?

Mr. WATSON. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I did not hear all the letter read because I was interrupted, but the part I heard I think I can disprove. In other words, I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that if we have this investigation for which I have asked I expect to substantiate every statement I made with reference to these men and their socialistic activities.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator has heard no opposition to the resolution, has he?

Mr. WATSON. No; not that I know of.

Mr. KENYON. Everyone favors it. Where is the resolution now? Why is it not presented and passed?

Mr. WATSON. It is before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], who is the chairman of that committee, has been absent until this morning, and I had no opportunity to take up the matter with him.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator expect the resolution to be reported out of that committee?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. If it can be reported out now, it can be passed. There is no one opposed to it that I know of.

Mr. WATSON. The only point about it is that it is necessary for the committee to make an estimate of the cost, and then it must be brought into the Senate. The committee has not met for that purpose.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, our committee having been brought into this matter, I may say that we have not had a meeting. I have not read the resolution. I have no knowledge of it except what I have seen in the newspapers and what has been said this morning. We will have a meeting in due time and pass upon it, and undoubtedly will report it.

Mr. WATSON. I called the attention of the Senator from New York this morning to the resolution when I learned that he had returned.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I might add that the Senator from Indiana called on me this morning and said that it was his purpose to bring the resolution to my attention further during the day and ask for consideration of it.

Mr. WATSON. Now, Mr. President, all I want to say is this: This thing can not be thrashed out on the floor of the Senate. It can be determined by the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee if this resolution is passed, and all I want is the opportunity to prove the truthfulness of my assertions.

My friend the Senator from Georgia has made two statements that are wide apart from the issue involved. The first is a defense of the Federal Trade Commission, which has not been assailed. The second is the charge——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that the Associated Press carried his entire speech, and the headlines in the papers that I have seen from the South all refer to the attack made on the Federal Trade Commission and its employees.

Mr. WATSON. I am not responsible for what any press report carries. My speech speaks for itself, and my charge was directed against the employees of the Federal Trade Commission during the time they were occupied in investigating the packers in the city of Chicago. Now, I want to ask my friend from Iowa a question. I want to ask him whether or not he denies the socialistic activities of these gentlemen whose names I gave?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have said nothing about anyone except Mr. Manly. I do not know the other men. If they are guilty of the things the Senator claims—that is, that they are "reds"—they should be fired out of the commission just as quickly as they can be fired.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely.

Mr. KENYON. I am with the Senator on that. I want to know, however, whether that is the real purpose of the resolution, or whether the purpose is to injure the bills that are pending here for the control of the packers?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I distinctly stated, and I reiterate, that I have no desire in the world to interfere with the investigation that is being conducted by the committee of which the Senator from Iowa is chairman.

Mr. KENYON. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken about that. I am not the chairman of it. That matter is before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WATSON. Before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; yes. I have not read one line of that testimony.

Mr. KENYON. But is it not a little strange, when these gentlemen have been employed there for years, that this question has never been raised until we get to the consideration of the packers' bill? That is what arouses a person's curiosity as to these attacks.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, for many weeks I have been investigating the activities of socialists in the departments in Washington, not only in this department but in other departments; and I will say to the Senator that I propose from time to time to bring up these other departments, and to give the names of men who are employed, and to give the socialistic activities of these other men.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will do it at the earliest possible moment, and he will find a most cordial cooperation among the Members of this body; but how does it happen that at this time, when we are considering the packers' bill, we simply get this one, which the Senator must realize would have a very bad effect upon the consideration of that bill? It would discredit the report of the Federal Trade Commission. The Federal Trade Commission never was attacked until it had the nerve and the courage to tell the American people some of the facts about the Packing Trust.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, if the Federal Trade Commission has told the country the facts, those facts are not going to be overturned by the character of the men who made the investigation.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Iowa says the Federal Trade Commission never was attacked until the packers' legislation came along. I can hardly let that statement pass without challenge. I have been overwhelmed for several years with complaints from business men concerning the Federal Trade Commission for its inefficiency, incompetence, and inability to discharge the public business. It is notoriously so.

Mr. KENYON. I think that correction is well taken as to my remarks. I should have said it never was attacked as to its socialistic or "red" tendencies.

Mr. PENROSE. I have hardly heard an epithet of condemnation in the English language that has not been visited upon every individual member of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. KENYON. Well, I suspect that is no more true than it is of the condemnation that is visited upon Members of Congress and Members of the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. That may be.

Mr. KENYON. But I say they never have been charged with being disloyal and socialistic and anarchistic in their tendencies, except possibly by some big business concerns that they might be investigating.

Mr. PENROSE. I am glad the Senator from Iowa concedes, then, that this is not the only time the Federal Trade Commission has been attacked.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator say they have been attacked before as socialistic and anarchistic?

Mr. PENROSE. I have heard almost every epithet, charge, and designation, mostly unfit to print, applied to the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator has heard things that I have not, then. He has had information that I have not.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have heard a good many hard things and a great many epithets regarding the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, but I have not given them any credit.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, that may be. In the rough and tumble of party politics we hear those things; but here is a semijudicial body that is absolutely condemned—I know of no exception—by the business men who have been unfortunate enough to come before it for its incompetence and its inability to discharge any function that I have been able to ascertain.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I am familiar with some of the investigations made, and I recall that from the Senator's State, the State of Pennsylvania, a number of business men were before the Trade Commission, and about 200 in that section of the East, some from Pennsylvania, plead guilty to the complaints made against them. I will cite an instance to show the work the Trade Commission is doing, and of course they will always be abused by big business that is not trying to do a legitimate business.

There was a man in San Francisco selling poles. The Western Electric Co. was a competitor. He did not know that. They not only destroyed his business but they actually bought the business of this poor man—everything in the world he had. The Federal Trade Commission investigated it, and the General Electric Co. paid this man $30,000, I believe, and gave him back his property, when the Trade Commission investigation showed what had been done.

Men like this, Mr. President, will always be denouncing the Federal Trade Commission. Men who believe that big business should do as they please, and not let little business get along and get a start, just as they did, will always be denouncing the Federal Trade Commission. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will remember the men who denounced the Federal Trade Commission, and will give a list of them to the Federal Trade Commission, he will probably find that they have been investigated by the commission for unfair practices in commerce.

Mr. WATSON. The statement the Senator makes is wide of the mark so far as the purpose of this resolution is concerned.

This resolution charges that certain men employed by the Federal Trade Commission are socialists, that some of them are anarchists, and the question that I want investigated is whether or not that is true. If that be true, both Senators say that these men should be ousted from their present positions. The question as to whether the packers are guilty or not guilty has not a thing in the world to do with the question involved. All agree that if my resolution charges the truth, these men should be ousted from their present positions. All I want is an investigation, and then, if I do not show the truthfulness of every charge I have made, I will honorably say so on the floor of this body. My information is entirely reliable and entirely trustworthy, and I propose, if this investigation is ordered, to prove the truthfulness of the charges I have made. If I do that to the satisfaction of my friend from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] I have no doubt that both of them will agree that these men, and all of like character, should be ousted from public position in this and every other department of the Government service. That is the only object I have in view.

Now, I want to make response to one statement made by the Senator from Georgia. I know that he did not mean it in a personal way, but I do not think I should permit it to pass without being noticed. He says that if the Senator from Indiana does not know, other Senators know, and other people know, that the packers are large contributors to campaign funds. Mr. President, no packer every contributed one dollar to any campaign fund of which I have any knowledge. If the packers ever gave one dollar to anyone for political purposes in the State of Indiana I do not know it. Certainly, if the Senator had any reference to me personally, I would repel it as an outrage.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to state to the Senator that I had no reference to him personally; I have the very highest regard for him; but I state, and I state with a knowledge of the facts, that they have contributed largely to campaign funds, and it is generally known by men in public life.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana permit me on that point?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I am a little astonished at this disclosure of sensitiveness on campaign contributions. There is not a prominent man connected with the present administration, in a position of authority, who did not get his original recognition by reason of the size of his campaign contributions to the Democratic Party—every ambassador, every man connected with the peace conference in Paris; I do not want to mention names, but notorious Wall Street gamblers; men regardless of how they made their money as long as they were lavish enough to the Democratic Party. I am surprised that the Senator develops this fine sensitiveness about campaign contributions at this late date. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The occupants of the galleries are paying no attention to the rules of the Senate, and the doorkeepers are paying no attention to the orders of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I am sorry the Senators are so sensitive about campaign contributions. I want to say to the Senator that I had no reference to them or to the Republican Party or any other party. The packers are interested in legislation and are spending fabulous sums in a propaganda to defeat legislation at this time. They do not care any more about one party than they do another. I had no reference whatever to the Republican Party or to any party.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have no doubt that certain groups of the packers have been very liberal to the Democratic Party.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know about that, Mr. President. The Senator is higher up in the party council than I am.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator seemed so familiar with the other facts that I supposed he was an expert on the subject of campaign contributions.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the other proposition involved is that several of these employees, as stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], are Republicans. I know nothing about that. If the Republican Party has within its fold men of the character of those I described the other day, and those men are Republicans, then I am not a Republican. If I had my way about it no man who believes in the things that those men believe in and have practiced and worked for should ever be recognized in the councils of the Republican Party. Certainly the Republicanism in which I believe, and in which I have believed and for which I have labored all my life, is not that kind of Republicanism, because the Republican Party has never believed in any of these socialistic ideas, but on the contrary has always believed in constitutional government, representative in character, with the right of individual initiative and individual endeavor, and with the right of ownership and use and enjoyment of private property.

Mr. KENYON. I did not have the pleasure of hearing the Senator's speech, nor have I yet had time to read it. But I understood the Senator had described these men not only as socialists but virtually as anarchists and as attending meetings of the "reds."

Mr. WATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. That is what I mean when I say that if the Senator proves that they should be expelled at once from Government service. But the Senator now says that if he should show they were socialists they ought to be at once expelled. Does the Senator mean that no socialist should be in any way employed by the Government? I do not want to go to that extent.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, if I were to enter here upon a dissertation on the subject of socialism, it would take me two hours to give my views upon that subject.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator said he believed they should be expelled. I go to the point of agreeing with that view if the Senator shows they are "reds" and anarchists.

Mr. WATSON. That is what I will prove.

Mr. KENYON. But I do not want to go to the extent of saying that they should be expelled if they might happen to be socialists.

Mr. WATSON. There are at least 49 varieties of socialism; 57 varieties, my friend from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] suggests. Of course, Mr. President, I would not go to the extent of saying that every man who entertained any of the mild views that some socialists entertain should be kept from public position. But I do mean that I do not believe that men who believe in the fundamental principles of socialism—and fundamentally socialism and Bolshevism are the same, as I could prove beyond a doubt if I cared to go into it—men of that stamp of character who are opposed to all government, ought to be permitted to work for any government. I do not believe that the men who believe that business should be taken away from the men who have made it and the men who own it and given to the Government should be sent out to investigate business of any character. They are against all business, and are therefore in no frame of mind or mental attitude to investigate any business. I do not believe that a man who is opposed to the fundamental principles of this Republic ought ever to be employed in any official capacity by this Republic, and that is the thing I have in mind. And I will say to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] that I think I shall show to his satisfaction that these men are guilty of the very things I have charged.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] I take it for granted that he is very deeply interested in the question of reducing the high cost of living. Evidently he thinks that the Federal Trade Commission is the body that is going to bring about that reduction. I want him, as the personal defender of the commission upon this floor, to call the attention of the commission to the report of a subcommittee of the Agricultural Committee of this body. Senator BALL was chairman of the subcommittee, and I want at this point to call attention to a part of the subcommittee report. The subcommittee reported that—

Frequently retail prices are from 200 to 300 per cent in excess of the wholesale prices. It would seem that the retail meat dealers receive a greater per cent of profit than the farmer, live-stock raiser, buyer, railroads, commission men, and cold-storage houses and packers combined.

I think, Mr. President, that is a fruitful field for the Federal Trade Commission to investigate, but I doubt whether an investigation will be made, because there are too many voters involved, and it is not popular at this time to attack a business, even though making two or three hundred per cent, if many votes are involved. It is admitted by everyone that the packers make only 2 per cent on their turnover, the smallest of any line of business in all the world; but they have few votes. This is a splendid place for the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission to begin, Mr. President, to see how the high cost of living can be reduced. It was shown—and I know it to be true—that to-day the wholesale price of beef in the District of Columbia is $16.44 a hundred. That includes every dollar that is paid to the man who raises the steer, all the expenses attached in raising it, the expense of purchasing it, the expense of shipping it to market, and the expense of the packer from the time he receives the steer until the beef is put in the retailer's hands here in the District of Columbia. I doubt very much whether $16.44 a hundred, for which that beef is sold by the packer to the retailer in the District of Columbia, will cover the difference between the wholesale price and the price that the consumer is compelled to pay in this city.

LIVE-STOCK INDUSTRY OF THE WEST.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have here a communication from the Kansas State Live Stock Association, one of the strongest and largest associations of producers in the West, which I would like to have read by the Secretary, and then, if I may have the unanimous consent of the Senate for a few minutes, I would like to have the indulgence of the Senate for a brief comment on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The executive committee of the Kansas State Live Stock Association have requested us to appeal to you and other Members of Congress and to the various departments of the Federal Government in behalf of the live-stock industry of the West, which is now threatened with disaster.

We have the anomalous situation at this time of complaint from consumers all over the country that meat prices are high, while at the same time the producer is losing money on every animal he markets at present prices.

We believe that from the supply and demand standpoint there is no legitimate cause for the radical decline of 25 per cent in live-stock values in the last 90 days. But, nevertheless, every animal marketed to-day loses the cattle feeder from $30 to $50. The loss to live-stock raisers in Kansas alone amounts to millions of dollars in the last few weeks. There will be a great falling off in number of cattle and hogs fed in the Southwest the coming season, and production greatly curtailed, if conditions do not improve.

Legislation that will assist in opening up the foreign markets, establish a system of credit advances for foreign buyers, stabilize the home markets, and reestablish normal business conditions at the earliest possible moment will be of great assistance to us. There should also be a reduction in ocean rates on meat products to European markets.

We believe the situation should have the best attention of the Federal Government.

Very respectfully,

W. R. STUBBS, Chairman.
J. H. MERCER, Secretary.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate especially to this memorial because it has direct bearing upon the relation of the producer to the problem that is uppermost now in the minds of all the people of this country, and which really is at the base of the inquiry that is now being conducted in this city by the industrial conference.

A subject that is engrossing the attention of the whole Nation at this time is the matter of the cost of living. On every hand it confronts us. It touches every person in our land. The industrial conference now in session at the call of the President has at its base, as I said, this same vexing problem. In our efforts to get rid of the high-cost-of-living disease I fear we are in some danger of dying of the remedy. As a result of Washington's effort to reduce high prices by bearing down entirely on the cost of food, we have the remarkable spectacle of a rise of 1 per cent in the cost of living coincident with market drops that are putting live-stock raisers out of business and causing serious losses to other producers.

Mr. President, for many years I have been in touch with farming and with the needs and aspirations of farmers. We do not need the statistics—which, if required, might be produced in abundance—to convince us of the patriotism of the farmers of the Nation in responding to all war needs, whether in increased production, in subscribing to war charities and war loans, or in giving their sons to the Army and Navy and their wives and daughters to replace them in the field. We know full well of the nature and degree of the farmer's response to every call made upon him. But when the call went out summoning this great industrial conference to meet in Washington, the farmers of the Nation, constituting almost half of our producing population, were accorded but three representatives. Agriculture, the greatest of all industries and the basic industry of the country, finds itself playing a minor part, so far as number of representatives is concerned, in a conference which, if it succeeds in its purposes, will have a vital effect on the future industrial life of the Nation.

In this agriculture is acting a not unusual rôle. It is unfortunate, but it is true, Mr. President, that agriculture never has received recognition in proportion to its vital importance in this country. Always it has been called upon to serve, rarely to participate in making the rules of service.

During the war and since the war, in whatever has been done to meet emergencies, it is the consumers' best friend, the producer, who has invariably been hit. He has been the one who chiefly has borne the brunt of it. When the control of the Food Administration was lifted last winter from flour, shorts, and bran, these products almost doubled in price immediately. Many dairymen were compelled to go out of business because they could not buy mill feed. But grain made little or no advance.

Then came dollar-an-hour wages, which would require about $3 wheat for the average winter-wheat grower to break even. And this has now been followed by a decline in the market price of all farm products incidental to an otherwise resultless campaign against profiteering which has left the producer in a position where he is getting decidedly the worst of it.

Farmers were urged during the war to produce wheat and were rewarded by an appreciative Government with a guaranteed price—nearly a dollar a bushel below what was being received in the open market. And the great United States Government profited $23,000,000 at the expense of the farmer in 1918. Then, early this year, the war having closed, the Government guaranteed the farmers a price for their wheat, and the Congress appropriated a billion dollars to back up the guaranty, but the farmer has been accepting anything from 20 to 70 cents less than the guaranteed price. The Government not only has the billion dollars saved, but the United States Grain Corporation, by means of an embargo on wheat and wheat products to Europe, probably will be able to report an equally large profit for the year 1919. The situation of the live-stock farmer is even more deplorable. Urged by the Government at the beginning of the war to produce an increasing amount of pork and mutton and beef, he responded as did the wheat farmer. In 1918, with the war on, he made a satisfactory profit, though nothing in comparison with the profits made by manufacturers in practically every line. It takes three years, Mr. President, to produce a steer for market. This year, with the war ended, with the Government out of the market, with the European markets closed by reason of prohibitive foreign exchange rates and lack of credit, with the Government making its first essay into the cost of living problems by a demand for a lowering of price of farm products, the live-stock man to-day finds himself confronted with a demoralized market, and a loss amounting sometimes to as high as $60 a steer on the very live stock that the Government induced him to produce. The result has been complete financial failure of many live-stock men and immense losses to all who had herds when this year's enormous slumps in prices occurred.

Farmers are selling their grain-fed beeves and hogs for less than it costs to produce them, but the consumer finds little or no change in the price of meat.

While everything a farmer must buy demands the high dollar, the price of his commodities, the cheapest in the market, are held down by a foreign embargo and a Government guaranty.

In 1917, when the Government set the price on wheat, Kansas farmers were selling it for $2.45 to $2.60 a bushel. Everything, including labor, has since doubled in price, but farmers are compelled to sell these same grades of wheat to-day for $1.80 to $2.04 a bushel. In Kansas the wheat area has been reduced two to three million acres as a consequence.

Without visibly helping the consumer, we have brought about a crisis in our most fundamental and vital industry by forcing the producer to accept prices at which he can not continue to produce.

We can not continue to take away from the producer the comparatively small profit he makes and expect him to go on producing and increasing his output. Such a policy leads inevitably to a lessened food supply and to more instead of less privation.

The policy, Mr. President, of fostering all industries except one, and neglecting that one, the most vital of all, is to-day driving many farmers out of business. In every big town in the Middle West you will find to-day many men working for day wages who will tell you they are retired farmers. The truth is they either failed to make a real living as tenant farmers, or, if, they owned the land, found it far more profitable to sell out than to continue farming.

The country is constantly and rapidly losing men possessing valuable knowledge and skill as farmers to the city, where they are by no means as useful. There can be no doubt about it that the extremely high price of land, the comparatively high wages paid labor, the hazards of farming, and our organized packer-controlled markets undoubtedly are greatly increasing the drift to the cities.

I know, Mr. President, that it is perfectly natural for city people, facing the burdensome cost of living, to jump at once to the conclusion that the first step in reducing such cost is to bear down the price of production. It seems logical, yet, under modern conditions of trade, there was never a greater error. It has been my fortune, Mr. President, during my brief service in the Senate to have opportunity to examine into the consumer's side of the cost of living, and I have been forced to the conclusion that the chief contributing element in high-living costs is our complicated and intricate distribution system. While the wheat farmer has been forced to accept much less than the Government guaranteed price for his wheat, and while the live-stock producers have incurred immense losses, and in many instances financial bankruptcy, because of a slump of 35 per cent in prices for live stock, the consumer has paid the same or higher prices for all food products except four. According to figures prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor, and given to the public last week, the only food items in which there have been reductions during this year are: Navy beans, 30 per cent decline; plate beef, 9 per cent decline; chuck roasts, 5 per cent decline; corn meal, 3 per cent decline. In contrast with these declines all other commodities in the list of staple foods showed increases ranging from 1 per cent for round steak, rib roast, and bread, to 28 per cent for lard and 85 per cent for onions. Butter showed an increase of 19 per cent; lard substitutes, 29 per cent, or 1 per cent more than lard itself; and fresh milk, 14 per cent. I shall not weary you with further statistics, except to say that while the bottom fell out of the hog market, declining 8 cents per pound in 60 days, bacon went up 11 per cent above the war prices of last year. Surely nothing further is required to show that the consumer is not reaping the benefit from the losses suffered by the producer, and surely these facts should help disabuse the public mind of the generally prevalent opinion that the farmer is rolling in wealth and prospering beyond all reason.

Indeed, Mr. President, the exact contrary is the case. Falling live-stock markets have in a few weeks cost Central West cattle and swine raisers $80,000,000. The drop on one Kansas man's steers amounted to $17 a head in just two days. A Nebraska farmer who owned a fat hog August 26 awoke next morning to find it worth $3 less. Three days later it was worth $12 to $15 less. When a farmer's entire capital is invested in a herd of hogs or cattle, it means a loss that not infrequently spells bankruptcy for him, for it must be borne in mind that not always—in fact, in a majority of cases—does the farmer own the land he farms.

Cut the farmer's price in two and the consumer hardly knows the difference, as has been shown, thanks to the long and increasing line of profit takers between producer and consumer; but when the farm prices get below the cost of production, as has been the case with cattle and hogs this year, and in many cases likewise with wheat, the producer has to stop. Mr. President, there is where the farmer's present dilemma is, and should be a matter of concern to the whole country, and must be if agricultural production shall not fall below the danger line in this country.

The farmer does not control the supply nor fix the price, and never has. He has to take what is given him. The profiteering is done further along the line. While speculator and gambler and gouger still get away with the swag, legitimate business suffers and the producer suffers.

Six and seven cent milk at the farm sells for 15 and 16 cents a quart in town. I am quoting Kansas prices now. The figures are much higher and the disparity much greater here in Washington.

The price of a single pair of shoes will keep one person in bread for a whole year, but a farmer can get only $5.10 for the hide of a year and a half old steer, which possibly would supply the leather for 8 or 10 pairs of $12 shoes. A pair of calfskin shoes costs more than the farmer gets for the calf. Somebody in between gets what is paid for the veal, while the calfskin makes many pairs of shoes.

It takes four and a half bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. The wheat raiser gets about $8.37 for the wheat, the miller $12.70, the baker $58.70, and the hotel keeper here in Washington, as it is doled out in thin slices, $587.

And the trouble is, Mr. President, that in many cases these extortionate profits of the middlemen come right back on the farmer. Although live-stock markets are demoralized and grain markets are down, the cost of mill feeds and oil meals soars higher. Farm wages have doubled. Everything the farmer buys has advanced from 50 to 300 per cent.

Needing some extra feed for his cows, a Kansas farmer writes me, he sent his daughter to town for 100 pounds. The price was $4.45. A few days later he needed another sack, and this time he had to pay $4.85 to get it. Yet everything that went into its production had gone down in price.

The other day seven Ohio farmers who were selling milk—and it developed that they were obtaining less than the cost of production, their investment considered—were thrown into jail at Cleveland. Their offense was "collective bargaining." They were officers and salesmen of a farmers' cooperative company. Their arrest was caused, of course, by commission merchants, who sought to drive them from the field of distribution. The excuse was that they were combining in restraint of trade. Yet what these men were attempting to do, if it became the general practice, would probably solve the problem of providing better prices for the producer and lower prices for the consumer by cutting out the army of middlemen that thrive off the industry of both. If it is to be the practice of the Government to prosecute farmers who seek a more economical method of supplying their products to the consumer, the inevitable results will be to drive more and more farm-bred boys and girls and even their parents to the city, with a consequent permanent injury to the farming industry.

Indeed, Mr. President, that is what is taking place in this country right now. In my own State more than half of the 25,157 increase in population in the last year was in the four largest cities, according to a statement made only last week by our State board of agriculture. The population in towns and cities of more than 2,500 increased 35,422, a net loss to the farming community of the State of 10,000.

At the risk of wearying the Senate, Mr. President, I desire to quote from some genuine letters from real farmers received in the last week.

Here is one from Oscar Miller, a farmer near Oxford, Kans.:

> I write in regard to smashing the high cost of living and the relation of the reduction to the cost production. It seems that cost of production is absolutely forgotten or ignored by the administration forces. The campaign is aimed at but one object, and that is the meat producer. Study of costs, such as feed, labor, is not considered by Palmer and his associates. The producer has no organization as yet, and can not concentrate his energies in strike and make himself feared. In this dilemma he is perfectly powerless. Our Department of Agriculture has been boasting of greatly increased production to save the world, and pays us for our pains by helping the administration send the price of hogs down $7 per hundred pounds. If this continues much longer, and the producers do become organized, they may use the same weapons as the labor unions, and as justly, for a Nation-wide railroad strike would be as brutal as a meat or grain producers' strike.

Another correspondent, J. J. Miller, Karvel, Colo., writes:

> The quickest and surest way to reduce the high cost of living is more production (this goes for manufacturing as well as farm production) and smaller armies, fewer Government jobs, smaller cities and towns. Every other farm in my vicinity is idle or rented to some poor cuss that had to stay here during the war like myself. Last year I farmed 230 acres alone, renting two half sections. This year I farmed 170 acres, renting one half section. Next year I will farm only 80 acres, renting none, and will work only eight hours a day. I am just as important as any union man, if I don't have a union card and pay dues.

Of course, this farmer will not keep his promise to himself, but will work from sun to sun, as do all of his kind.

I quote from a letter from S. C. Landis, a friend and neighbor in my home county, as good a farmer and as good a citizen as there is in America. He says:

> We are the most submissive of any industrial class. We take what we get for our products and have no price-fixing authority of our own, and when we want to buy anything some one else fixes the price for it. We never go on a strike and stop producing, and now, while nearly all other industrial classes are striking and restless, we are going on preparing our wheat ground for another crop * * * with lower prices staring us in the face on account of the great cry against the high cost of living.

I am glad to acknowledge, Mr. President, that the President could not have chosen better in selecting the three men who do represent the farming class in this great conference. In this connection I desire to quote briefly from the statement of Mr. Charles S. Barrett, president of the National Farmers' Union, one of the delegates representing agriculture, made at the industrial conference on October 8. Touching on this point of inadequate recognition of agriculture, Mr. Barrett used this language, which I most heartily indorse:

I am among those who believe that the farmers have not been dealt with in a fair, open manner. They have not been treated as an integral, important, and necessary part of industry. The fact that agriculture is basic, fundamental, and essential to the life of the world has either been ignored or given scant notice. The attitude of government toward agriculture is that of an irate parent toward a naughty, irresponsible boy.

Agriculture has been treated by the Government as something that ought to be governed rigidly, but should never have any part in government. Other groups have behaved as though agriculture were a side issue having no rights that should be fully regarded and not entitled to be consulted on the mighty issues of the day. Government has urged it to produce food and cotton and other essentials, but it has never apparently given thought, or at least serious thought, to the reward that it should receive for its investment of money and manual energy.

When will the other two great members of what ought to be a governing triumvirate recognize the fact that agriculture is the most important of all; that nothing can be settled without the assent of agriculture; that nothing can be made permanent for the permanent good of humanity without the active cooperation of agriculture. To attempt to settle the grave questions now agitating us without the assistance of the farmer is like trying to put Hamlet on the stage with the hero left out.

It is not my desire to be hypercritical or cry wolf until I at least see the tracks of the animal in the snow. But I would like to ask, Why has agriculture been given such scant notice in connection with a conference fundamentally so important? Why were only three men as representatives of the greatest industry in the world invited to participate in these momentous deliberations? What is responsible for the fact that agriculture is not given a place commensurate with its importance and on a footing of equality with the other two members of the mighty triumvirate?

Is it because we have been comparatively quiescent? Is it because we have not gone into the highways and byways campaigning for them? Is it because there is a suspicion in certain responsible minds that we are not organized and consequently are incapable of exerting the influence which can be exercised only when we march as a solid phalanx?

It can not be that anybody is so blissfully innocent as to believe that the immense questions before this conference can be settled without the aid of the farmer. And can anybody honestly suppose that if an agreement between capital and labor is reached in which agriculture has no effective vote that agreement will be permitted to stand.

Don't, gentlemen, allow yourselves to be deluded into the false idea that agriculture can not kick; that it will be forever quiescent; that it will continue to be exploited and made the football of other great national interests. Uncle Reuben is waking up. He realizes that he has not had a square deal. He is by nature conservative. He hates Bolshevism. He despises all means that aim to the subversion of the American Constitution, and would fight to the last ditch to save the country from red infamy and I. W. W. diabolism.

But do you think that the man who would fight I. W. W.ism, who has a holy contempt for Bolshevism, would not also fight for his own rights? He is conservative, but that doesn't mean that he is ready to be walked over, to be trampled upon, to be made the cat's-paw of the scheming politician on the one hand and the victim of the profiteer on the other.

Mr. President, Mr. Barrett is not alone in his opinion of the dignity and importance of agriculture in our industrial structure. Another American, a very great American, to my mind the greatest American of our time, the late Col. Theodore Roosevelt, shortly before his much lamented death, gave utterance to these words in the last magazine article written by him:

The farmer, the workingman, and the business man are, of course, the three people upon whose welfare the welfare of all the rest of us and of the country depends. With the farmers what is especially needed is that we shall accept their own best leadership and best thought about telling us what to do. * * * What we need is to have men of this stamp set forth the farmers' viewpoint, and the rest of us must intelligently appreciate this viewpoint, and so far as possible embody in legislation what men of this stamp regard as the salient needs. * * * The farmer is emphatically the producer. He has not had a square deal. He has not been put in the position to which he is entitled.

So much, Mr. President, for the importance of agriculture and its right to adequate representation in an industrial conference that assumes to be the chief factor in industrial reconstruction following the Great War. I do not know how much we may hope from this conference. Certainly every man concerned for the welfare of the country hopes for far-reaching beneficial results from its activities, but I am convinced, Mr. President, that there is much that the Government may do, both in its executive and legislative branches, to encourage agricultural production in this country and to give reasonable hope of material rewards for such industrial activity.

First, the departments of the Federal Government should cease the propaganda which tends to bear down the prices of farm products, and should direct governmental energies to curbing the profiteering going on along the line between the producer and the consumer. I am not advocating a system which would guarantee abnormally high prices to the farmer indefinitely, but I say we are very much in need of a system which will stabilize prices of farm products. It is the violent fluctuations which do the greatest damage. Emphasis should also be placed on the generally disregarded fact that in the list of items making up high living costs food products really cut but slight figure. A far larger share of the worker's wage goes for rents, fuel, shoes, and clothing at profiteering prices.

Instead of trying to force down improperly the prices of farm products, the executive departments should seek by every means at their command to open wider markets to the farmer by lifting the embargo on wheat and wheat flour to Europe, by extending credits to European Governments, so that they may come back into the market for American meats, and by lowering ocean freight rates and thus making it easier for Americans to compete with other nations for such foreign trade. The present ocean freight rate to Europe on American meats is now $4.50, as compared with 60 cents before the war. These rates should be radically lowered, even if it be impossible, because of rising costs of ships and labor, to reach the prewar level.

Such activities by the executive departments should be supplemented by the Congress by the enactment of legislation that will free the live-stock producer from the control of the packer, and that will enable the farmer to have some part, through the formation of cooperative selling agencies, in making the prices of farm products. Price making in necessities of life, like meat, wheat, flour, and fuel, should never again be left to the gamblers of the exchanges or to corporation monopoly. The Wall Street stock-jobbing pirates have thrived in the last year as never before. Glib-tongued salesmen have unloaded billions of worthless stocks in the last year, all of which has contributed to the high cost of living. There should be a way to end it.

Mr. President, if in this glance at the great industrial problems that confront us I have emphasized the farmer's side of the case, it is because I feel that he has not been sufficiently considered heretofore, and because I am firmly of the opinion that agriculture lies at the base of all prosperity in this country. Unless the farmer can continue to thrive, we all must suffer. In the reconstruction problems before us it is important that we start right. We must act broadly and with decision. But what I wish to emphasize particularly is that it will not do to seek to pacify and satisfy capital and labor, employer and employee, and leave out of the accounting the great basic industry of farming.

I fear Washington, Mr. President, has seen only the consumer side of the cost-of-living problem. It has held farm production down close to a cost margin for three years while it has let every other form of production soar. Apparently it can not be made to see the farmer has any difficulties. For six months the farmers of the United States have appealed in vain for the reform of the grading and discount system established under Government rules, which swindles the average farmer out of 15 cents a bushel on his grain. Washington does not realize how many farmers are getting little or no profit or are even losing money on their low-yield wheat crops. It does not foresee that many farmers may decide they can not afford to raise any more wheat and may quit planting it, or may quit farming entirely and go to town, where, as one farmer, writing me under date of October 11, says, "I can make more getting these big wages than I can paying them."

Factories and corporations, Mr. President, are required to pay a return on the capital invested and their watered stock over and above the expenses of doing business or go into bankruptcy. Whereas if every farmer had to do as well or fail, the agricultural industry would have to be taken over by the Government to keep it alive, and the cost would make the big railroad deficits look like a handful of copper cents.

It is my deepest conviction, Mr. President, that what Washington and the country need most to realize is that the surest guarantee of an enduring national life is a permanent, prosperous, and progressive agriculture. Also that until farming is made as profitable as any other business requiring the same amount of capital, skill, ability, and hard work we shall not attain this condition nor truly solve our cost-of-living problem.

If I have dwelt at some length on the disadvantages under which agriculture is laboring, I would not have it thought I am in the least degree pessimistic. I am not. I have faith that we shall meet the problems with such clear vision and in such broad spirit of toleration that we shall be able to find the correct solutions. I am indeed an optimist in spite of the present lowering clouds.

Mr. President, we must all unite to win the right conditions in peace times, just as we united to win the war. Then this great national readjustment will be accomplished without hardship, and the Nation will not feel the strain, which otherwise will be heavy, possibly to the breaking point.

We need more of the spirit of fair play as between man and man. It is a poor time for strikes and for strife. The great and imperative need is production at maximum speed. Greater industry, harder work, more rigid economy in public and private expenditures, cutting out of all luxuries, and, above everything else, increased production, are to-day as solemn a duty upon all alike as they were during the crisis of the war. We can each do our part by refusing to get excited, by keeping as busy and as cheerful as possible, and plugging away.

I have faith in the common sense and steadfast patience of the American people, the common sense and the patience that was typified and deified in Lincoln. Nor do I believe that we shall any of us be willing to hazard or to waste or destroy or injure the land that those 50,000 gallant American boys who marched down the long, long trail never to return died in a foreign land to perpetuate and save.

It is a time when partisanship must be put aside and every man in Washington cooperate to the utmost of his ability. I hope to see the peace treaty ratified at the earliest possible moment, and then let this Congress take up the great problems that are pressing for solution. American initiative, American pluck, American inventive genius, a thoroughgoing American policy, and the real American spirit must be backed up as never before with true American statesmanship. I have entire confidence that the Congress of the United States will meet the issues in a way that befits America and her destiny.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. If no Senator desires to speak, I wish to make a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with Order of Business No. 183.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is where we stopped on Monday last?

Mr. SMOOT. That is where we stopped on last Monday.

Mr. NUGENT. To what does that order of business refer?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with Order of Business No. 183, the bill the Senate had under consideration on last Monday, and that the Senate proceed from there on.

Mr. NUGENT. I would prefer, if the Senator please, that that bill be postponed at this juncture, as I should like to make some personal investigation with respect to an amendment which I caused to be incorporated in the bill in the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that all the Senator will have to do will be to object to the consideration of the bill, and then we could go right on with the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But it will be necessary, first, to secure the consent that the Senator from Utah asks in order to begin at that point and proceed with the calendar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If that is the situation, I am going to object to the request for unanimous consent. I have not the slightest objection to going on with the calendar and commencing where we left off on Monday last with the bill which was then under discussion; but I am not going to give consent to go on with the calendar and then have that bill objected to.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course that bill will have to take its chances like any other bill on the calendar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; except, as the Senator understands, that a Senator has already indicated that he will object to that particular bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the bill that was under consideration when we last considered the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator can not expect the Senate to proceed with the calendar with the understanding that some particular bill will not have the rule enforced against it the same as in the case of any other bill on the calendar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course; it is exactly the same, except that it was under consideration when we last considered the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not going to object to the bill, I will say to the Senator; I have no objection to its present consideration; but it seems to me that the Senator is adopting a narrow view if he will not let the calendar be considered because some particular bill is going to be objected to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] will withdraw his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was not any necessity for the Senator from Utah making the request. This is the plain rule of the Senate:

RULE VIII.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the calendar of bills and resolutions and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to say, however, that if the Senator from Utah had not made the request I should have moved to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 215; but I give way to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana would have a right to make that motion.

Mr. SMOOT. The idea I had was to take up and consider only bills to which there is no objection, but I did not put that in the original request; and if the calendar is coming up in regular order, let it come up at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no unfinished business. Order of Business No. 183, Senate bill 2890, is before the Senate.

CROW INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2890) to provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, when we concluded the consideration of the calendar on Monday last, Senate bill 2890 being under consideration, the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] was pending. I hope that the amendment will be defeated. The bill as presented was asked for by the tribe, and they were consulted about the matter to which the amendment refers. That being true, they surely should be considered about water-power sites on their land. That is all I desire to say on the subject at this time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have said all I care to say, and will ask for a vote. I shall vote for the amendment, but shall not take the time of the Senate any further on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISPOSITION OF SURPLUS MOTOR-PROPELLED VEHICLES.

The bill (S. 3037) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer free of charge certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments on page 2, line 21, before the word "hereby," to insert "also"; and on page 4, after line 15, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. That any State highway department to which is assigned motor-propelled vehicles and other equipment and supplies, transferred herein to the Department of Agriculture, may, in its discretion, arrange for the use of such vehicles and equipment, for the purpose of constructing or maintaining public highways, with any State agency or municipal corporation at a fair rental, which shall not be less than the cost of maintenance and repair of said vehicles and equipment. The title to said vehicles and equipment shall be and remain vested in the State for use in the improvement of the public highways, and no such vehicles and equipment in serviceable condition shall be sold or the title to same transferred to any individual, company, or corporation.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to transfer, free of charge, such motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment, including spare parts, pertaining to the Military Establishment, as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and no longer required for military purposes, to (a) the Department of Agriculture, for use in the improvement of highways and roads under the provisions of section 7 of the act approved February 28, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920, and for other purposes": Provided, however, That no more motor-propelled vehicles, motor equipment, and other war material, equipment, and supplies, the transfer of which is authorized in this act, shall be transferred to the Department of Agriculture for the purposes named in section 7 of said act than said Department of Agriculture shall certify can be efficiently used for such purposes within a reasonable time after such transfer, (b) the Post Office Department for use in the transmission of mails, (c) the Navy Department upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy and with the approval of the Secretary of War, and (d) the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service under the provisions of section 3 of the act approved March 3, 1919, entitled, "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is also hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to transfer, free of charge, to the Department of Agriculture, under the provisions of section 7 of the act approved February 28, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920, and for other purposes," for use in the improvement of highways and roads, as therein provided, the following war material, equipment, and supplies pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and not required for military purposes, to wit: Road rollers, graders, and oilers; sprinkling wagons; concrete mixers; derricks; pile-driver outfits complete; air and steam drill outfits; centrifugal and diaphragm pumps with power; rock crushers; clamshell and orange-peel buckets; road scarifiers; caterpillar and drag-line excavators; plows; cranes; trailers; rubber and steam hose; asphalt plants; steam shovels; dump wagons; hoisting engines; air-compressor outfits with power; boilers; drag, Fresno, and wheel scrapers; stump pullers; wheelbarrows; screening plants; wagon loaders; blasting machines; hoisting cable; air hose; corrugated-metal culverts; explosives and exploders; engineers' transits, levels, tapes, and similar supplies and equipment; drafting machines; planimeters; fabricated-bridge materials; wagons and similar equipment and supplies such as are used directly for road-building purposes.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is also hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to transfer, free of charge, to the Department of Agriculture, for the use of the Forest Service, any telephone supplies pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and no longer required for military purposes.

SEC. 4. That freight charges incurred in the transfer of the property provided for in this act shall not be defrayed by the War Department, and if the War Department shall load any of said property for shipment the expense of said loading shall be reimbursed the War Department by the department to which the property is transferred by an adjustment of the appropriations of the two departments: Provided, however, That any State receiving any of said property for use in the improvement of public highways shall, as to the property it receives, reimburse the Department of Agriculture for all amounts paid by that department to the War Department in reimbursement of loading charges upon said property.

SEC. 5. That any State highway department to which is assigned motor-propelled vehicles and other equipment and supplies, transferred herein to the Department of Agriculture, may, in his discretion, arrange for the use of such vehicles and equipment, for the purpose of constructing or maintaining public highways, with any State agency or municipal corporation at a fair rental, which shall not be less than the cost of maintenance and repair of said vehicles and equipment. The title to said vehicles and equipment shall be and remain vested in the State for use in the improvement of the public highways, and no such vehicles and equipment in serviceable condition shall be sold or the title to same transferred to any individual, company, or corporation.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of the act of July 16, 1914 (38 Stat., p. 454), prohibiting the expenditure of appropriations by any of the executive departments or other Government establishments for the maintenance, repair, or operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, in the absence of specific statutory authority shall not apply to vehicles transferred or hereafter to be transferred by the Secretary of War to the Department of Agriculture for the use of the department under the provisions of this act or under the provisions of section 7 of the act of February 28, 1919, referred to in section 1 hereof: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be held or construed to modify, amend, or repeal the provisions of the last proviso under the item entitled "Contingencies of the Army," as contained in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Chair what disposition was made of Order of Business 184, Senate bill 3037.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was passed.

Mr. KING. I regret that I was not in the Chamber when that matter came up for consideration.

SALE OF SURPLUS MACHINE TOOLS.

The bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to sell at 20 per cent of their cost, to trade and technical schools and universities and other recognized educational institutions, such machine tools as are suitable for their use which are now owned by the United States of America and are under the control of the War Department, and are not needed for Government purposes. The money realized from the sale may be used by the Secretary of War to defray expenses incident to distribution of the tools, and the balance shall be turned in to the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

GRANT OF CITIZENSHIP TO CERTAIN INDIANS.

The bill (H. R. 5007) granting citizenship to certain Indians was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that every American Indian who served in the Military or Naval Establishments of the United States during the war against the Imperial German Government, and who has received or who shall hereafter receive an honorable discharge, if not now a citizen and if he so desires, shall, on proof of such discharge and after proper identification before a court of competent jurisdiction, and without other examination except as prescribed by said court, be granted full citizenship with all the privileges pertaining thereto, without in any manner impairing or otherwise affecting the property rights, indvidual or tribal, of any such Indian or his interest in tribal or other Indian property.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUITS IN ADMIRALTY AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. 3076) authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce what change, if any, this bill makes in existing law. It seems to me that this measure ought to have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee is now considering a bill extending the jurisdiction of the district courts to hear causes of action against the Government of the United States, and it seems to me that this is legislation of the same character as that which is being considered by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the purpose of the measure is this: Under the language of the shipping act the Supreme Court has held, in a recent case, that the ships of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, for example, are subject to the application of the same remedies for damages that private ships are, and therefore if one of these Emergency Fleet Corporation ships, a ship of the United States, causes damage and is libeled, the ship is attached and held until bond is given. It seems that the officers of the ships have no authority to give bonds, and so the Government's ships are put to a great deal of delay and the Government is put to a great deal of inconvenience and loss. The purpose of this bill is to avoid that by simply providing that persons having claims growing out of the action of these ships, instead of having a suit in rem against the ship, as they have against private ships, shall have a suit in personam against the United States, which everybody, of course, recognizes is perfectly good. That allows the ship, then, to go on about its business. That is really the purpose of this bill, and while the bill is rather long and has to be in order to meet various situations, yet that is the principal purpose of it. It gives the consent of the Government to a suit in personam against it.

Mr. KING. Is there any limitation upon the amount for which suit may be brought?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, would the Senator object to the bill going over for a day, so that we can compare it with the bill that we are working on in the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad attention has been called to the matter. Of course, the bill is rather long, and I did not know whether or not there might be objection to its being considered now. I shall be glad to have it go over, as requested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not like to object, but if the Senator does not object to that course being taken I should be glad to have it go over, so that we can compare it with the bill now pending before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall be glad to have it passed over, and am glad to have the opportunity to explain the real purpose of the bill, and shall be glad to have Senators look into it, because I recognize the force of the suggestion of the Senator from Utah as to whether this subject might properly be considered by the Judiciary Committee. It does partake very largely of judicial questions, and yet it also affects the matter of commerce, and that probably was the reason why it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KING. I think I can say that the Judiciary Committee will not feel slighted because this bill was not referred to it; but there is a feeling upon the part of a number of the members of the committee that these claims against the Government, so far as possible, ought to be handled by the Court of Claims, whereas other members of the committee feel that the district courts of the United States ought to be the forum in which actions may be brought by individuals against the Government.

It is a very serious question whether or not there ought to be so much latitude in bringing suits against the sovereign. For myself, I think we are letting down the bars too much and that the Government of the United States will have suits brought against it in various parts of the United States under conditions and circumstances where the evidence will not be available and the Government in the end will be subjected to a great deal of annoyance and a great many suits which are perhaps without merit.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator that the Committee on Commerce had hearings with reference to the measure and heard officials of the War Department and the Department of Justice; and, in fact, this bill was prepared in the department.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that the Senator from Washington agrees that the bill may go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; but I do hope Senators will look into it very carefully, because we are confronted with a very serious situation. I want to say that the Attorney General's office called me up day before yesterday, I think, and stated that there was a ship down in New Orleans that had been libeled and the court there refused to allow it to go. They have no way in which they can furnish bond unless they go out and arrange it in a roundabout way, as an accommodation for the Government on the part of somebody to furnish a bond so that this ship may go into commerce. That condition of things ought not to exist, of course, and we are trying to avoid it in the future.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, speaking for myself at least, I shall be very glad to have the Senator ask unanimous consent to take up the matter to-morrow, and I think in the meantime the members of the Judiciary Committee will examine it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope they will, so that when we have an opportunity again we can take up the measure, because it is very important and urgent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

NORMAN LEE MOLZAHN.

The bill (H. R. 333) providing for the disinterment and removal of the remains of the infant child, Norman Lee Molzahn, from the temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to a permanent burial place was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 6863) to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia, and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Order of Business 76, Senate bill 1369, which is identical with the bill just objected to, be indefinitely postponed, so that later on we may take up the House bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York to postpone indefinitely Senate bill 1369.

The motion to postpone indefinitely was agreed to.

SUSIE CURRIER.

The bill (H. R. 753) for the relief of Susie Currier was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Susie Currier, of Old Town, Me., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100, being full compensation for accident and injuries with resulting loss of time and expense while working as charwoman in the United States post office at Old Town, Me., December 14, 1914.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES A. CAREY.

The bill (H. R. 2452) for the relief of Charles A. Carey was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles A. Carey, of Lowell, Mass., the sum of $132.57, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for loss of pay on account of injury sustained while in the performance of his duty as a letter carrier at Lowell, Mass., on the 11th day of February, in the year 1913.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ETHEL PROCTOR.

The bill (S. 2773) for the relief of Ethel Proctor was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that bill was introduced by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], and I wanted to ask the Senator, before objecting to the bill, if the death of Mr. Proctor was due to the performance of his regular duties as an employee of the Government on the Panama Canal? If so, this would be in the shape of a pension for a private citizen employed by the Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield, I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2207) admitting civilian employees of the United States Government stricken with tuberculosis to Army and Navy hospitals was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2785) to provide aid from the United States for the several States in prevention and control of drug addiction and the care of drug addicts, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) for the investigation of influenza and allied diseases in order to determine their cause and methods of prevention was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

DELLA JAMES.

The bill (H. R. 3844) for the relief of Della James was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, just one word before the bill is read. I have just had a letter from Augusta, and this woman will be obliged to put four of her children in the poorhouse unless this bill is passed within the next few days. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has charge of it.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, as the member of the committee who reported this bill, I would like to make a brief statement about it. The claim is by the widow of this man Jones, who was killed in his own dooryard by a stray shot from a United States testing ground. He was working in his garden, when a shot fired on the testing ground at Fort Hancock killed him. He left a widow and eight children.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Nine children; the youngest 4 months old, the oldest 16 years.

Mr. NEW. The bill proposed to give the widow $60 a month for 10 years. The committee amended it to make it read $57.50, to accord with the war risk, and to place this man on an equality with a soldier; but I think the committee overlooked the fact that he could not have been taken as a soldier at all. A man with nine children dependent on him for support certainly could not have been taken, under any theory of law, as a soldier. I think the beneficiary should have had $60. The bill provides $57.50, and she will have to send her children to the poor farm unless she gets this relief.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does not the Senator really think that the Senate would sustain the bill just as it came from the House, and let it go through carrying $60 a month?

Mr. NEW. I think it should do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it is the general view that the reduction should not be made, and that the Senator from Indiana is exactly right. This was a tenant farmer, who worked on a piece of ground quite a distance from the camp. The officers found that the officer handling the gun was negligent. A court-martial was recommended of the officer who improvidently fired the gun that killed this man. The widow and children are to be allowed the money for only 10 years. There are nine children, ranging from 4 months old to 16 years old; and, as I stated, I have received a letter to-day stating that unless she can receive this pension at once she will have to put some of her children in the poorhouse; that she can not struggle on any longer without this help.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is a very pitiable case, but I have never known the Senate to pass a bill of this kind. If the man had been working for the Government of the United States we would have given the widow a year's salary. That is the amount given in such a case.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me. When a person working for the Government of the United States is injured or killed by the negligence of the United States, we give his estate vastly more, and have always done so.

Mr. SMOOT. The rule is that the family are paid a year's salary.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NEW. The man was not working for the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of that.

Mr. NEW. He was working at the time in his own garden, on his own little place, and was not in the employ of the Government. He was simply killed by a stray shot fired from the testing ground.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not denied that fact at all. The only question in my mind is whether we should pay in the case of a person killed by the Government of the United States, not in the employ of the Government, two or three times the amount that we would pay in the case of a man who was working for the Government and happened to be killed. The bill sets the precedent that a man who is not working for the Government and is killed by an accident, on account of the negligence of an employee of the Government, shall receive at least three times the amount that would be given if he had been employed by the Government. This means the payment of $6,900. I can not call to mind any amount like that being paid in the case of an accidental death caused by the Government. I recognize all that the Senator from Georgia has said in relation to the widow's condition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only mentioned that as a reason for speed. I consider the United States Government absolutely liable, and I do not think there is any possible basis upon which it can decline to pay the sum named.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not stating that the Government of the United States should not give the widow some amount.

Mr. KING. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Georgia whether he thinks that the Government ought to be responsible for the torts of its officers or agents?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that municipalities are not, that counties are not, and that States are not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Counties are——

Mr. KING. They may be in the Senator's State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And municipalities are, as a rule, but not for the act of a police officer in making an improvident arrest. That is the exception.

Mr. KING. I am not speaking of police officers or officers of that character, but for the torts of the officers of the State, the State would not be responsible. If some officer of the State guard at the penitentiary or a member of the militia should commit a tort upon some private person, as I understand the rule, the State would not be responsible any more than a municipality is responsible if some policeman exceeds his authority or makes some assault, willful or otherwise, upon some individual. The rule is that the municipality is not responsible for the tort of its officials.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is a certain character of tort, however, that grows out of the work of a policeman in making false arrests, but in cases of this character I have never known an instance in which the liability has not been recognized and compensated for.

Mr. KING. If my colleague will still permit me, suppose that among the thousands and millions of employees and soldiers of the United States there should be a large number of torts committed, assaults upon individuals, thefts of property, arson, and so on, does the Senator think the Government would be responsible?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think there is a distinction between that class of cases and this one. Here the officers, in the regular discharge of their duties, were training men in the use of artillery, and in the training for the use of artillery, in the actual line of their duty, the necessary work in preparation for the war, by carelessness they killed a private citizen. I think that occupies an entirely different position from the ordinary tort to which the Senator referred.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not say he was killed by bullets shot from a gun?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He was killed by the discharge of a gun.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill says, "Through the explosion of a certain shell used in target practice." I do not know how far he was away, or whether he was upon the ground on which the practice was taking place, but his death was caused by the explosion of a shell.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The shell was used in target practice, and exploded and a piece of it killed this man. He was quite a distance away. The Senator from Indiana can probably tell the distance. I think he was half a mile, at least, from the testing grounds.

Mr. NEW. Yes, Mr. President; the man was killed off the range, which had been laid out by the officers of the Government. He was where he had a perfect right to be. An account of the persons on the farm, as also of the persons on other farms, had been taken when the range was laid out. A board of officers, a court of inquiry, was convened, which went into the case, and their official verdict as set forth in the report which accompanies the bill shows that the officers in charge were wholly responsible for the death of this man. It was due to their negligence, and a court-martial was recommended by Gen. Greble and the other officers who sat as members of the court.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice the charge against the officer was based upon "criminal negligence and not taking proper precautions to safeguard life." I have not any question but that the man was killed, and I have not any question of the negligence on the part of the soldiers of the United States. The only question in my mind is whether this is a proper amount to pay, based upon the claims that we pay for men who in the service of the Government suffer from such unfortunate accidents.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, in reply to what the Senator from Utah says, I will state that if the man had been in the Army, in the uniform of the United States, he would have gotten, under the law, just what the bill gives him.

Mr. SMOOT. He would provided he had carried $10,000 of insurance, and paid every month so much for that insurance. Then his family would have received $57.50.

Mr. NEW. That is true.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] says that such an act committed by an officer of a municipality would not render the municipality liable. I think the Senator from Utah is mistaken in regard to that. He compares this to the case of a tort committed by an individual. This is a tort, but a tort committed by an official in the line of his duty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is not very much distinction, if the Senator will just permit me a moment, between the liability of a municipality and the liability of a private individual or a private corporation. I remember cases where the question of the liability of a railroad for a personal assault committed by a conductor on a passenger was in issue, and it was held that the railroad company was not liable, because it was not in the line of the conductor's duty; that they did not employ him to commit assaults on passengers, and he did not have any right to do that at all. But where an official injures some one by the negligent performance of a duty which he was employed to perform, any municipality is liable, and that is the case that is stated here. Of course, the question of the right to recover enters into a case against the Government of the United States, but that is a matter entirely under the control of the Government itself.

Mr. KING. Of course, I do not like to question the learning and legal knowledge of the Senator, but I feel sure that an examination of the authorities will support the position which I announced, namely, that municipalities are not liable for the torts of their officers; that a marshal or a policeman may make arrests in virtue of a warrant or otherwise, and if he commits a tort there the municipality is not liable. There are many cases of that character, cases where municipal authorities have negligently permitted a building to be torn down and some unfortunate man was killed and the municipality was held to be free from liability.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is undoubtedly right in regard to a certain class of cases. The only question is whether or not the case described here is within that class or an entirely different set of cases. If a municipal employee, engaged in building a street, sets off a blast and kills people who live in the vicinity of the place where the blast is set off, the city is liable for negligence. There is no question about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is now 2 o'clock. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator withhold the motion while I ask his colleague a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. SPENCER. I should like to ask the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], if I may have his attention for a moment, whether he does not agree with me that when a municipality acts in a governmental sense the municipality is not then liable, but when the municipality acts in an administrative sense, then the municipality is liable for whatever damage it does.

Mr. KING. I think that is the distinction which the authorities make.

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly the shooting of a gun is not a governmental function. It is an administrative action.

Mr. KING. That is a matter upon which there might be a diversity of opinion.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the question be put on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair.) The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session. The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gay	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Ball	Gronna	McNary	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hale	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Harding	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Harris	Newberry	Spencer
Calder	Harrison	Norris	Sterling
Capper	Hitchcock	Nugent	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, Calif.	Overman	Swanson

Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are absent on official business.

Mr. KING. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent on account of illness in his family. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained from the Senate on public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the British Empire is one of the great institutions of the world. In its structure it is unique among all governmental institutions of the present time or which have ever existed. It is the product of time, of experience, and of the statesmanship of a long line of some of the most illustrious leaders in all history. It is composed of widely separated peoples, and, locally, of different forms of government, but brought together in such manner as always to insure, in every great emergency, unity of action among all the different parts of the Empire. Men may speculate as to the separate interests of Canada from those of England, or of Australia from some other dominion of the British Empire, and speculate as to what, under certain emergencies and conditions, this or that dominion might do; but history warrants us in assuming, certainly for the purpose of action on this treaty, that in all vital affairs and in matters of great emergency the British Empire act as one when interests dictate action as a unit, and act separately when interest dictates otherwise. I do not say this in criticism of the British Empire. I am simply stating an historic fact concerning which there can be no successful dispute.

In other words, it is a league of itself, the most perfect, best-tested, and tried league which has yet been in any way inaugurated among men for the purpose of governing affairs, and in all great concerns, in all matters of great moment they always act together, as the momentous period of 1914–15 so conclusively disclosed. Therefore, while composed of different dominions and having their local different interests, in matters in which we would be concerned we might expect them to act in unity.

The covenant of the league of nations, as it is now presented to the Senate, provides for six votes upon the part of the British Empire in the assembly to one vote upon the part of the United States. We claim, through our desire of having this remedied, that this gives to the British Empire a distinct advantage for which there is no reason and no just necessity, an advantage consisting not alone of the mere number of votes cast, but an advantage of prestige and power in the direction and domination of the affairs of the league generally.

It is now conceded throughout the English dominion, so far as I have been able to trace the literature upon the subject, that it does give the British Empire a distinct advantage. The only place that I have heard that it was not an advantage to the British Empire has been in the United States, and principally in the Senate. No English journal dealing with the subject, no Canadian spokesman upon the subject, no Australian advocate of the proposition has ever contended that it does not give the British Empire an advantage. Some undertake to contend that although an advantage they are entitled to it. Others apologize for it and have gone so far as to say the British Empire should not seek to have this advantage and should waive it. But so far as my investigation goes, and I have made some effort to ascertain the views of those representing the British Empire in its different parts, no one contends that it is not a distinct advantage and, many have well said, otherwise it would not have been so earnestly sought. Indeed, the British statesmen and British diplomatists do not spend much time upon immaterial and inconsequential affairs, and they would not have sought so earnestly to secure this had they not deemed it an advantage, and they very frankly now confess that it is an advantage.

Perhaps the most ambitious argument which has been made in favor of the league upon this particular subject was the extended speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. Holding a high regard for his views, I think it may be just as well to organize my observations around the contention made by the Senator. He has stated the matter as fully as it has been stated by those who are in favor of maintaining the covenant as it now is. In his remarks some days ago in the Senate he said:

> I purpose to demonstrate not only the lack of necessity for such amendments to balance any supposed inequality in the voting strength of any power but also the great injustice, the gross wrong such proposed amendments would do to Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa.

As to the Senator's purpose to demonstrate that there is no necessity for the amendment in order "to balance any supposed inequality," I will deal with that as I proceed; but let me say here, in the beginning, that I know of no amendment which seeks to deprive Canada or Australia or New Zealand of representation in the assembly or of a vote. The amendment offered by the able Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] does not seek to modify their power or their influence as it is now in the league. We are not endeavoring to exclude our neighbor upon the north from participation in the assembly; neither are we endeavoring to exclude New Zealand or Australia; but we are seeking simply to equalize in so far as we may the power which the British Empire will have, by reason of exercising this right, by increasing the prestige and the power and the vote of our Republic. I do not think that the Senator is justified in opening his address with the statement that we are seeking by this amendment to do an injustice to our neighbor upon the north or to any one of the British dominions or colonies.

If I had my way about it, I should prefer, if either had to drop its vote, that England rather than Canada should drop her vote, for the simple reason that Canada is here upon the Western Continent; she breathes the western atmosphere and is not so calculated to be moved and controlled by the intrigues of Europe or by the European system.

Furthermore, the Senator from North Dakota said:

> Of all the many false declarations that have been made concerning the league of nations, none has been so persistently indulged in as the one concerning the voting power of Great Britain.

It is coming to be, Mr. President, rather a familiar method upon the part of those who are advocating impossible things in connection with the proposed league of nations to contend that the mere statement of a naked fact concerning the league is a misrepresentation, and the Senator from North Dakota indulges in that quite as often as anyone else, with, perhaps, the least justification of anybody for doing so, viewing his own statements concerning what is in the league covenant. No Senator has misstated a fact concerning this matter. The statement is made that the British Empire has six votes in the assembly to the one vote of the United States. What is there false about that? Where is the misrepresentation? Does anybody deny it? One may draw a different conclusion from another as to the effect of their having six votes to our one, but the fact upon which the argument is based is indisputable and can not be sincerely charged to be misrepresentation in any sense of the word.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The President of the United States, according to reports of his speech at Salt Lake City, stated that the British Empire did not have six votes in the league.

Mr. BORAH. My own remembrance is that the President stated that our vote of one was equal to their vote of six, by reason of the requirement of a unanimous vote, which I will come to in a few moments.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just to make clear what my statement is, I desire to say that the report was that, while the President said explicitly that the British Empire did not have six votes in the league, he afterwards in the same speech stated that she did have six votes in the league; but, of course, both statements could not be true. However, the President went on to qualify the first statement by saying that the six votes of Great Britain were of no more weight than our one vote.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; I understand that to have been the position of the President; while stating the proposition that they had six votes, that that fact was neutralized by the fact that the vote had to be unanimous. That proposition, however, I will deal with later.

The Senator from North Dakota also made the statement:

> And from the letters I have received and the press reports I have read, these unfounded assertions concerning this voting power have taken a deeper root in the mind of the public than any other criticism aimed at the league.

That is perhaps true. The statement that Great Britain or the British Empire has six votes in the assembly to our one has taken a deep hold upon the American mind. The very statement affronts their sense of equality, their sense of justice, and their conception of the dignity of our country. The Senator from North Dakota and others, being expert mathematicians, may argue that it has this effect or that it has not this effect; but the people understand that here is an assembly which may become the conclave of the world, in which matters of tremendous concern are to be taken up and considered, and they see that in that assembly an entity known as the British Empire has six votes to the one of the United States. Naturally it has taken a deep hold; and, undoubtedly, from the statement of the able Senator, he has heard from the people upon that question.

Generally speaking, Americans are a very intelligent people; but they are not all expert mathematicians like the Senator from North Dakota. They have not reached the point where they can demonstrate to a certainty that one is equal to six; they are unable to see, as the Senator from North Dakota so quickly sees, that while apparently upon its face there is an inequality, in view of the fact that one equals six votes in influence and voting power, it really amounts to nothing.

I have always had great respect for the able Senator from North Dakota as a legislator, but after reading his speech I concluded that I had not fully appreciated his varied attainments, and that he is also the greatest mathematician since Sir Isaac Newton.

Mr. President, the Senator organizes his speech around three propositions. If these propositions should chance to be false I think it would be conceded that his speech would fall to the ground. I do not mean false in the sense of a willful misstatement of facts, but false in the sense of a wholly erroneous construction of the covenant. His first proposition, stated over and over again, is that while the British Empire has six votes in the assembly, no member of the British Empire other than Great Britain, with one vote, can ever be a member of the council. Around that proposition the Senator assembles his entire argument. The assembly, he contends, is to a marked extent a powerless body, that the council is the dominating and controlling power, and as no dominion or colony can ever have a vote in the council, we need not become disturbed over the fact that they are more fully represented in the assembly.

In the first place, upon what theory can it be argued that the dominions can not have representation in the council? Is there any provision in the league covenant which inhibits it? Is there any clause or phrase in the covenant itself which says that Canada, if she can secure the votes, is not entitled to representation on the council, just as any other nation may become a member of the council if she can secure the votes? Is there any obstacle to Canada becoming a member of the council that does not exist with reference to every other signer of the treaty? Is there any obstacle to Australia becoming a member of the council if she can secure the votes, any more than in the case of Belgium? There is not a clause in the covenant which inhibits either becoming a member. They are signatories to the treaty; they are members of the league; they have a separate entity; they are recognized for the purpose of the league as a separate entity; and they have all the rights and privileges under the league that any other nation has. Standing as signers of the treaty and of the covenant the same as other powers, how can it be argued that they are not permitted to enjoy all the rights of the covenant the same as other powers? When we look for the inhibition we do not find it, and without it such contention must fail.

Mr. President, let us pursue this question of the right of the dominions or colonies to have membership in the council.

When Mr. Borden left Canada during the time that the war was in progress to attend for the first time, upon invitation, the council at Paris, which had to do with the directing of the war, he immediately took the position that the dominions and colonies of Great Britain should have their separate representation in that great council; and when the league of nations came to be formed, the fight which Mr. Borden made and the fight which he won was that the dominions and the colonies should have all the rights under the league that any other separate nation had—not only the right to sit in the assembly and to participate in the so-called debating society, but he was very careful to include the right to sit in the council, supposed to be the source of power of this league. Mr. Borden contends that he was successful in his contention, and I do not think there can be very much doubt about it, in view of his statement and the letter which was signed by M. Clemenceau, the President of the United States, and Lloyd-George.

I read a paragraph from a statement made by Mr. Borden a short time ago in regard to this matter:

> The new and definite status of the dominions at the peace conference is further manifested in the constitution of the league of nations. Since they had enjoyed the same status at the peace conference as that of minor powers, we took the ground that the dominions should be similarly accepted in the future international relationship contemplated by the league. The league of nations' commission, while inclined to accept this in principle, did not at the outset accept all its implications, as was apparent in the first draft of the covenant. This document, however, was professedly tentative. The dominions' case was pressed, and in the final form as amended and incorporated in the treaty of peace with Germany, the status of the dominions as to membership and representation in the assembly and council was fully recognized.

That was the contention of Mr. Borden—that they should not only accept the statement as a matter of principle, but they should accept it in all its implications, to wit: That Canada should enjoy the same rights under the league as Serbia, Belgium, or any other self-governing independent nation or power; and he is particular to include in that not only representation in the assembly but representation in the council. When the ex-President of the United States proposed a reservation which would exclude them from membership in the council, it immediately became a matter of criticism in Canada and was seriously objected to, and, so far as I know, has been dropped.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Could Canada or any other self-governing dominion or any other nation be elected a member of the council without the vote of the United States?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will come to that in just a few minutes, and will then deal with it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the Senator come to it right now, because it is a critical matter, and if it can not be his whole argument falls to the ground.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska will permit the Senator from Idaho to pursue his subject in his own feeble way. If, when I get through, I have left untouched any of these subjects, I shall be glad to take the rest of the afternoon, in company with my genial friend, to discuss them; but I have an idea of logic in the presentation here, and while I do not propose to omit anything, I prefer to follow the course I have outlined, in order that there may be some continuity of presentation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to ask the Senator if anyone has seriously contended that the British dominions or self-governing colonies would not be eligible to membership in the council, provided, of course, they could get the votes?

Mr. BORAH. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator will read the address of the able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], he will observe that he stated twice over that they could not become members of the council. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the President have taken a similar view.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have read parts of that address of the Senator from North Dakota, but I had not observed that portion of it.

Mr. BORAH. I think I shall have occasion to enlighten the Senator from the statement of the Senator from North Dakota himself in a few minutes.

> The recognition and status accorded to the British dominions at the peace conference were not won without constant effort and firm insistence. In all these efforts the dominions had the strong and unwavering support of the British prime minister and his colleagues.

A great deal has been said, Mr. President, to the effect that Great Britain did not want these votes, that they were tendered as a matter of graciousness for the service which the dominions had rendered during the war. The fact is that a long, persistent contest was waged inside of that secret chamber, where the intelligence of the world has not been permitted to penetrate, for the purpose of securing this right, and it was led by the prime minister of England, supported by the great men from every part of the globe representing the British Empire. It is a fine illustration of what will happen time and time again in the assembly, and possibly in the council—that Mother England, with her great leaders, will be surrounded and aided and abetted by her able men from all parts of the world in accomplishing her purposes, and will accomplish them through influence and persuasion and power as they accomplished them at Versailles.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I simply wanted to ask the Senator if, in reading that debate, he had noted the remark of Sir Robert Borden, that every one of the great powers had opposed the admission of the dominions during those secret deliberations, but, nevertheless, they were overcome?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I thank the Senator. I will come to that.

> The same indomitable spirit which made her capable of that effort and sacrifice made her equally incapable of accepting at the peace conference, in the league of nations or elsewhere, a status inferior to that accorded to nations less advanced in their development, less amply endowed in wealth, resources, and population, no more complete in their sovereignty, and far less conspicuous in their sacrifice.

In other words, Mr. President, Mr. Borden understands clearly and definitely that both as to the council and as to the assembly, while the British Empire is linked together by common interests and common aspirations, when it comes to the question of votes they have as separate an entity as the other nations which have signed this treaty; and that is the position that the British Empire occupies—that while they are one for their common interest, they occupy a voting capacity based upon the principle of separate and distinct nations.

What do the three gentlemen who presided over the destinies of the world at Versailles say in regard to that?

Mr. Borden, I take it, is a very far-seeing, capable leader, and he was not willing to leave this question of the position or status of the dominions and colonies to future guessing, and therefore he required of those who made the instrument a construction of it, and required that that construction be deposited cotemporaneously with the instrument itself.

They say:

> The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council. We have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view. If there were any doubt, it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles are not subject to a narrow or technical construction.

That is the only possible construction which could inhibit them, and even that could not, from being members of the council—a most narrow, strained, and technical construction. But this letter, in the first place, states that there is no doubt that Mr. Borden's view is correct; and, secondly, if there were any doubt about it, it would be supported by the proposition that this league is to be construed in a broad and a most generous way.

A few days ago the able Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], an enthusiastic supporter of the league, introduced into the RECORD an article by Mr. Alfred H. Bright, stated by the Senator to be a distinguished lawyer of Minneapolis. I assume that that is correct, not only from the statement of the Senator, but from the fact that in looking up the record I see that Mr. Bright is general attorney for the Soo Railway, located at Minneapolis. Therefore I quote his statement with some degree of satisfaction upon this particular question. He not only is an able lawyer, but he would be likely to know the Canadian view, in view of his position.

> Mr. Wilson was right when he said the dominions were eligible because four of them could be chosen to take the place of Belgium, Brazil, Greece, and Spain, and the fifth might be represented if the number of league members having the right to representation on the council were enlarged as provided in article 4 of the covenant. If, then, everything was done as provided by the covenant to the end that Great Britain and the dominions should all be represented on the council they would be.

In other words, so far as the terms of the covenant itself are concerned, they occupy no different position than any other nation and they are just as much entitled to a position upon the council as any other power.

The able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] asked, Could they secure a position upon the council without the unanimous consent of the members of the council?

Let me assume, to start with, that the implication of his question is absolutely correct—that it would require unanimous consent of the council. What I am contending for is that they occupy precisely the same position under the covenant that every other nation does. While they, we will assume, must have unanimous consent, so must Belgium, so must Brazil, so must any other nation. In other words, Great Britain has six members who have the same rights under the covenant as any other nation has, and if they can secure the votes they must secure them in the same way that Greece or Brazil would secure them. They must pass under the same surveillance as Brazil or Greece must pass—no different at all—and tell me why the United States should consent that under the terms of the league itself one entity or one great empire should have the right to have five times the vote in the council and six times the vote in the assembly that this Republic would have?

Mr. President, these facts are thoroughly supported by the plain terms of the league itself, and I want to ask this: Suppose a question arose as to the election of an additional member to the council. It is true, we will assume, that the United States by its single vote could veto the election of Canada as a member of the council. But we having agreed in advance to a covenant which gives Canada all the rights and privileges of any other nation, upon what theory could we stand there and reject her from being a member of the council? If we are to limit, we must limit in the covenant, for autocratically to say that "You shall not enjoy the right which the covenant insures" is to place upon us an arbitrary and unconscionable power which no nation would desire to use.

If Canada understands that she has just the same right to enter this council as any other nation, what will be the relationship between Canada and the United States if we say, "Yes; you have the same right as every other power and any other power, but we will not consent to it, because we have the unquestioned power to prevent it"? If Canada is notified in advance that she can not enjoy that power, and is notified by the terms of the league itself, the onus, the disagreeable onus, is not placed upon the United States of violating the implications of the league by the arbitrary power of her right to refuse her.

So, Mr. President, we do not propose to deny Canada admission to the council. We simply say that the voting power of this Republic shall at all times be equal to that of the British Empire. We are perfectly willing that the British Empire, in its peculiar structure, shall retain its integrity. We have no desire to interfere with the internal workings of that great institution. But, our Republic being vitally concerned, we have a right to say that, "You having organized your institutions as you have, we are entitled, in a world league, to sit with you with equal privileges and equal power in the running of the world's affairs." That is the sum and substance of this amendment, and nothing more.

The able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], in discussing this, says:

> But you say Canada might be added to the council. Mr. President, that is an impossibility under any reasonable construction of this compact.

The able Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], who asked the question a few moments ago, will observe the language of the Senator—

> That is an impossibility under any reasonable construction of this compact.

Not upon the theory that they can not get the votes, but upon the theory that the compact does not permit it. That is the position of the Senator from North Dakota. He says further:

> The power to admit new members to the council is contained in the second paragraph of article 4, which reads:
> "With the approval of the majority of the assembly, the council may name additional members of the league"—
> Keep that in mind—
> "whose representatives shall always be members of the council; the council with like approval may increase the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council."

The comment of the Senator is:

> I call special attention to the fact that the countries whose representatives shall be so selected by members of the council are to be "additional members of the league." As these self-governing dominions are, by the terms of the instrument itself, already made members of the league, they could not be included in the phrase "additional members of the league." Therefore, neither Canada nor any other British dominion could, by any possibility, be made members of the council.

And thus he reasoned to such masterly conclusion that from the compact itself they could not be made members of the league, because they are now members of the league, and they could not be additional members of the league, the only kind which could be added to the council. But while the Senator was denouncing those who were opposing this provision in the covenant for misrepresentation he left out of his review an entire paragraph which covered the subject he was dealing with and which permitted the addition of four or five members to the council.

I call the attention of the Senate to article 4, paragraph 1, which reads:

> The council shall consist of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, together with representatives of four other members of the league. These four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the representatives of the four members of the league first selected by the assembly—representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Spain, and Greece shall be members of the council.

Now, as the lawyer, Mr. Bright, says in his statement, they would have a perfect right, so far as the terms of the league are concerned, to elect four members of the British Empire to positions upon that council.

I do not say, Mr. President, that such election of four members would be a practical proposition in its full import, but they have a right under the league to do it. There is no inhibition against it. They may take the places of these four powers and fill them with members of the British Empire if they see fit to do so.

But they say it will take a unanimous vote to get Brazil and Greece and these other powers out of the council. I do not think that that is the construction which is to be placed upon it. Bear in mind, "These four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the representative of the four members of the league first selected by the assembly," these other powers shall sit in the council.

It says "until." When the assembly elects the other four members, the term of office of the four members of the council now there expires. They do not have to be ejected. They are elected, and remain until a reelection takes place, and the term of office expires the moment that the election takes place.

So, sirs, so far as the terms of the covenant itself are concerned, the assembly could elect four members of the council representing the dominions and Great Britain to sit with the British Empire with her one vote in the council.

You say that it is an impractical proposition. It may be as to the four, not an impossible proposition, not an inhibited proposition, and not any more of an absurd proposition than the concession that Great Britain should have six votes to this Republic having one.

But I do not concede the proposition that there must be a unanimous vote in the assembly to elect new members to the council. It is by no means clear that article 5 applies to such a proceeding. It will be observed that article 4, which provides for the election of the new members of the league, permits a majority vote with reference to the number of members of the league and election of additional members of the league whose representatives shall be members of the council, and permits a majority vote for the increase in the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council. Article 5 says that all "decisions" shall require the agreement of all members. But in view of the fact that it is article 4 which deals with this question of the election of members of the league and that the election may not necessarily mean a "decision," I am of the opinion that the ultimate construction which will be placed upon this covenant will permit a majority of the assembly to elect new members of the council. And it is also to be borne in mind that if that construction is to be placed upon it there is no one to review the construction. They construe their own powers, and there is no court of appeal, no review, one of the absurd and dangerous features of the league scheme.

The second proposition of the Senator was that in a dispute between Great Britain and any other nation the dominions would have to stand aside and would have no vote; in other words, that Great Britain would vote as a unit, that the British Empire would be represented as a diplomatic unit. In the first place, Mr. President, there is no provision in the league or the covenant expressing that view. There is no term or phrase which leads to that construction. What is there against that construction? There is against that construction the fact that each one of these dominions signs the league separately, is recognized as a separate and distinct entity, a nation with nationhood of its own, and therefore presumably entitled to act separately from any other power. That is exactly, mind you, the contention which Mr. Borden and Mr. Hughes and Gen. Smuts made from the beginning of this fight. They did not propose that England should represent the dominions even in the signing of the treaty. They did not propose that England should ever again have the right to draw them into war without their individual action, and they said so. They stated plainly that there were conditions which they would have a right to deal with separately and distinctly, and to that end they fought out the question of having their separate signatures, their separate relationship, and their separate nationhood as members of the league.

But you will bear in mind the correspondence which took place between Mr. Milner and Mr. Borden with reference to the signing of the treaty, Milner calling Borden's attention to the fact that they could put a clause in the treaty itself which would authorize the binding of the colonies and dominions by the act of the British Empire itself. Mr. Borden communicated to Mr. Milner that that would not be acceptable; not only that it would not be acceptable, but that if it was urged it would lead to trouble of a serious nature in the dominions. He said in this interview which I have quoted that the fight was for a separate and distinct nationhood, so far as the colonies or the dominions were concerned; that they had interests which they were not willing to have bound by the action of the British Empire itself, and that is the understanding now of the Canadian Government, of the Australian Government, and, I presume, of the other dominions, although I have not seen their expressions. So, Mr. President, we must conclude that the understanding upon the part of the dominions is that they would have a right to sit in a matter where they were not primarily concerned, although the British Government might be directly and primarily interested. I believe that is the fair and reasonable construction of this nebulous instrument. It is the construction which the dominions now insist upon and which they will insist upon. Who doubts it is the construction which will obtain?

The third proposition, Mr. President, is this, that the dominions are not permitted, says the Senator, to vote upon anything of importance; that they are, to use a popular expression, mere members of a debating assembly; that all they can do is to make up a report, or help make up a report; and that they exercise no real power.

I thought I could detect an inconsistency in the able Senator's argument, because with great effect he argued that these separate colonies had made such sacrifices in the war that it was nothing less than a wrong for us to deny them all the rights of other members of the league. But he finally concluded his argument by saying that the sacrifices which they made, the loss of their men, the fight which they made for the civilization of the world, will be satisfied by a position in an assembly without power, and where they can do nothing but debate.

Mr. President, that is not a correct position to take with reference to the assembly, even if they could not be a member of the council, which I do not concede. What is it that this assembly does, in the first place? The assembly is the source of all power under this league, so far as control of the membership, and thereby the directing of the league itself, is concerned. I need not say to a body of men who have had some experience in politics anything about the influence of a powerful delegation in the way of moral prestige and intellectual power in dealing with a question in an assembly or in a convention, even where they are limited in vote. If the British Empire were confined to but 1 vote and still had 18 members of that assembly, think of the tremendous, controlling, dominating influence of 18 powerful men, bound together by common interest, sitting in an assembly against a nation which has 1 vote and 3 delegates.

But this report is something more than the report which the Senator seems to have in mind. What is the object of this report which comes from the council and finally from the assembly? If a controversy arises between two nations which they are not willing to arbitrate, it may be sent to the council. If the council desires, it may send it to the assembly. If any dissatisfied member desires, it may send it to the assembly. So any question which arises under articles 12 and 13 may, under paragraph 9 of article 15, finally lodge in the assembly.

The assembly is the great supreme court, as it were, of all the controversies which may arise under the league of nations. True, as the Senator says, it does not definitely decide as a court or board of arbitration, but it does that upon which the President of the United States bases his belief that we can prevent war. It does the same thing that the council does; it has all the power that the council has. It makes its report, and upon that report it is expected to control the public opinion of the world. Upon that report it is expected that you will prevent war. Upon that report it is expected that you will put some nation at a disadvantage in the public opinion of the world.

Could there be anything more vital, more controlling, or more important than the power to make up this report which, if it is to have the effect the league organizers think, is to control the peace of the world? It makes its findings of fact, they are published to the world, and by them the world is supposed to be controlled. Does anybody deny that in making up that report, in which the interests of the United States and her honor might be involved, the British Empire has 18 delegates and 6 votes? Does anybody deny that in making up that report, which is a matter of procedure, they may act by a majority and not by unanimous consent?

Every particle of power for controlling the public opinion of the world centers finally in the assembly, and in making it up and shaping it the United States stands there with one vote and three delegates. Against her may be arrayed the British Empire with 6 votes and 18 delegates.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? I do not wish to interrupt him if it will disconcert him at all.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. As I understand the proposition, if there is a unanimous report by the council it absolutely binds the nations. If there is a unanimous report by the members of the council sitting on the assembly, plus a majority of the noncouncil members of the assembly, the effect is exactly the same as a unanimous report by the council; it is binding. In both those instances the party to the dispute does not sit. If we have a dispute with Great Britain, we do not sit on the council if it is there decided, neither do we sit in the assembly if it is there decided. So the effect of a unanimous decision of the council barring the members parties to the dispute, or a decision by the assembly barring the members parties to the dispute, is absolutely binding. Any nation which does not comply comes within the provisions of article 16, which I read:

> Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.
> It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.
> The members of the league agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article, in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the members of the league which are cooperating to protect the covenants of the league.

So if they get a unanimous decision by the council minus the parties, or if they get a decision of the assembly, which is made up of the unanimous vote of the members of the council, minus the parties, and a majority of the noncouncil members of the assembly, and we disregard it, the whole league goes to war with us.

Now, sitting in that assembly, with the full right of a vote, are all the British colonies and dependencies that are named, even though the British Empire and the United States have a dispute.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Missouri is presenting another angle of the proposition.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator for the interjection, but I was presenting the phase of it where the action was had without unanimous vote.

I call attention now to paragraph 2 of article 5:

> All matters of procedure at meetings of the assembly or of the council, including the appointment of committees to investigate particular matters, shall be regulated by the assembly or by the council, and may be decided by a majority of the members of the league represented at the meeting.

All matters of procedure, the appointing of committees, and that power which brings before the league, by reason of the report of the committees, are decided by a majority and not by unanimous vote.

Mr. President, to show how this thing, in its windings and meanderings, gathers up power as it goes along, and to illustrate the far-reaching insight of English diplomacy—of which I do not complain; I admire it—let us look at the labor organization.

Every member of the league is a member of the labor organization. This gives the British Empire six members and the United States one member in the labor organization. There is no camouflage about that. The assembly has nothing to do with that. That is not a debating society. That is the labor organization, and our laboring men would be sitting there with one-sixth of the power of the British Empire, and the United States would have precisely the same power as India. I know now upon reflection that it will be flattering to Mr. Gompers, in his advocacy of the league of nations, that this great Republic, which has been building up the status and dominancy of the laboring people of the United States for the last hundred years, should immediately descend to the common level of having the same power in the assembly as India, where they work for about one-fortieth the amount that laborers of the United States get per day.

That is found in article 387. The general conference of the labor organization is composed of four delegates from each State. This would give Great Britain 24 delegates, the United States 4, and if we count Hedjaz and Persia, it would give Great Britain 32 and the United States 4 in the labor organization.

These delegates are distributed, two Government delegates, one labor delegate, and one employer delegate, so that Great Britain would have six labor delegates and the United States one, Great Britain six employer delegates and the United States one.

The governing body of it will be composed of 24 persons. Twelve of those persons represent the Government, 6 the employers, and 6 the workers; 8 of the 12 representing the Government are to be selected by members which represent the chief industrial nations. Then the other 4 are to be nominated by the Government delegates to the conference, excluding the delegates of the 8 members mentioned above. Assuming, therefore, that the United States should be one of the eight chief industrial nations and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland another, the delegates from New Zealand, Canada, Australia, India, and South Africa would remain on hand to help select the other four. In the selection of the four neither the United Kingdom nor the United States would have a vote, being one of the eight. The five members of the British Empire would have a vote in selecting the other four members. Then the six members who represent the employers and the six members who represent labor are to be selected by the delegates representing the employers and workers, respectively, from the different countries. So that in the selection of these two sets of delegates, employers and workers, the British Empire would have six times as many votes as the United States.

But, Mr. President, to consider this question from the viewpoint merely of the number of votes cast by a nation is to consider only a part of the subject, and by no means the most vital and commanding part. Let us consider it in its wider, deeper significance—that of moral prestige, of acknowledged leadership, of the conceded greater dignity which this provision accords to the one great commercial rival we now have in the business world, a rivalship, sir, which the British Empire has augmented with unusual activity and foresight every hour since the war closed. The skill and energy, the boldness and persistency with which she has been reaching out for trade and for commercial dominion, for raw material and for business advantage since the hour of the armistice has no parallel. This we had a right to expect and of this we have no right to complain. It is in perfect accord with her proud and puissant past; it is in harmony with her intense nationalism; it is the spirit which has made the history of England the most marvelous, in many respects, in the world. For myself, I do not complain of it; I frankly confess I admire it. There is only one thing in the world more contemptible than a nation without national spirit, and that is an individual without national pride. But as Americans let us not ignore these facts, and as prudent and patriotic men let us in all reasonable and honorable ways hold to every fair advantage in the great rivalry which is inevitably to continue. Let us therefore consider this particular question in the light of this unmistakable situation. For these six or eight votes which the British Empire is to have is a definite and preconceived part of her scheme for world dominion. Dominancy of the seas, article 10, and a vote for every colony or dominion which she has or may carve out of her vast holdings washed by the seven seas—this is the most sublime and masterly scheme for the leadership of the world ever contrived by the wit or ambition of man.

What, then, is the situation, viewed in its larger aspect? We are forming a league of nations. Within this league of nations is another league—old and tested and tried—the league of the British Empire. It touches every clime; it encompasses all races, colors, religions, and creeds; it has its coaling stations and armed forts in every part of the world; its guns are trained across every strategical pathway of the sea. There is no article of commerce essential to the wants of man, no luxury which his fancy covets, but the union jack commands. There she is, a world-wide, a world-dominant power, in comparison with which Rome at the height of her glory pales into insignificance.

And under article 10 we guarantee that this condition shall be eternal. We first concede the dominancy of the sea and then we pledge that our children and our children's children shall stand guard over her far-flung possessions. Not one foot of her territory shall be taken from her without her consent or without our surrender.

Now, under these conditions a conclave of the nations is called under the league. Some world policy of vast concern is to be considered, hammered into form, announced, and forever afterwards adhered to. Sitting within the league of nations is the league of the British Empire. All nations, great and small, are affected by her power, her influence, for there is no nation, great or small, but must be beholden to her for commercial favors, and all, therefore, naturally pay homage. But in addition to this, sitting about her leaders from mother England, cooperating and advising, scheming, managing, are her representatives from every part of the world, her able men from every quarter of the globe. Such men as Smuts, soldier and statesman from South Africa; the able and indomitable Hughes, from Australia; the vigilant and gifted Borden, from Canada; and men of equal power and acumen from New Zealand and India. Consider their influence upon that gathering—their power, their sheer intellectual and moral force to dominate every policy and shape every move. Then add to that the commercial and business alliances that may be tightened, or for favors granted, extended. Here you have a league within a league complete, dominant, and unchallengable.

Let us consider, now, the position of our own country. In that conclave under the league she would have but one set of delegates—one vote in the council, one vote in the assembly. We yielded on the freedom of the seas at England's command. We yielded on the secret treaties and permitted them all, vicious and unconscionable as they were, to be interwoven into the treaty and underwritten by the league. We yielded on the protectorate of Egypt and surrendered in the matter of Ireland. Then, in the council and the assembly, the amphictyonic council of the world, we take a subordinate, a secondary position—yield our equality of prestige, equality of moral and intellectual power, equality of dignity and honor. We lower the Stars and Stripes even in matters of place and dignity to the union jack. When did obsequiousness become a characteristic of the American people? I would demand equality for my country in place and numbers in any assembly, whatever the function of the assembly. Much more would I demand it in an arena where the subtle forces are to be set in motion which may not only settle world policies but which may determine the life and death of nations. If this league of nations is a thing of reality, then it is a betrayal of our country to enter it upon any secondary basis whatsoever. Do you contend with me that unanimous voting is sufficient? Think of the shame of Shantung—the dishonor, the burning dishonor of Shantung. Think of that "damned spot" which all the perfumes of rhetoric can not guild or conceal. Did it come about of mere count of votes? Had that been so I venture to say that it would have been killed. It was agreed to before a vote was permitted to be taken. The immoral deal was made before the vote was recorded, and therefore it was a unanimous vote. The combined strategy, the intellectual domination of many men conspired and combined against one, broke him down, and he yielded; yielded, I have no doubt, in bitterness and humiliation, and grievously, in my judgment, has he suffered for it. But he yielded. It was unanimous. Why send into this world congress, where all the passions and ambitions of men are to be centered, one man as representative of this Republic to combat against such odds? Will not the European system at best be arrayed against the American? Why place, therefore, the representative of this Republic in those great conflicts at such disadvantage or at any disadvantage at all? Let us demand and stand firm until the demand is acceded to not only equality of votes but equality of prestige, dignity, and honor.

What fatuous dreamers we are. While we talk of a new day, yield up our most vital interests in the cause of a new era in which passion and greed are to give way to benevolence and brotherly love, our partners are taking possession of the earth. Sir Auckland Geddes declared a few days ago, "Every nation is short something that Great Britain can supply. American rivalry is a bugbear. She is not well placed in the world for trade." Think of this hard-headed, clear-headed, far-sighted Englishman talking such sacrilege, even before the unseasoned messiahs of the new kingdom can draw their phylacteries about them and escape from the contagion. While we were denouncing Germany as a thing too vile to enter into business with, England within a fortnight after the armistice reestablished complete business connections and has been in full business blast with her ever since. Enmities have never been permitted to dull the edge of husbandry in that land of practical statesmen. While the wise men sat at Versailles discussing whereabouts in the heavens the star, token of a new dispensation, would likely appear, Great Britain stepped behind the curtain and closed a deal with Persia which gave her command of the highways of the Far East and placed under her control the last virgin fields of the world's oil supply. When the job was complete a report was made for the benefit of the English eye, stating, "We have stolen a serious march on our American competitors. All the known oils outside of the United States are now under British control. In 10 years America will be importing 500,000,000 barrels a year, for which she will be paying us a billion dollars a year."

In the imperial preferential tariff bill placed before Parliament in the month of August under the name of a preferential tariff, there is to be thrown around all the possessions of the British Empire what is in effect a protective tariff. Of course, this is well within their right if not exactly in accord with their late teachings. But it was interesting to observe that in this bill the territories for which the British Empire receives a mandate from the league of nations are included as a part of the British possessions for the purposes of this preferential tariff, which, among other things, discloses how thin and gauzy is the covering of true ownership under these so-called mandates. But in these different ways Great Britain moves with alertness to build up, extend, and protect British interests. I repeat it is not a subject of criticism but it ought to serve as a warning that the day of rivalry, of business competition, between these countries is by no means at an end. I recall it that it may serve as an inducement to vigilance upon our part, and to assist us in fairly and honorably protecting our interests in all matters. Great Britain will do as she has always done, leave no effort unasserted to augment her political and material power.

Idealists, yes—humanitarians, yes; but that wonderful people in whose blood tingles the fever of world supremacy, whose national spirit finds itself incarnate in such men as Rhodes and Geddes will sit in the council, will fill that assembly which you are creating, and the men who decline to arm the representatives of this Republic with every possible weapon of legitimate warfare, consciously or unconsciously, are bartering away the happiness, the prosperity, the dignity, and honor of the American people. When our markets are crippled, our mills are slowing down, and our workmen out of employment; when our representatives of the league come back compromised, outgeneraled, as in the case of Shantung and Egypt, and outmaneuvered, as in the case of Persia, we shall realize that while generosity has its place in this world it, too, is a thing which needs intelligence and prudence if it is not to end in shameless disaster. "The wise shall inherit glory, but shame shall be the promotion of fools."

What right, what possible right, has Great Britain to demand this advantage, and what right have we as temporary representatives of the people of this country to grant it? We were first told that Great Britain did not demand it—that it was frankly and quickly conceded as a gracious favor because of the services rendered by the dominions. We certainly do not challenge the service rendered by the dominions, but they rendered it as a part of the British Empire. Did not New York and Massachusetts render service as a part of the Republic? But it is now made plain by Premier Borden that this was not quickly granted. There was much opposition to it, and we are told that the premier of England valiantly fought for it. Do you think it was fought for as a toy, as an empty favor or an inexpensive courtesy? It was fought for because it was regarded as a matter of great worth to the Empire, as every reflecting man must know. It is a thing of advantage, otherwise it would not have been demanded. And why should the United States be placed at a disadvantage in this league? Did she not enter the war without bargain and end the war without gain? Did she claim any territory or reparation? Her dead are hostages to the liberty of the world. What is there in her record that she should be second to any sovereign on earth even, if you please, sir, in a debating society? By precept and example, by counsel, and by arms we have stood for liberty, for humanity. If this is a league for liberty, for humanity, why should not our place be among the first, why should not our voice be as mighty as that of any people, her place of vantage as great as that of any power?

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to make a request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is necessary for the Committee on Foreign Relations to meet and continue their work at 4 o'clock this afternoon. Therefore I shall be obliged to leave the floor at that time; and I wish now to ask that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the procedure suggested? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I desire to state briefly why I can not vote for the amendment of the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I do not claim that the British Empire should have six votes in the assembly or more than one representative in the council; I shall not defend the action of the President in granting the demands of the British Empire in this respect. I do not think the President stood for all he should have, nor did he demand all he should have for his country at Versailles. I do not disagree in the main from the eloquent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]; but I do not think the amendment accomplishes what he claims. It does not accomplish any of the things which he seeks to remedy. If he proposes to decrease the influence of Great Britain in the assembly of the nations of the world, he must either take from Great Britain her six votes, which he does not propose to do, or he must give every other nation in the world the same vote under all circumstances and all conditions, which he does not propose to do.

Mr. President, I do not propose to minimize the great services performed by Great Britain during this war. I realize that the British Empire, as a whole, at the most critical moment of the world's history, at the hour of the greatest danger to the self-governing peoples, stood like a wall of rock, as she stood 100 years ago against the ambitions of Napoleon. I do not minimize her splendid services in this regard to the world; but, Mr. President, Germany was thundering at her gates as the Saracens were thundering at the gates of Europe twelve hundred years ago. She had no choice. If Great Britain had not come to the rescue of France, the British Empire must have fallen, as it would have a hundred years ago but for the memorable Battle of Waterloo.

Mr. President, I think we performed an equally great service to the world, as great a sacrifice to self-governing peoples, as great a service to humanity and to civilization as did Great Britain or any of the other great nations engaged in this momentous struggle.

I do not deny that it was the duty of this country to enter the war. We might have done so before. We should have raised a warning hand when Germany ruthlessly invaded Belgium. Had we prepared then, as we should have done, and entered the war, we could have ended it with much less sacrifice of blood and treasure and very much less suffering. I realize, however, that we were separated by 3,000 miles of land and water. If Germany had been victorious, she would have attacked the United States next. She committed crimes against us which we could not, as a self-respecting Nation, overlook, and when the time did come and we finally entered the war, we exerted an influence and power which Germany could not resist. Such an example as ours has never been recorded in all the troubled pages of history, where a nation marshaled millions of men, all her resources, and crossed the sea to help crush an ambitious enemy of all the world.

I am not here to claim for Great Britain a preponderant vote in the assembly. I am here to stand for American rights, American interests, American honor, and American civilization, but in doing so I can not overlook the rights of other nations.

I know it is said that this amendment is the test of Americanism. I am willing to answer for my Americanism before my people or the people of the United States. I may disagree with Senators, but not on that proposition. I do not claim that they are not as patriotic or their motives as high as mine; but when I have considered a matter and have made up my mind as to what I should do, I am responsible for my actions, and I am willing to answer for them.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said, "We do not propose to take from the British Empire any of her votes, but to equalize her votes." He does propose to leave her to wield the power derived from her six votes, and I shall ask the attention of the Senate while I try to demonstrate that proposition.

The distinguished Senator says that this can not be measured alone by the number of votes or the questions upon which the members can vote, but in the larger aspect by their influence in the assembly, the council of the world; but he does not propose by this amendment to equalize that representation or to give us the same number of representatives, but only the same number of votes when we can use those votes, and at no other time.

Mr. President, I can best illustrate the matter by stating certain questions which are the principal questions to be decided by the league or by the council of the league. Let me state the following cases: A case where we have a dispute with the British Empire; a case where we have a dispute with another member, for instance, say, Mexico; and a case of dispute between two outside members to which we are not a party. In none of these cases would this amendment give us six votes on any possible question. Now, if that be true, is this the best way to equalize our influence and our power in the league of nations?

Let me further illustrate. Take the first case, where we have a dispute with the British Empire. We would have no vote at all; the British Empire would not have a vote; but according to the construction of the distinguished Senator—which may be correct—the colonies and self-governing countries belonging to Great Britain would each have a vote, and I am willing by a reservation to deny them that vote.

Now, let us take the next case—where we have a dispute with another member, for instance, with Mexico. Great Britain might cast her six votes either with Mexico or against her, and we would have no vote at all. The only remedy is to provide that the British Empire shall have but one vote; and that the distinguished Senator says he is not willing to do, because he does not wish to take from Canada, Australia, or New Zealand their right to vote in the assembly. The amendment is as follows:

Provided, That when any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire which are also members of the league, the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league.

But in the case of a dispute between the United States and the British Empire or any of her possessions, or a dispute between us and the Republic of Mexico, we would have no vote, and this amendment would not give us any vote, but would still leave Great Britain free to cast her six votes against us if she saw fit.

Suppose we had a dispute with Mexico, and she should ask under the provisions of the league to take that dispute to the assembly. No party to a controversy has any votes in the assembly or in the council, and therefore this amendment would still leave Great Britain to exert that influence which the Senator deplores in the event of any contest between the United States and Mexico, exactly as she would under the covenant as it is drawn. There is but one remedy, either deny her all votes but one as the British Empire or put every member upon the same footing and foundation. This amendment does not propose to do it.

Now, let me take the third case, the case of a dispute between two outside countries.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, before the Senator reaches that point——

Mr. KELLOGG. Unless the Senator wishes to make some announcement I would rather not be interrupted.

Mr. CURTIS. I wanted to ask the Senator a question, but if he declines to yield it is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I withdraw my question.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to ask the Senator this question: In case of a dispute between Great Britain and the United States, if for any reason Great Britain had an idea that the council would be unanimous for the United States and removed that dispute to the assembly under the provision of the covenant as it is drawn, would not Great Britain have five votes in the assembly while the United States would have none?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; because neither Great Britain nor this country could vote in the assembly. They are excluded.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; but the colonies could.

Mr. KELLOGG. This amendment does not remedy the inequality, because in no event would we have six votes; and if the colonies could vote, the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] does not remedy it. That is the point I make. The only remedy is by a reservation, which I am in favor of, declaring that in case of any dispute between a member having self-governing colonies and our own country, the self-governing colonies shall have no vote; the vote of the principal member shall be the only vote they are entitled to. But this particular amendment does not reach that.

Mr. CURTIS. I am afraid the Senator's construction of that amendment is too narrow.

Mr. KELLOGG. Which amendment is the Senator speaking of?

Mr. CURTIS. The amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. KELLOGG. It does not touch that point.

Mr. CURTIS. His amendment says that in any controversy in which we are concerned we shall have the same number of votes that Great Britain has.

Mr. KELLOGG. But we would have no vote in a controversy in which we were concerned.

Mr. CURTIS. But we want to be given the vote. That is what we are insisting upon.

Mr. KELLOGG. The answer to the Senator's proposition is this: The amendment of the Senator from California does not propose, in a dispute between this country and the British Empire, to give us an equal number of votes with that country. It is for that reason I am in favor of a reservation that where there is a dispute between this country and any member having self-governing colonies, neither the parent country nor the self-governing colonies can vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I simply want to correct the Senator in one particular, that is all; not to interrupt him. There is a corollary of this amendment which the Senator will find in the form of an amendment to article 15.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am going to speak of that.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. And in that corollary the exact thing that the Senator inveighs against is accomplished.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall come to that amendment in a moment. The Senator from California is entirely right. The amendment which the Senator refers to is not the amendment offered by him, but the amendment offered, as I understand, by another Senator, Mr. MOSES, from New Hampshire.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The two were offered together, and they relate to the same subject matter.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will admit that. I do not wish to avoid that in the slightest degree. But the amendment referred to is found on page 31, and I will come to that in a moment. It provides:

> Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

That amendment would prevent the colonies of the British Empire from voting when we have a dispute with the British Empire, and I am in favor of the principle of that amendment, declared in a reservation, which will amply protect this country. I believe that may be the proper construction of the covenant, in any event.

But I realize that in many respects it is very indefinite, it is subject to different constructions by equally honest minds, and I am perfectly willing to make it clear by a reservation that she should not have such vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Do I understand the Senator to say that his construction is, under the covenant as it now stands, that the colonies of Great Britain could not vote in a dispute between one of the colonies of Great Britain and ourselves or another country?

Mr. KELLOGG. I say that that construction has been placed upon it by very able gentlemen.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does the Senator place that construction upon it?

Mr. KELLOGG. I hold that that construction might honestly and fairly be placed upon it by men of fair minds. I do not say that that is the proper construction.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I ask what the Senator's construction of it is?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I decline to be interrupted further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota declines to be interrupted.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will take but a few moments, as I understand the Senate is to recess at 4 o'clock, and I hope Senators will permit me to proceed with my argument.

The third case which I suggested is a case of a dispute between two outside members of the league, say Mexico and Colombia, or any two members. I do not think that this amendment would give us 6 votes in such a case. If a party to the dispute demands that it go to the assembly, it will be sent there under article 15, which provides as follows:

> The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council.

Then the section proceeds, and this is the provision to which I invite the Senate's attention:

> In any case referred to the assembly all the provisions of this article and of article 12 relating to the action of the council shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

Note the language:

> Provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by * * * the council and a majority of the other members.

This country is a member of the council in such a dispute between Mexico and Colombia, and as such member of the council has a vote. But those voting in the assembly are nations which are not represented in the council, and therefore we would have no vote to make up that majority. In other words, the council must be unanimous in order that we can vote. Then it must be concurred in by a majority of the other members of the league who are not members of the council.

Mr. President, I have given three of the principal cases where there could arise a dispute between the United States and the British Empire, between the United States and any other member of the league, or between two members of the league other than the British Empire and the United States. In none of those cases, as I read this amendment, would it grant the relief which is demanded by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

I believe that my country is entitled to the same representation as any other country in the world, and I am willing that every other country should have the same representation as this country has. There is only one solution, and that is to provide that Great Britain, or the British Empire, shall have one vote, and only one vote.

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the question raised by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and so ably discussed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whether the British colonies are entitled to a place upon the council. If they are, the amendment of the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] do not cure this defect. I do not believe that the British Empire, which is a party to this treaty, as a whole ought to have more than one representative upon the council, and I am willing to vote for a reservation that provides that that is the proper construction of the covenant. I am quite aware that the President, Messrs. Lloyd-George, and M. Clemenceau joined in a letter to Mr. Borden stating that Canada was entitled, if she could be elected, to a place upon the council; and I am quite aware of the arguments of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that, as the council is made up of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, and as the principal allied and associated powers are the British Empire—not Great Britain—the United States, France, Italy, and Japan, the greater includes the less, and that when the British Empire is represented upon the council it necessarily, by implication, excludes the colonies of the British Empire. It will be noted that in the first provision of the treaty the principal allied and associated powers are defined as the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, these powers being described in the present treaty as "the principal allied and associated powers."

As the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] says, the council is made up of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, which include the British Empire, not

Great Britain, and he does not think the colonies of the British Empire are entitled to representation upon the council.

The distinguished authorities—the President, Mr. Lloyd-George, and M. Clemenceau—hold the opposite view, and I must admit that since these gentlemen framed the instrument their judgment is entitled to great weight. However, it is immaterial, because these amendments do not seek to remedy that situation at all.

As I said before, it has been proposed that this situation be corrected in the resolution of ratification by a reservation. Such a reservation, I am told, is before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I shall read that reservation into the RECORD for the benefit of the Senators. It is as follows:

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, have cast more than one vote; or in case of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league in which such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire, united with it politically, shall have voted.

This covers both the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. In other words, the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] says, "We do not propose to say that Canada, New Zealand, and India should not vote, but we propose to give the United States an equal vote." But the amendments do not accomplish that in any dispute.

This reservation would simply serve notice upon the British Empire that we decline to be bound by an award or decision in which any member and its self-governing colonies cast more than one vote.

It may be that in disputes we should not object to the votes of Canada and the other countries. I understand it to be the theory of the Senator from Idaho that they should vote, but I do think that it is entirely consistent for us to say, "If you propose to give them six votes, we shall not be bound in any dispute where that right is exercised to our disadvantage, if we object to it."

The second part of this reservation covers the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. It provides that we shall not be bound—

* * * in case of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league in which such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically shall have voted.

Mr. President, I heard the argument of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that in a dispute between us and the British Empire the colonies could not vote, but would be excluded. I shall not analyze that argument, for I realize the equity of his position. If we were construing an ordinary instrument, I realize that it could be well said that where the British Empire had a dispute with us it was a dispute with all the British Empire, which would include her colonies. Her colonies have no foreign relations. A dispute with Canada is a dispute with the British Empire.

I am willing, for the purposes of the argument, to concede the position of the Senator from Idaho, but I state unequivocally that no amendment is necessary to construe this covenant, so that no member in dispute with this country can control the vote of its colonies, self-governing dominions, or parts of empire in that dispute. This can be accomplished, however, by a reservation, for which I shall vote.

I wish to confine the limitation to this country. I do not wish to intermeddle in the affairs of the other signatory powers. If France, Italy, or Japan, or any other country desires that as between itself and the British Empire the latter may cast or have its colonies cast votes when the British Empire is interested it does not concern me. Therefore I wish that this reservation shall be confined to this country alone.

Referring again to the amendment, it provides:

Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

In my opinion, if the treaty is returned with that amendment in it, it must be agreed to by all the other powers as between themselves, and France and Italy could not agree that the British Empire should have her colonies vote in a dispute with them. Under this reservation, however, we are not meddling in their affairs, and I am not concerned with their decision. I shall be satisfied when we have placed a reservation upon this instrument which prevents the colonies of a member from voting in a dispute between us and the parent government.

Mr. President, I do not see why we should seek to amend the treaty as between France, Great Britain, Italy, or any other members of the league when we can make a reservation apply to this country alone, which they may then accept and which will protect the United States.

Mr. President, through all this long contest I have constantly kept in mind that it is the bounden duty of the Senate to see that the honor, rights, and interests of this country are protected. I yield to no man in that desire. If we can accomplish that as between the United States and the other nations, I am willing that France, Italy, and the other powers shall do as they please, and I shall not ask them to change the treaty as between themselves.

I do not sympathize with the sentiment expressed by some that the Senate should simply adopt the treaty as it was written in Paris, and that we should not exercise our judgment upon these great vital issues so important to the honor, the stability, and the progress of this Nation. While I am willing to concede that Great Britain has done much to encourage democratic government over the face of the earth, I believe that we took a step in advance and that we have given to the world a Constitution which, as a model, has been copied by many nations in the last 100 years. I believe it is of the utmost importance that this country should maintain her institutions unimpaired, without the meddlesome interference of any other nation, for in that regard I am not an internationalist. But when I have voted for reservations which, in my judgment, protect the institutions and the future of this Nation, I am not willing to go further and urge that the other countries accept them as between themselves as the proper interpretation of the covenant. That is my position. I may be wrong; but I am willing to answer for it in the great court of public opinion, where we must all answer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator just one question before he resumes his seat.

Mr. KELLOGG. What is the question?

Mr. KING. The Senator has indicated that the reservations to which he calls attention would, in his opinion, fully protect the United States. I refer to the reservation with respect to voting in the assembly. How does the Senator think the reservation would protect the United States in the international labor conference? I regard the labor provision as a very important one, one of the vital provisions of the treaty, and I am not quite sure that the discussion of the Senator illuminates the question as to the protection which our Government would have in the labor conference.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Idaho stated that the same representation would exist in the labor conference as existed in the league; and if that is true no decision of the labor conference, in which the British Empire and her self-governing colonies had more than one vote, would bind us in any respect. I have not given particular attention to the effect of it, but if this reservation does not cover it, of course, it can be made to cover it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. There is this further difference between the two. The so-called Johnson amendment attacks a part of the league where unanimity of action by the council is required. The representation in part 13 of the treaty, which is the labor part, contains no provision for unanimity. There a two-thirds vote is all that is necessary, and if this amendment is needed here it is much more needed in part 13, to which it does not apply at all.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is quite true.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask if there is not this distinction, that as to part 13 the labor conference can take no action which binds the United States, under the terms of the treaty, without subsequent action by the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. But that is not true of the league covenant.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true as it now stands. It will not be true very long after it goes into effect.

RECESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota having concluded his remarks, under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate will stand in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, October 23, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 22, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of life and love, justice and mercy, strength and purity, impart unto us of these inestimable gifts abundantly, that the trend of our lives may be Godward and all men come into the oneness in thought and intent with Thee; that selfishness, greed, profiteering, may pass away, and the ruling passion of men may be to help, exalt, purify; that the simpler life may be ours and all men live together in peace and happiness, inspired by the world's great Exemplar, our Lord and Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs was called.

INTERNATIONAL COMMUNICATION.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I call up the bill (H. R. 9822) to authorize the President of the United States to arrange and participate in an international conference to consider questions relating to international communication.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration on this measure.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that question is not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. There has been a ruling on that, that on Calendar Wednesday that question should be raised in the committee and not in the House. Speaker CLARK ruled that in the last Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill is not on the calendar, is it?

Mr. ROGERS. It certainly is on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, we automatically go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum here before we pass on this matter, and I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair thinks no quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ackerman	Edmonds	Kennedy, R. I.	Riordan
Anthony	Ellsworth	Kiess	Robinson, N. C.
Bacharach	Fess	Kincheloe	Robsion, Ky.

The SPEAKER. On this call 274 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. Under the rule the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk reported. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. DYER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 9822, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill by title.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO and Mr. BLANTON objected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested and authorized in the name of the Government of the United States to call, in his discretion, an international conference to assemble in Washington, and to appoint representatives to participate therein, to consider all international aspects of communication by telegraph, telephone, cable, wireless, telepnone, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities for international communication on a fair and equitable basis.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be disbursed under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of State for expenses incidental to the conference.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 6, after the word "appoint," insert "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to provide the necessary authorization for the holding at Washington of an international conference to take up all questions relating to international communication. The only question at issue between the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the minority of the committee is whether the President shall be required to submit for confirmation by the Senate the names of the representatives of the United States to that conference. The minority of the committee bases its objection to the bill solely upon that point. Before I deal specifically with it I want to call to the attention of the House some of the considerations which lead me to believe that this conference is of very great importance to the country.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Not now. This conference will take up, among other things, the question of the disposition of the captured German cables. Under the agreement of the Paris conference these German cables—which are quite numerous and of great importance to the commercial world—were given to the five great powers, each of which at present owns a one-fifth undivided interest in them. What shall be the ultimate disposition of them? I do not need to emphasize the great importance of a wise answer to that question.

Another question will be the general one of how the rights of property in submarine cables in peace and in war shall be maintained and preserved. It was developed at the peace conference and during the war that there was practically no body of authority as to the rights of property in submarine cables in peace and in war.

As an illustration of the length to which Governments went, Great Britain cut one end of the New York-German cable and towed that end into Halifax; she cut the other end of the cable in the English Channel and towed that into Land's End. So that instead of there being a German-American cable, the result of that action was that there was a Great Britain-Canada cable.

The United States protested, but because there was no international law on the subject, absolutely no result was obtained and no redress secured. All these questions will be considered by a conference of this kind.

Then innumerable questions which relate to radio operations, both in peace and war, will come before this conference—communication between vessels at sea, communication between vessels in distress and the shore, questions relating to the regulations of wave lengths for wireless purposes, and so forth. Questions involving the international use of telegraphs and telephones will also be dealt with.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. ROGERS. For a brief question.
Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman if the cutting off of this trans-Atlantic cable of which he speaks was done by England before we entered the war or after?
Mr. ROGERS. Oh, before we entered the war.
Mr. JUUL. That is different.
Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. I will.
Mr. MILLER. What are the five powers among which the German cables were divided?
Mr. ROGERS. Great Britain, France, Italy, the United States, and Japan.
Mr. MILLER. Japan shares one-fifth?
Mr. ROGERS. Japan has an undivided fifth part in the cables.
It is very important for this country, very important for the civilized world, that these questions should be settled wisely and explicitly and as nearly as possible for all time.
Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. I will yield to the gentleman.
Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state whether it is necessary to have legislation enacted to authorize the President to call this conference? Does he not have authority now to call a conference?
Mr. ROGERS. By the act of March 4, 1913, it was provided that no such conference shall be called unless the consent of Congress shall first be obtained.
Mr. WALSH. This involves the negotiation of a treaty, and he would have authority to appoint commissioners for that purpose to consider all these matters.
Mr. ROGERS. The precedents indicate that the President has ample authority to appoint representatives to negotiate a treaty; but while the line may sometimes be a narrow one there is a distinction between the negotiators of a treaty and gentlemen who come together to form an international conference.
Mr. WALSH. Eventually will not these matters subject to the conference have to be determined by a treaty?
Mr. ROGERS. This conference will fail of its purpose if it does not succeed in drafting some sort of an instrument that will ultimately be the basis of a treaty. It is for that very reason that the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs feels that it is extremely important to have confirmed by the Senate the nominations of the President.
Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.
Mr. RAMSEYER. More important than the rights in the German cables now divided among the five great powers, it seems to me, is the matter of more adequate facilities in the way of cables for communication. I understand that the commercial world is handicapped by the inadequacy of international communication.
Mr. ROGERS. That is true, and one reason for that fact is that the rights of property are not protected now. If men who wish to invest money in a cable company were sure their rights of property therein would be taken care of in time of war they would be more interested in undertaking such an enterprise.
Mr. RAMSEYER. That is one of the problems to be considered?
Mr. ROGERS. That is one of the problems to be considered at this conference.
Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.
Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask who is to participate in the conference?
Mr. ROGERS. All of the Entente powers. At this stage only the Entente powers will be invited.
Mr. DENISON. Why?
Mr. ROGERS. I suppose for the same reasons that have influenced the action of the commissioners at Paris. They are not prepared at the present time to take the hostile powers into the full community of nations.
Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. Yes.
Mr. TEMPLE. Have diplomatic relations been resumed between the Entente powers and the powers with whom we are technically still at war?
Mr. ROGERS. They have not been resumed with either Germany or Austria-Hungary.
Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. Yes.
Mr. DENISON. I did not have in mind the enemy nations, but I had in mind the great neutral nations not involved in the war.
Mr. ROGERS. I think I was mistaken in my previous answer. The neutral nations are, I understand, to be included in this invitation.
Mr. DENISON. Could not this question be handled by the league of nations, which is coming into power pretty soon?
Mr. ROGERS. I am frank to say that I believe it would be better handled by this conference than by the league of nations.
Mr. DENISON. I would like to know why, but I shall not take the gentleman's time.
Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. Yes.
Mr. WHITE of Maine. In connection with the question as to whom the invitation may be extended to attend this conference, that is a matter wholly within the discretion of the President.
Mr. ROGERS. Yes.
Mr. WHITE of Maine. Is there any reason why he can not also, if he sees fit, invite the powers with whom we have been at war?
Mr. ROGERS. Under this resolution he can invite whatever powers he sees fit to invite, but my understanding is that he intends to exclude the Central Powers.
I have been trying to emphasize the importance of this conference, because it seems to me that on that element of importance depends to a considerable extent the propriety of the amendment of the committee requiring confirmation by the Senate. Of course, gentlemen are familiar in this House with the extent to which confirmations by the Senate are necessary. For example, there are 10,825 post offices in the United States, nominations of postmasters to which must be confirmed by the Senate. Among these great post offices which are included in that enumeration are the post office at Riverdale, a few miles to the northeast, carrying a salary of $1,000 a year; the post office at Kensington, beyond Chevy Chase, with a salary of $1,200 a year; Mount Rainier, in the northeast, with a salary of $1,100 a year; Forest Glen, where the girls' school is, with a salary of $1,600 a year; Hyattsville, with a salary of $1,700 a year; Gaithersburg, with a salary of $1,600 a year; and Silver Spring, with a salary of $1,400.
Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. May I go on for just a moment?
Mr. RAMSEYER. I just want to ask the gentleman about this phrase here. I want to know whether that is an innovation in bills of that kind?
Mr. ROGERS. I will deal fully with that in a moment. I have not been able to get the exact number of appointments certified to the Senate for confirmation since President Wilson took office in 1913; but in the Sixty-third Congress there were over 10,000 such appointments, in the Sixty-fourth Congress there were over 12,000 such appointments, and the best estimate that I can make for the Sixty-fifth Congress is that there were something like 25,000 such appointments.
Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman——
Mr. ROGERS. I can not yield just now. They include postmasters of the first, second, and third class; they include Army officers from second lieutenant up to a four-star general; they include naval officers from ensign up to an admiral; they include consuls of the eighth class and secretaries of the fourth class.
Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. Yes.
Mr. FLOOD. Is it not a fact that the Constitution——
Mr. ROGERS. I am coming to the Constitution in a moment.
Mr. FLOOD. But I want to ask the gentleman a question.
Mr. ROGERS. I want to show what the facts are. I have in my hand a book showing the nominations from the Treasury Department which must be confirmed by the Senate, another book showing nominations from the Department of Justice, many of which must be confirmed by the Senate, and a thick volume submitted to this Congress in 1913 by the Civil Service Commission showing the officers of the Government who must be confirmed by the Senate. This book contains something like 120 pages of the finest possible type, though it excludes all Army and Navy officers. In other words, there are tens of thousands of positions under the Government which to fill lawfully the President must have the confirmation of the Senate.
Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question there?
Mr. ROGERS. I can not yield just now.
Mr. FLOOD. But the gentleman has an hour.
Mr. ROGERS. I will yield a little later. I want to read from the Constitution of the United States itself.

Article II, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States provides that the President—shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

In other words, the presumption is that every officer under the United States shall be appointed by the President and shall be confirmed by the Senate, but in the case of inferior officers and at the pleasure of Congress the authority may be conferred upon the President to make such appointments alone.

The majority of the committee regard this forthcoming international-communication conference as a very important one. We are not willing to belittle the character of the officers who shall represent the United States at that conference by saying that the President alone may appoint them. We do not regard them as "inferior officers." Therefore we want to have them confirmed by the Senate. We believe that such a requirement will result in additional prestige to them; we believe also that it is of great importance, in view of the magnitude and diversity of questions coming up at that conference, that the very best men to be found in the United States shall be appointed. We think that this amendment will encourage the selection of the very best men.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Has the Congress by law ever authorized the appointment of a class of officers that would permit the appointment to be made without the confirmation of the Senate?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Has there been any specific law passed by Congress authorizing such officers to be appointed without confirmation by the Senate?

Mr. ROGERS. I will cite such a law in a moment.

Mr. TILSON. Then, if it should be determined that these are inferior officers, who should not have the approval of the Senate, should not we, in this act at least, specify that they may be appointed without the confirmation of the Senate?

Mr. ROGERS. I think that is a very strong point. Such a situation was illustrated in the matter of post-office appointments. From the foundation of the Government until 1872 every postmaster was subject to confirmation by the Senate. Then in 1872 the Congress passed a law providing that thereafter fourth and fifth class postmasters, who were deemed by Congress to be inferior officers within the language of the Constitution, might be appointed by the President alone, but continuing the requirement that first, second, and third class postmasters must be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. TILSON. And in the case of appointment of officers in the late war was it not specifically provided by law that those officers might be appointed without the confirmation of the Senate?

Mr. ROGERS. That is true; and that is another illustration of just the same situation.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman how many instances he has come across of acts of Congress requiring the President to submit nominations for appointment of delegates to an international conference to the Senate for confirmation?

Mr. ROGERS. I have read the report of the gentleman from Virginia which was submitted yesterday, and the gentleman has very fully and, I think, very accurately set forth the facts in that regard. I think since the beginning of the Government there have been something like 32 cases or 35 cases which have been confirmed by the Senate and several hundred cases which have not been confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman did not catch my question. I asked him how many acts of Congress he had discovered that required the President to submit his nominations to the Senate, not how many times the President had acted——

Mr. ROGERS. It is the provision of the Constitution itself that requires confirmation by the Senate, unless Congress explicitly relieves the President from the necessity. Such a law is, therefore, unnecessary.

Now, the question is, gentlemen, whether these men ought to be regarded as inferior officers. Both the Secretary of State and his expert on this question testified that something like a treaty was likely to result and ought to result from the deliberations of the conference. The Secretary of State testified that these representatives of the United States would probably be paid. He said he did not believe in voluntary service; that he believed in paying men, so that you could keep a tight rein upon them. So these men are going to be paid, and they are going to represent the United States for an indeterminate period—probably for several months. I submit that for these reasons and in view of the magnitude of the interests at stake and of the importance of the United States of the issues to be taken up it is not fair to the country not to require that these representatives on the part of the United States should be confirmed by the Senate. I am willing to go further, gentlemen. I am willing to say that whenever we authorize in Congress an international conference the representatives to that conference ought to be confirmed by the Senate. There is no disposition on my part and, I think, no disposition on the part of my colleagues on the committee to nag or hamper or harass the President. I am willing to put this issue on the very broad ground that when matters of fundamental importance to the Nation, involving our policy for years to come, are going to be presented at an international conference, it is right and proper that the legislative branch of the Government should have a hand in saying who the representatives of the country should be to negotiate with the delegates of the other nations of the world. So, gentlemen, let us put it on that broad ground.

Congress since 1913 has said the legislative branch has an interest, and a direct interest, in determining what international conferences shall be held. Up to 1913 the President could call international conferences as he saw fit. Since 1913, as I say, it has been necessary for Congress to authorize the call before he could even issue the invitation. Having thus indicated our viewpoint, why should not we all the more indicate our interest in the character of the personnel of our representatives to that conference?

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield just briefly?

Mr. ROGERS. I will yield for a question.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to what extent did the legislative branch of the Government have anything to do with the selection of the men who sat with the other nations in Paris?

Mr. ROGERS. They had absolutely nothing to do with it. Mr. Chairman, I think that Congress ought to pass a statute if it is necessary—though I do not believe that under the Constitution it is necessary—requiring the President, whether he is a Republican President or a Democratic President, to submit his representatives to negotiate treaties to the Senate before they can go forth. [Applause.] If we appoint a third-class postmaster or a second lieutenant or an ensign only after confirmation by the Senate, I submit that issues affecting the future and welfare of the world, such as those passed upon by our five commissioners at Paris, ought to have some preliminary consideration by the Senate of the United States. The Senate should at least have had a voice in the selection of our ministers to negotiate the peace of Paris. [Applause.] Let us see whether it is not a wise time for the Congress to assert its own prerogatives. [Applause.] In war days, gentlemen, this House, regardless of party loyalty, gave unprecedented powers to the President of the United States. I have no fault to find with that course of procedure. I participated in that policy. I approved of that policy. But now the days of peace have come, are we going to continue to give the President every power and gradually subtract from the power which we under the Constitution ought to exert?

I submit that that very issue is linked up in the half dozen words of the committee amendment. It is true that in the past appointments by the President to negotiate treaties have not generally been confirmed by the Senate. On the other hand, it is also true that our delegates to purchase Louisiana, that our delegates to negotiate the Treaty of Ghent, which closed the War of 1812, that our delegates to represent the United States in settling the Alabama claims, were all confirmed by the Senate. And it is also true that President Washington, President Adams, the elder, President Jefferson, President Madison, President John Quincy Adams, and President Grant all thought that it was worth while to have the sanction and approval of the Senate of the United States before they sent men forth to negotiate treaties of peace. Whether or not the right be in the President, I believe a President should welcome, and probably would welcome, the assistance of the Senate. It strengthens his own hands; it makes his position stronger.

Referring to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL], I firmly believe that from the President's own standpoint it was one of the most grievous mistakes he ever made not to submit to the Senate the names of the commissioners to negotiate the Paris treaty. [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe that he would have been in an infinitely stronger position if he had done that. I believe that that treaty would now have been ratified if that procedure had been followed. And so, gentlemen, I am perfectly willing, as I say, to put this question on broad grounds. Let us say to-day that we will not only authorize the holding of an international conference hereafter, but we will also have a voice in this Capitol, if not in this Chamber, as to who shall be the representatives of the United States at that conference.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has used 28 minutes and reserves the balance of his hour. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for an hour. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, there are many features of this bill that commend themselves to me. It carries quite a large appropriation for a matter of this kind, but as Republicans are in the habit of making large appropriations, I do not know that an attempt should be made to amend it in that particular, as such an attempt could not succeed in this House.

There are many features of this bill that will commend themselves to the consideration of those interested in the future progress and development of this country. The bill as introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] contains all those features. I do not think the bill itself is sufficiently well drawn to carry out the ideas and purpose that the bill aims at, and I believe if the bill does pass without some additional amendments other than those put upon it by the Committee on Foreign Affairs the appropriation will fail to carry out the purposes which the State Department has in view.

But I think, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is obnoxious to every fair-minded American, whatever be his politics, by reason of the amendment which the committee put in it. That amendment is a requirement that the President shall appoint delegates to this international conference only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is unusual. It will result in no good purpose; no good can come from it. It springs from nothing but partisan politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It violates the Constitution, which Members of this House are sworn to uphold and maintain.

Mr. KNUTSON. What particular section?

Mr. FLOOD. I will tell you after a while if you will wait. There is lots in the Constitution you never dreamed of.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], in answer to my question, or in attempting to answer it, evaded the real issue. I asked him if he could put his fingers upon an instance where the laws of Congress had required the President to submit, for the advice and consent of the Senate, the names of the gentlemen he had appointed to conferences of this kind. He could not do it, and he can not do it, because in all the history of this Congress, from its first organization down to this time, it has never attempted to that extent to invade the prerogative of the Executive. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman says there are precedents for this. I say there are no precedents for it. This is an act of Congress requiring the President, if it goes through, to submit his nominations to the Senate. Presidents in the past have done so and they have not done so; they have acted according to their judgment, according to their wishes in the matter, and without compulsion or attempted compulsion on the part of Congress. Can not gentlemen see the distinction? Washington named some commissioners and sent their names to the Senate for confirmation, but he named numbers and numbers of commissioners whose names he did not send to the Senate for confirmation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I wish to ask the gentleman if peace commissions had ever been appointed prior to this last one without having been confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. FLOOD. I see there is something besides the Constitution the gentleman does not know. In only one instance in the history of this country has a peace commission been sent to the Senate for confirmation by that body. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In every other single instance our commissioners appointed to negotiate peace after war have been appointed by the President without the advice and consent of the Senate.

I suppose that President McKinley and his course and his judgment and his patriotism would appeal to the majority whip. He appointed a peace commission to negotiate peace between this country and Spain in 1898, and he did not send it to the Senate for confirmation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In 1848, when we negotiated peace with Mexico, the names of the peace commissioners were not sent to the Senate for confirmation. Only in one instance were the names of commissioners to negotiate peace treaties sent to the Senate for confirmation; President Madison did send the names of his commissioners appointed to the Ghent peace conference to the Senate for confirmation. But that is the only time, and it simply demonstrates the point that I was making—that the Constitution has left this matter with the President.

If the President, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] says, would welcome the advice of the Senate, the President can get it by sending the names of his appointees to the Senate for their advice and consent. But there never has been a case in the history of this Government in which Congress has undertaken by law to require the President to send the names of such appointees to the Senate for confirmation or rejection.

Mr. ROGERS. The Constitution requires it, as I explained.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman knows that the constitutional idea he advanced here has been exploded in this country for nearly a hundred years. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman knows he would not ordinarily undertake to maintain such a proposition, and he knows that the Constitution of the United States vests executive functions in the President, and he exercises all of them without restriction except where the Constitution itself restrains him. The Constitution vests in the President absolutely the uncontrolled and uncontrollable authority to appoint all agents of every kind to deal with our international relations, except that ambassadors, public ministers, and consuls must be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No one will contend that the delegates to the international conference which this bill provides for are either ambassadors, public ministers, or consuls, and therefore no one should contend for a power in Congress to control his discretion in the naming of such delegates. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Constitution requires the President to submit treaties to the Senate, which are ratified by a vote of two-thirds of the Senate. It requires the President, in dealing with our foreign relations, to submit to the Senate for their confirmation the nominations of ambassadors, public ministers, and consuls; and outside of that the President's power over our international relations is uncontrolled and uncontrollable by any other body in this Government.

I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], a distinguished member of this committee, a distinguished professor on political science, will agree with me about that. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] attempts to compare these delegates with third and second and first class postmasters. The Constitution requires the nomination of an officer to be submitted to the Senate unless the law declares them minor officers and stipulates that they need not be so submitted. But these delegates are not officers. Since the foundation of the Government there have been over 600 sets of such delegates appointed, and no one has ever suggested that they were officers in the meaning of Article II, section 2, of the Constitution. No one has been found willing to stand for such a proposition until it was advanced here to-day. So it must be clear to Members that there is absolutely no constitutional authority justifying this amendment.

Now, let us see about the precedent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] has referred to. Some of the Presidents have sent the names of commissioners to the Senate for ratification. Many of them did it, but very many more did not. There have been in the history of this country 35 instances in which these nominations for appointment have been sent by Presidents to the Senate for confirmation. There have been between 500 and 600 cases in which the appointments have been made without reference to the Senate.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; very briefly.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not his opinion that it would have been for the best interests of this country if the legislative branch of the Government and the President had worked more closely together than has been the case for the past couple of years?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not agree with the gentleman that the legislative and executive branches of this Government have not acted together in the last couple of years, at least prior to May 19 last. It may have been if the President had flattered the vanity of some of the Republican Senators [applause on the Democratic side] by putting them upon the peace commission that treaty which the world desires and which America desires would have been ratified before now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But I say you are doing a thing that is partisan, and nothing but partisan. It has no other purpose. It can accomplish no good. It violates the Constitution, and it is simply an affront, and not a dignified and brave affront, to the great President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not believe the Senate will for a moment think of voting this measure through. But to get back to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] called precedents. All the Presidents who sent appointments to the Senate for confirmation have also made appointments without confirmation. Washington did it, Adams did it, Jefferson did it, Madison did it, Monroe did it, the younger Adams did it in 22 cases, and never sent but one to the Senate for its approval.

But I will name some later Presidents whose actions and whose patriotism may appeal more strongly to gentlemen on the other side of the House than the great fathers of the Republic do. The immortal Lincoln during his term of office appointed 18 such commissions. Not a single one was sent to the Senate for ratification. Surely gentlemen on that side will not by their votes condemn a practice that Lincoln approved. Grant, the great general who won the War between the States, and whose memory is honored by the people I represent, because in the hour of victory he acted like a soldier and a man, appointed 55 such commissions and did not send the names of the delegates on a single one of these commissions to the Senate. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] says the appointments of the American commissioners in the Alabama arbitration case were sent to the Senate for ratification. The gentleman is mistaken. The names of the representatives who negotiated for us in the Alabama case were not sent to the Senate for confirmation. Hayes sent but two, Garfield none, Arthur one or two, Harrison one or two, and McKinley—ah, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] says it would have been better if the President of the United States had let the Senate pass upon the nomination of his peace commissioners—McKinley did not do it; and what is more, out of a great number of appointments of commissioners to make treaties and to attend just such conferences as this, McKinley never referred a single one to the Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield just a moment for an interruption——

Mr. FLOOD. No; I can not yield just a moment. Let the gentleman get time from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. MASON. It was just a question. I will get time from Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, they say they want to get the President closer to Congress. They want to hold the big stick over the President. President Roosevelt made a great number of these appointments and never sent a single one of them to the Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Taft did the same thing. He appointed my friend from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] to two South American conferences of great importance. He never sent any of them to the Senate, and not since the year 1891 has a single one of the appointments by Presidents of the United States to positions of this kind been sent to the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. GOOD. I have just been looking over the gentleman's report. I do not claim to have very much information in regard to the subject, and that is the reason why I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I notice on page 6 of the report the gentleman states that John Jay and Thomas Pinkney and Rufus King and John Quincy Adams and C. C. Pinkney and John Marshall and James Monroe and Robert R. Livingston and Albert Gallatin and many others were appointed by the United States to conduct negotiations between 1789 and 1888, and those that I have named, with a number of others, were confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Why was that?

Mr. FLOOD. That was because, for some reason satisfactory to himself, the President saw fit to send those names to the Senate. In some instances they characterized them by names to indicate that they were public ministers, and sometimes not; but in every instance every President who sent appointments to the Senate also named commissioners without sending them to the Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not a single President from Washington down to Wilson has ever failed to do that.

Mr. GOOD. Can the gentleman inform the House why a distinction was made in some cases?

Mr. FLOOD. I say it was simply the wish of the President, thinking he would accomplish something by that method. There is no compulsion of law; there is no compulsion of the Constitution. There can be no compulsion by statute. It was simply the voluntary act of the President.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman a question. I was not here when the gentleman who preceded him [Mr. ROGERS] spoke, and the gentleman was talking when I came in.

If I understand him aright—and that is the only question I want to ask—there are precedents both ways, but the gentleman says that the weight of precedent is with his contention.

Mr. FLOOD. No, sir; I do not say that. I say there is absolutely no precedent for this amendment; that there is no case where by act of Congress, such as this would be, the President has been required to send to the Senate for confirmation the names of delegates who should deal with international relations. I say there have been a number of cases where the President of his own volition has sent such names to the Senate, but a vastly greater number of cases where he did not do it.

Mr. CANNON. They are both ways.

Mr. FLOOD. The President can do it. He can do it now if he wants to. He can do it in this case if he wants to, but there is no precedent for Congress requiring him to do it. It seems to me that ought to be plain. There have been 35 cases where Presidents have sent such names to the Senate for confirmation, but in nearly 600 cases they have not done it.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied 38 minutes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. No; I can not yield. I have not the time. I hope there will be enough members in this committee who will vote down this proposition, to enable us to take it up and pass the bill upon its merits. I can see nothing but partisanship in this proposition.

If we want to establish a policy, let us bring in a law to fix it for all such cases and not one particular case as an insult to the President. If you undertake to pass a general law applicable to all cases, you will show your faith in your constitutional power and your sincerity and courage, but tacking this amendment on here is partisan politics. I believe in partisanship. I believe in the virile kind of partisanship of ex-Speaker CLARK and ex-Speaker CANNON, who will do everything in their power honorably and justly, in this House and out of it, to place the men and measures of their political faith in control of this Government. [Applause.] I believe in the partisanship of the Speaker of this House, who always sympathizes with members of his party, but who always decides questions raised here fairly and honestly and without reference to party advantage. [Applause.] It has been partisans who in all ages of the world, in every field of human progress, have led the way. Wherever conflicts of opinion have determined the thoughts and actions of men there the well-equipped partisan has been the guiding power and controlling force for good; but our international affairs are no place for even wholesome partisanship. In these affairs Americans should stand together. During the war this House did not indulge in partisanship. In the trying days of reconstruction let us follow a similar rule, and it will be for the good and the glory of the country. [Applause.] I appeal to gentlemen on that side not to vote for this amendment simply because it was reported by a Republican committee. You can point out no purpose except a discourtesy to our great President. He is a great President, self-poised and courageous, honest and able, brilliant and patriotic in guarding every interest of America and of humanity; he has won his way into the hearts of the people not only of this country, but of the entire world [applause], and to-day everywhere he is looked upon as the foremost man and the wisest statesman of his day and generation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. FLOOD. I reserve the remainder of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CANNON took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2716. An act to relieve the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of said Thomas H. Hall of the payment of money alleged to have been misappropriated by a clerk in said office.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 333. An act providing for the disinterment and removal of the remains of the infant child Norman Lee Molzahn from the temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to a permanent burial place;

H. R. 5007. An act granting citizenship to certain Indians;

H. R. 2452. An act for the relief of Charles A. Carey; and

H. R. 753. An act for the relief of Susie Currier.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior years, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL COMMUNICATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. [Applause.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take any part in this discussion, although I voted for the amendment. I rose simply to explain what my distinguished colleague on the committee [Mr. FLOOD] seemed to think a very material thing, that President McKinley did not send the names of the Spanish War peace commissioners to the Senate for ratification. I happened to be a Member of the Senate at that time, before I was promoted to this House, and I happen to know something about what was done at that time, and I assume that other Presidents acted in the same way. It will be remembered that President McKinley appointed men who under the rules of the Senate would need no confirmation. There is a rule there which covers that. The President of the United States appointed Mr. Frye, of Maine; Cushman K. Davis, who, as I remember, was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate; and Senator, now Justice, Gray, of Delaware, a Democrat. Every man in the Senate knew who was to be appointed, and every man, under the rules of the Senate, would naturally vote for his confirmation. In other words, while President McKinley did not ask for the consent, he did ask for the advice of the Senate.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] to the fact that on the 4th of March, 1913, in the last act signed by President Taft, when this desire of the Executive to usurp the power of Congress had been growing so much, Congress demanded that hereafter in the appointment of these commissions it should be done only by authority of law. That is the only reason this bill is here, because we are giving authority of law. We are asking to have these men confirmed by the Senate. Just think of it. They are to lay the foundation for a treaty which involves a course of conduct not only between the Allies of the Entente, but eventually to make a treaty for all of these great powers.

Is it not fair that the legislative branch should be consulted? You say it is without a precedent. Even if it is, the gentleman at the White House is also without a precedent. He is the only President who ever appointed himself on a commission. He is the only man who ever assumed to act for himself on a commission. He is the only man who ever appointed himself on a peace commission and turned down the legislative branch and turned down every other branch of Government and every man of every political faith who did not agree with him in the conference at Paris. It is printed in the record that when the question came up and it was proposed that the parliaments of the several countries, including Great Britain and all the Allies, as well as our own Congress, should be consulted and have something to say about the appointment of the delegates to the assembly and to the council of the league of nations, the President of the United States opposed it, leaving it entirely for the Crowns and the President to make those appointments, and his opposition defeated the right of the legislative branch of the Governments to be consulted, although two members of the commission spoke openly in favor of it. In other words, new conditions impose new duties, and the new condition here is that you have a gentleman in the White House who assumes to act entirely without precedent, just as he has acted in the peace commission; and we are simply saying now that in the selection of these commissioners who are to go out and formulate great political plans and policies of the Government of the United States, involving not only our own country but every other country, the bureau which passes up these names to the President shall have their action reviewed by the Senate of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and fellow members of the committee, in considering this bill I am not troubled about the constitutional question that has been raised and which was so ably argued by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]. If this were the negotiation of a treaty, there would be great force in the position which he has stated, but as I have read this bill it is a bill intended to gather information upon great subjects, which information may become the basis upon which a treaty may be negotiated. There is not a word in this bill providing for this conference as to the making of a treaty. But we are confronted at this day with great and grave questions as to communication through the air and through the sea, and how they shall be regulated to best promote the interests of all nations.

Surely the Congress of the United States may by an act provide a commission that will gather this information, which will become a basis upon which treaties may be negotiated by the President in the appointment of commissioners for that purpose. Read the first section of the act, it is very short:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested and authorized in the name of the Government of the United States to call, in his discretion, an international conference to assemble in Washington, and to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, representatives to participate therein, to consider all international aspects of communication by telegraph, telephone, cable, wireless telephone, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities for international communication on a fair and equitable basis.

Wherein is a single prerogative of the President of the United States invaded by the enactment of that law? Has not Congress the right to gather information in whatever manner it may choose to exercise its power? Is not the subject a big enough one and sufficiently pressing at this time to cause Congress to act and call attention to this subject and ask the President to do what? Why, request the President—most respectfully done—authorize the President—most respectfully worded—in his discretion, to convene this conference in Washington for the purpose of considering this great measure. Surely no man can say that any constitutional right or prerogative is invaded by the adoption of such a law as this. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the point to which attention has been so forcibly called by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is one that is well worthy of our consideration. This conference is either for the preparation of material on which to base a treaty or it is not. If it has nothing to do with international affairs or with the preparation of a treaty, it has something to do with the internal affairs. Of course, however, no one will seriously contend that it has nothing to do with international affairs. Its sole purpose is to consider international communication, whether by wireless, submarine cable, or otherwise, and involving perhaps the use of land telegraphs wholly within the jurisdiction of one Government if they are used in connection with international communication by wireless or cable.

Congress passed a law in 1913 which provided that the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international conference or congress without first having specific authority of law to do so.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. For a question.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Before that law was passed the President could appoint commissioners of any kind.

Mr. TEMPLE. Presidents had been doing so.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Can the gentleman give the reason why that law was passed, why the President's power was curtailed?

Mr. TEMPLE. One of the reasons was that frequently such conferences or congresses were called, and if they were to meet in this country the question arose whether it was not our duty to incur some expense in hospitably entertaining the foreign delegates who accepted the invitation, and also, in sending our own representatives abroad, whether we ought not to pay their expenses or salaries. So it did happen sometimes that invitations extended without authority pretty nearly required Congress to pass appropriations. That was all done previous to the administration of the man who is now President. March 4, 1913, was the day he came in. It was the experience of Congress previous to that time, not in any one administration or in two but in many, that suggested the idea of having Congress assume the authority for such conventions before they were called.

Mr. WELTY. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked him a question?

Mr. TEMPLE. No; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WELTY. Did Congress ever have reason to protest against any appointments of delegates to conferences made by a President other than the fact that expenses were incurred?

Mr. TEMPLE. I have not in mind every case that happened. There were several hundred appointments made. But I do know that the question had arisen whether the President had the right to make such appointments without sending the names of the appointees to the Senate for confirmation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. TEMPLE. The President has recognized the authority of Congress to place this restriction on the calling of these conventions. The Secretary of State called the attention of the President to the law, which, of course, the President knew very well, on September 4, 1919, as follows:

The PRESIDENT:

During the course of the discussions in the council of five, regarding the disposition to be made of German cables, the following agreement was reached:

"The principal and allied and associated powers shall as soon as possible arrange for the convoking of an international congress to consider all international aspects of communication by land telegraphs, cables, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations to the powers concerned with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis."

I learn that the four principal Allies, namely, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, have accepted, in principle, the suggestion to meet in Washington during October next, or at such later date as may be convenient to them, for the purpose of making a study of the entire communications problem in all its aspects, which would include a consideration of the broader activities of the international telegraph and radiotelegraph unions of the interallied radio commission. I am convinced that the proposed conference offers a rare opportunity not only to provide the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis, but to promote world peace, mutual understanding and fellowship arising from a communications system free from special privileges and placing each part of the world in immediate contact with every other part.

The Executive being prohibited by a provision of the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, from extending an invitation of this nature without specific authority of law, I have the honor to request that, should you approve, this matter be laid before Congress for its decision as to whether it will authorize the extension of the formal invitation and will provide the appropriation of $75,000, which it is thought will be required for United States representation in this international conference.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 4, 1919.

On September 10, 1919, the President sent the following communication to Congress:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law to do so," I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the extension of the invitation, and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State with reference to the proposed international conference to be held in Washington during October next, or at such later date as may be convenient to the powers concerned, to consider all international aspects of communication by land telegraphs, cables, and wireless telegraphy and to make recommendations to the powers concerned with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
September 10, 1919.

The President in this letter to the House and Senate asked for the passage of this act.

If we have the right to pass the act, we have the right to refuse to pass it. No man is bound to vote "aye"; he may vote "nay." If we have the right to vote to grant or deny the President's request, then we have the right to put conditions on the granting of that request, whether it has ever been done before or not.

Passing from that point, the question arises as to the authority of the President to appoint persons who are to negotiate treaties or to do work which may be preliminary to the negotiating of treaties. It is true that the minority report as well as the majority report recognizes that there are precedents on both sides of that question.

I think everyone who has examined the matter knows that far more representatives of the United States have been appointed by the President without confirmation by the Senate than have been sent to the Senate for confirmation. That is unquestionably true. Previous to 1815 the opposite was the truth. More had been sent to the Senate for confirmation than had been appointed without the confirmation of the Senate. But in 1815 precedent seemed to strike off in a new direction, but even since that time there have been instances, particularly in 1871, when President Grant sent to the Senate for confirmation the names of our representatives who negotiated the treaty by which the Alabama claims were settled. Also in 1880 President Hayes sent to the Senate for confirmation the names of the plenipotentiaries whom he wished to appoint to negotiate a treaty with China. I wish to call particular attention to a very interesting evidence of controversy between the Senate and the President on the point now under discussion. This controversy occurred when a Republican President was in office. It arose in connection with the treaty of May 22, 1882, between the United States of America and Korea. The treaty was ratified and several reservations were written into the ratifying resolution. The ratifying resolution was adopted January 9, 1883, and contains the following:

Resolved further, That the Senate in advising and consenting to the treaty mentioned in the foregoing resolutions does not admit or acquiesce in any right or constitutional power in the President to authorize or empower any person to negotiate treaties or carry on diplomatic negotiations with any foreign power, unless such person shall have been appointed for such purpose, or clothed with such power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except in the case of the Secretary of State or diplomatic officer appointed by the President to fill a vacancy occurring during the recess of the Senate, and it makes the declaration in order that the means employed in the negotiation of said treaty be not drawn into precedent.

Mr. FLOOD. What is the date of that?

Mr. TEMPLE. May 22, 1882, the treaty between the United States and Korea. It is a very interesting precedent, and it seems to me is exactly in point.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] says that there has never been an act passed by which the President was required to have these appointments confirmed by the Senate. It has been done in certain instances, but he has never been required to do it by Congress.

Mr. TEMPLE. No act of this kind was ever passed previous to March 4, 1913, because there was no provision of law forbidding the President to call such conferences without the consent of Congress. Since March 4, 1913, a few such acts have been passed authorizing the President to call such conferences, and I believe the gentleman is right when he says that no precedents exist for this particular act; but we have not had much opportunity for precedents. We are still in the formative stage, making precedents. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the bill before us, H. R. 9822, introduced by Mr. ROGERS, to authorize the President of the United States to arrange and participate in an international conference to consider questions relating to international communications, is a most important bill. It is one which should redound to the benefit of our Government by giving them more adequate use and control over the cables to the various countries, and their connecting land wires.

From this conference should come, and I believe will come, recommendations which will be embodied in an agreement by which the United States will receive equal benefits. It is a conference which should lead to the establishment of quicker, more direct, and economical communications from the various sections of our country to the cities of the world. It will, no doubt, be attended by experts, men who are highly qualified in telegraph and radio matters, and whose work will be of inestimable benefit to the entire service.

They are to consider all international aspects of communication by telegraph, telephone, cable, wireless telephone, and wireless telegraphy, and make recommendations. This very expression informs us of the magnitude of their undertaking and of the wonderful benefits which should be derived therefrom. It places the nations of the world upon an equal basis in these connections, and will give each equal facilities.

I mention these facts to show you the importance of the measure and why it should not be subject to division among the Members of this House, and particularly among the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee. The amendment inserting "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," which is proposed to the bill, introduces into what should be purely a business matter politics foreign entirely to the bill, and should not be considered for one moment by this House.

I rise particularly to deplore the fact that the Foreign Affairs Committee, which during my membership thereof for the past nine years, under the administrations of President Taft and of President Wilson, has always eschewed politics in its deliberations, that we should at this time endeavor to reflect upon the appointing power of the Nation in these matters, when we are just emerging from the greatest war which the world has ever known. It is bad enough to consider matters from a political standpoint upon the floor of this House when it is essential to do so or beneficial to the respective political parties to do so, but the voters will not approve of it in international matters, and it will prove a boomerang to you Republicans.

It is highly undesirable and dangerous to legislation, a reflection upon the administration, and a check to that international progress which we should make when all the world is more or less unsettled. The people are awaiting the establishment of business relations so that they may again proceed with their usual avocations and that commerce and business may again attain its normal condition and progress and prosperity prevail.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Talking about politics, was it not politics to curtail the right of the President to participate in conferences of this kind without authorization from Congress? If this is politics, was not the act of March 4, 1913, much more politics, when you had a Democratic Congress which passed that act?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] has told you just why that act was passed. The act was passed because certain commissions had been appointed, not by this administration, because this administration came in only at that time, but by previous administrations, and no provision had been made for the expenses of these appointees. Therefore Congress, as a good host, felt, even though appropriations had not been made for them, it should take care of the expense.

Mr. FLOOD. That was simply a warning by Congress that they would not make appropriations unless this was done.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The Presidents before that time had abused that power by calling this sort of conferences.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not agree with the gentleman. I think the reason was just as I have told you: That while Congress had not provided for these commissions, yet they had been appointed, and people coming from foreign countries at the invitation of this country felt that certain of their expenses should be paid. Therefore the Congress thought that it would be best to legislate that no appointments should be made without the consent of Congress and thus correct these misunderstandings.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BEE. These men who are appointed on these commissions are not charged with any governmental responsibility? It is merely a complimentary and courtesy appointment by one Government to another?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly; to talk over these matters and bring in experts and to advise with them and make ready for a treaty upon the subject.

Mr. BEE. But when they are appointed by and with the consent and advice of the Senate they are Government officers; at least, they were before this sort of measure was introduced.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; they do not become Government officers, though that requirement would naturally lead one to suppose so.

The people of this country are growing very tired, indeed, of the manufacture of campaign material. They want this Congress to proceed with legislation beneficial to business and leading as quickly as possible to the wonderful advantages which our country can procure when once again settled down to its usual routine. While our allies are proceeding with the establishment of business relations with our opponents and their agents are spreading throughout those countries establishing business connections, here in America we have been squabbling for lo these many months over the question of ratification of the treaty. What the people want is action. They are demanding less politics and more speed.

Throughout this broad land of ours there is unrest, unsettled conditions; money interests, business interests, and labor interests are wondering when we shall again reach a peaceful basis in fact as well as in law. Here in this House upon the least provocation you intrude political questions. You take a political view of matters which should be dealt with solely from a business and reconstruction standpoint. You delay action by long debates upon questions of which the people are well informed while the conditions of the country demand action.

I remember distinctly when the Speaker of this House argued that the President should call an extra session of Congress by April 1 for the solution of weighty problems upon which will depend our industrial prosperity. He is from an industrial section and knew whereof he spoke. He said the factories of the United States are halting because of the uncertainty of the future and to revive that condition would be the first task of the new Congress. He said, "I believe it will be done with wisdom and fearlessness and that its results will command the approval and confidence of the American people." Our floor leader, Mr. MONDELL, announced on March 4 that the Republicans were ready for the extra session; that appropriations would first be taken up; then would come railroad and shipping legislation; that water power, coal, and oil leasing, and a variety of other measures for the industrial life of the Nation would be enacted.

I ask you to-day, Where, oh, where is this railroad legislation upon which the President asked action by Congress about a year ago? Where are those measures which were to be made with "wisdom and fearlessness and receive the commendation of the American people"? Where is the shipping legislation or the water power, coal, and oil leasing bills? We have spent a very considerable time upon investigations of this, that, and the other; what benefit has been derived from it except to establish in the minds of the American people that through the lavish expenditure of money and the forcing of war work we reached Europe in time with two millions of men to save the war for the Allies?

The budget bill has just been passed, when it could easily have been done early in the extra session, and, before this, been passed by the Senate and approved by the President, thereby giving us its benefits for the next fiscal year.

The food-control bill asked for months ago was passed finally and went to the President only 10 days ago, weeks after it should have reached him, and assisted in the relief of the high-cost conditions of food products.

It was only by the presidential veto that enough funds were obtained for the vocational training and education of disabled soldiers and sailors because of the curtailment by the Republicans.

And thus it is ever delay and politics by the majority in this House because of your antagonism to the President, who is acclaimed by the world one of the greatest men of the world to-day.

I say these things, Mr. Speaker, to show you and to demonstrate the fact that Congress has abundance of work to perform, both in the House and Senate; that the Senate is overcrowded and will find it difficult to take on further operations. To add to the political harangue of this House and additional work to the Senate, it is proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs that we shall, by the amendment submitted, direct that the appointment of the members of this international conference should be ratified by the Senate. The appointment of such commissioners has almost universally been left to the Executive, where the Constitution vested it. Never in the history of our country has a Congress demanded that appointments of this nature first receive the sanction of the Senate. Presidents have in some instances voluntarily submitted them to the Senate, but never has Congress required it to be done.

It has been well said that the common practice has been to make such appointments without the advice and consent of the Senate. Of the 438 appointments of this nature, and usually of greater importance and of far more reaching effect upon the destinies of the Nation, 3 have been appointed by the Secretary of State, 32 have been appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the remainder have been appointed solely by the President.

For 53 years, from 1827 to 1880, the President did not ask consent of the Senate to any such appointments, and since that time it has been quite the practice for the President to make these appointments without consulting the Senate.

James Monroe and William Pinckney, men who stand out in the history of the country, were appointed in 1806 without consent of the Senate to settle all matters between the United States and Great Britain.

John Quincy Adams was appointed by the President in 1820 to conclude with Spain treaty of concession, navigation, commerce, and settlement between the two countries.

In 1821 he was appointed for the same purpose by the President to deal with France.

In 1823 High Nelson was appointed to conclude a treaty with Spain without advice of the Senate.

Henry Clay was appointed in 1825 to conclude a treaty with the Central Republics of America on commerce and navigation by the President.

In 1826 Albert Gallatin was appointed by the President to conclude treaty with Great Britain relative to commerce and boundaries.

In 1827 Henry Clay was appointed by the President to conclude a treaty with the Hanseatic Republics, and again in 1828 to conclude treaty of peace and friendship with Prussia.

In 1828 William Henry Harrison was appointed by the President to conclude treaty of commerce and claims with Colombia.

In 1829 Louis McLane, of Maryland, was appointed by the President to conclude treaty of commerce and navigation with Great Britain.

In 1830 John Randolph, of Roanoke, was appointed by the President to conclude treaty with Russia relative to maritime, war, neutrality, and commerce.

In 1831 Martin Van Buren was appointed by the President to conclude treaty with Great Britain.

In 1836 Louis Cass was appointed by the President to conclude a treaty of commerce with France.

In 1842 Washington Irving was appointed by the President to conclude treaty of commerce and navigation with Spain.

In 1842 Daniel Webster was appointed by the President to conclude treaty of peace, friendship, and commerce with Texas, and likewise in the same year to conclude treaty between United States and Great Britain.

In 1844 John C. Calhoun was appointed by the President to conclude treaty for the annexation of Texas.

In 1853 Edward Everett was appointed by the President to conclude copyright conventions with Great Britain and France.

In 1853 James Gadsden was appointed by the President to conclude extradition treaty with Mexico.

In 1854 August Belmont was appointed by the President to conclude a consular convention with the Netherlands.

In 1861 William H. Seward was appointed by the President to conclude an additional article relative to the desertion of seamen with Denmark. He was again appointed in 1867 to conclude a claims convention with Prussia, and in the same year to conclude a treaty with Russia for cession of territory.

Hamilton Fish was appointed in 1869 by the President to conclude a trade-marks convention with France, and in the same year to extend the ratification of the treaty with Denmark.

In 1870 Daniel E. Sickles was appointed by the President to conclude a claims convention with Spain.

In 1883 Gen. Grant and Trescott were appointed to conclude a treaty of commerce with Mexico, and in 1884 John W. Foster to conclude a treaty of commerce with Spain.

In 1885 Thomas F. Bayard was appointed to conclude an additional article to the convention with Mexico, and again in 1887 to conclude an extradition treaty with Russia.

I merely mention the names of these particular gentlemen as having been appointed by the President without the advice and consent of the Senate, because they are well known by Members of this House and the people of our country, and for the further purpose to show that the matters with which they were to deal were of vast importance and yet were not referred to the Senate for approval.

Since 1887 there have been only three occasions when they were submitted to the Senate, namely:

First international conference on American States. Act of May 4, 1888. (The second, third, and fourth were appointed without the advice and consent of the Senate.)

Conference on Samoan Islands—Berlin. (Convention of Mar. 1, 1889.)

Commission for establishment of international coin or coins. (Commission appointed Jan. 24, 1891.)

Since 1891 there have been no confirmations by the Senate and no question has been asked or raised.

It is manifest, therefore, that it is not only useless but against the general practice—almost the universal practice—not to submit to the Senate, and never by legislation required to be confirmed by the Senate. The public can not but believe that it is merely to further harass the President, and to demonstrate to him that you gentlemen on this side of the House—Republicans—are merely playing politics, even in matters of international affairs.

This conference can be of inestimable benefit. It does not apply solely to our country, but to our Allies, and eventually to the other countries as well, and certainly in matters of conventions of the nations we should not inject the politics of our country.

I sincerely hope this House will rise to the occasion and defeat the proposition, not only for now, but to give a warning that though we may play politics somewhat in matters pertaining to ourselves, we will not extend them to international matters. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time and ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, how does the time now stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. ROGERS. How much has the gentleman from Virginia?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has 26 minutes remaining.

Mr. ROGERS. I suggest that the gentleman from Virginia consume some of his time now. The gentleman has considerable more time unused than I have.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Chairman, with my decided convictions I should fail in my duty if I neglected to record my protest against the amendment made to this bill by the majority members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Profoundly impressed with the discourtesy to the Chief Magistrate of the Republic which the amendment carries with it, whether so intended or otherwise, I have endeavored to ascertain in the brief space of time at my disposal what has been the rule and custom as to such appointments. I think there is no doubt whatever that the advice and consent of the Senate is unnecessary. The President can consult the Senate if he chooses, but it is not incumbent on him to do so. These appointments belong exclusively to the President, and to attempt by legislation to deprive the Executive of the power to make them is entirely without justification.

As has already been stated and as appears from the minority reports from 1792 to 1888, the President without the consent and advice of the Senate made 438 appointments of agents to negotiate and conclude conventions, agreements, and treaties. Three such appointments were made by the Secretary of State and 32 were made by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. For a long period of time no President sought the advice and consent of the Senate in making such appointments.

The appointments provided for in this bill are clearly not of the dignity of those made for the purpose of negotiating treaties, and it is entirely manifest that the consent of the Senate is not required.

Chateaubriand said, "That if the cocked hat and surtout of Napoleon were placed on a stick on the shores of Brest it would cause Europe to run to arms from one end to the other."

It may be said with equal truth that the mention of the name of Woodrow Wilson ever carries terror and affright to many Republicans. Some swear, some curse, some run, and some do all three at the same time. I am at a loss to characterize the sentiment by which they are actuated and controlled. It may be likened to a strange malady or disease which is both contagious and infectious. Many Republican Senators have become its victims. Their long-continued fight upon the league of nations has had a disastrous effect upon the interests of our country. Business enterprises of vast magnitude have been held up and are being paralyzed.

They say this measure, so fraught with importance to the world, is the offspring of the mind of Woodrow Wilson. It would seem that this is the chief reason for their uncompromising hostility to the league of nations. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I trust that the amendment to this bill was not dictated by partisan malice or a desire to minimize the President of the United States.

However, whether so intended or not, the amendment can be fairly and justly construed as a gross discourtesy to him and an infringement upon his executive rights.

If really intended to detract from his great reputation, it will be a disastrous failure.

It is not my purpose here to-day to deliver a eulogy upon the character of Woodrow Wilson.

The record of his life will be his highest and best eulogy.

The influence of exalted thought, of high and humane conceptions never passes away. The words spoken by Woodrow Wilson and his work in behalf not only of our Republic but of weaker nations throughout the world will be transmitted from age to age to generations yet unborn. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the days of party strife have been forgotten, when the fear and jealousy of an illustrious man have perished forever and the events of the epoch in which we live have been recorded by the historian his pages will be enriched by the achievements of Woodrow Wilson, whose name, by the common consent of mankind, will be in the very front rank of those who have preserved civilization for all humanity in the mighty struggle recently brought to an end.

The amendment should be stricken from the bill by the unanimous vote of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a Democratic Congress passed the law, which took effect on the 4th of March, 1913, in which it declared that the policy of this Government was that the President should not be allowed to hold or even to participate in any international convention without the authorization of Congress.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr BROWNE. Wait until I finish my sentence. The reason for that law, I presume—and I am not criticizing it; I think it is one of the best laws the Democrats at that session of Congress passed—was to curtail to some extent the jurisdiction of the President in calling and participating in these conventions which had for their subject matter the discussion of international rights.

Mr. FLOOD rose.

Mr. BROWNE. Not now. Wait until I finish and I will then yield. The President, under the law, as Secretary Lansing says in his letter found in the majority report, can not call this conference without the consent of Congress. Now, I submit that if he must come before the Congress and get the consent of the Congress that Congress has the right to impose a fair and reasonable condition, which is in this case that the delegates to this very important convention shall be confirmed by the Senate. No one objects to the law compelling the confirmation by the Senate of third-class postmasters and many other officers of this kind.

Now, what good reason is there in this case for not saying to the President that before these delegates to this very important convention shall act their appointments shall be confirmed by the United States Senate? In the minority report our friends argue that they are afraid the legislative branch of the Government is going to usurp the power of the Executive. That has not been the tendency under this administration, certainly, and it never has been the tendency in the history of the world. Legislative bodies do not usurp power. Where you find autocracy you find it concentrated in the hands of one man and not in the hands of the many, and you find in countries that have an autocratic form of government that the ruler usurps practically all of the rights of the legislative body.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman think that his statement is borne out by the history of the British Empire?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes; I think that it is.

Mr. CALDWELL. Has not the House of Commons usurped all the functions of the King of England?

Mr. BROWNE. The example which the gentleman cites, of England and the King losing his powers, of course, goes back to the time of King John, when practically all the powers were taken away from the King, not by the House of Commons but by compelling him to sign the Magna Charta, a bill of rights to the people. I hope it will be the same in all these countries that have Kings for rulers. But in any government that pretends to have a legitimate branch elected by the people we find the usurpation always comes from the executive part of the government.

Now, in this case, if the President nominates these men, if they are good representative men they will be confirmed. The 436 precedents quoted in the minority report, where the consent or confirmation of the Senate was not required, all of those cases were in matters of this kind before this law was passed. And to-day, if it was not for the law of March 4, 1913, the President could call this convention and appoint the delegates without coming before Congress and asking permission. But, as I say, by that act of Congress, the act of the 4th of March, 1913, Congress intended to curtail the right of the Executive in calling these conferences, and it certainly has the right, if it has the right to curtail the power of the President in calling the convention, to say whether or not such a convention shall impose reasonable conditions regarding the appointment of delegates. I think this condition that the Senate confirm the appointment of these representatives to this international conference is a very reasonable condition.

Now, I also believe that these delegates appointed to this convention, if they have back of their appointment the other treaty-making branch of the Government, the United States Senate, their position as representatives will be a more dignified one and carry more weight than it would be with just simply the appointment of the Executive alone. I believe if the President instead of having over a thousand people go to Paris, as his advisers, all of his own selection, had called upon the Senate of the United States and allowed it to have been represented at that great conference, we would have had a different proposed league of nations. The President would not have come back with his pocket full of the secret treaties that were promulgated before our entrance into the war as a league covenant, but he would have come back with more of the original 14 points that he had started out with embodied in his league of nations covenant.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am one Member of this House who is going to vote against this resolution, because I am not willing to vote $75,000 out of the Treasury to settle a little dispute over our one-fifth interest in a German cable. Our actions, to the country, speak louder than our words. And there is not a day but that from the floor of this House you hear preachments of economy and retrenchment, and yet when it comes to carrying those words into acts we find nothing in the way of retrenchment, nothing in the way of economy, but extravagant expenditure of public money continued. Surely our Department of State, with its diplomatic corps, with its army of employees, with its hosts of experts, could settle this matter in the usual diplomatic way, without the necessity of wasting this $75,000. Surely our State Department could take these matters of dispute in these questions, which are embraced within the purview of this bill, up with the other countries involved and reach a proper settlement and proper conclusion.

If we had a question involving $50,000 worth of property, I honestly believe you would find a resolution coming to the floor of this House seeking to appropriate $100,000 to settle it. And I think the time has come when we must use good judgment. How are we going to spend $75,000 in this matter and spend it properly? I want to say to this House that if you mean anything by your preachment of economy, let us practice it; and now is the time to begin. I intend at the proper time to offer an amendment to reduce this amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 18 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], labored very greatly in the remarks which he made to the committee in an endeavor to demonstrate to you how very important it is that the amendment proposed by the committee be adopted because of the very serious and the very grave matters which this conference will be called upon to consider. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the chairman did not entertain views of that kind when he introduced his bill into the House. If you will look at the bill you will note that, as originally introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, it contained no provision whatever seeking to place any limitation upon the power of the President to appoint agents or representatives to represent him in the proposed conference, whether its purpose is to make a treaty with foreign powers or simply to carry on negotiations with foreign governments, with regard to international communication.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. BROWNE. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that this bill came from the department and was drawn up in the department?

Mr. CONNALLY. Ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS]. He is the gentleman who introduced the bill. I do not know who gave it to him.

Mr. FLOOD. It came from the department, but not as it is introduced.

Mr. CONNALLY. In other words, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], although he realizes the importance of this matter, did not see fit to put it into this bill until he conferred with somebody on that side of the Chamber, and then all at once they became unduly exercised about the appointments which the President would be called upon to make in case this act should become a law. And the gentleman from Massachusetts, I believe it was—if I am in error, I beg his pardon—stated that in the matter of the treaty which has been concluded between the Allies and Germany in the present war, if the President had submitted the names of the representatives to the peace conference to the Senate for confirmation, the peace treaty would already have been ratified. I am surprised that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], who gives evidence of ability and astuteness, should publicly admit on the floor of this House that the reason to-day why the treaty has not been ratified by the Senate is because a partisan Senate was not allowed to dictate the names of those who should be representatives of the United States at the peace conference in Paris; and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE] made a statement a moment ago somewhat to the same effect, that if the President in carrying on his negotiations with Germany and Austria had permitted the Senate, mind you, to name and pick out some distinguished men to represent the United States at that conference the treaty would have already been ratified.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. BROWNE. Did I not qualify that by saying the President would not have come back with secret treaties in his pocket, but would have come back with the 14 points intact? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I grant you that if the President had allowed the Senate or allowed the Republican side of the House to name Will H. Hays, chairman of the Republican national committee [applause on the Democratic side], and had allowed them to select the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the chairman of the Republican campaign committee, and Senator POINDEXTER, from Pennsylvania, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KNUTSON], to represent this country at the peace conference at Paris, he would have had the treaty at least supported by the majority of the Senate, which consists of Republicans. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen of the House, I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that under the Constitution the President of the United States is empowered——

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. Not at present.

Mr. TEMPLE. Just to correct a misstatement which the gentleman made. The gentleman said that Senator POINDEXTER was from Pennsylvania. Both Senator POINDEXTER and the State of Pennsylvania would be better satisfied, no doubt, to have the RECORD made clear on that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I meant Senator PENROSE. I take it that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] had hardly any doubt as to whom I had in mind.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman mentioned Mr. KNUTSON as of Wisconsin. He is from Minnesota, and Minnesota is very proud to claim him. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. I suggest the propriety of substituting the name of Mr. NEWTON for Mr. KNUTSON. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. If you will read Article II, section 2, of the Constitution, a copy of which is contained in the report of the majority, you will find the authority of the President with reference to foreign affairs. I make the assertion, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that in dealing with foreign governments the President of the United States has absolute power either to negotiate treaties or to carry on any other negotiations looking to treaties by virtue of his own right under the Constitution and absolutely apart and separate from the Senate. The only power that the Constitution vests in the Senate of the United States with reference to treaties is that those treaties must be made with and by the advice and consent of the Senate. But so far as the negotiation of a treaty is concerned, the absolute power rests with the President of the United States; not in Woodrow Wilson, but the President of the United States, whoever he may be. The trouble with gentlemen on the Republican side of this Chamber is that they seem to think that Woodrow Wilson is to be President forever, it would seem. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASON. Are you sure he will not? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. He will not, in my opinion, again be a candidate. The trouble about the gentlemen is that they can not distinguish the office from the individual who occupies it, and they constantly criticize and berate him for every act of himself or his administration, but when he turns upon them they run quivering to cover. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I am no idolater of President Wilson; but I admire and respect his great ability and respect the high office which he occupies. The committee amendment is a palpable affront to the President, and such is its intent and design. It was conceived in bitterness.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the amendment confine it directly to the present President? It is not a general law?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; it is not a general law, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is confined to this particular conference, the delegates to which in all probability must be appointed by the present President?

Mr. CONNALLY. If this conference is put into effect at all, it will be by the present President of the United States.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is probably aimed at the present President's power?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is obvious. The legislation proposed by the committee is simply aimed as a direct thrust at the present President of the United States. It is not a permanent piece of legislation that would refer to all future conferences of this character. It is simply an assertion, "Oh, yes; the President may call the conference, provided, in the face of all precedents, he shall be required to submit all nominations thereto to the Senate."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] admitted a few moments ago on the floor of this House that there is absolutely no precedent whatever for this action by reason of it nowhere ever having been required by law that the President should submit such appointments to the Senate for confirmation. I want to call the attention of the House to some authority which in one day and time had some weight with gentlemen of Republican persuasion. A moment ago I made the assertion that the President in negotiating and initiating treaties was not acting as the agent of the Senate, but acting in his own constitutional right. It is unquestioned.

The Senator from Massachusetts, Senator LODGE, if I have been properly informed, concurs in the view that the President, if he may so desire, in negotiating treaties or carrying on negotiations looking to the ultimate bringing into being of treaties, may personally conduct the negotiations if he sees fit. That proposition will not be denied and can not be successfully denied. If the President can personally conduct negotiations with foreign powers, he may do so through agents of his own choosing. If the Senate has the power to prohibit him, by failure or refusal to confirm his appointees, from performing that function through an agent or agents, he would necessarily be restricted to carrying on those negotiations in person. To require such a course would place a limitation on his power under the Constitution. Senator Spooner, in the Senate of the United States—and, by the way, the shoe was on the other foot then—at the time the Algeciras conference in Spain was under discussion, in setting forth his views of the President's power under the Constitution with reference to this matter, said:

> The words "advice and consent of the Senate" are used in the Constitution with reference to the Senate's participation in the making of a treaty and are well translated by the word "ratification" popularly used in this connection. The President negotiates the treaty, to begin with. He may employ such agencies as he chooses to negotiate the proposed treaty. He may employ the ambassador, if there be one, or a minister or a chargé d'affaires, or he may use a person in private life whom he thinks by his skill or knowledge of the language or people of the country with which he is about to deal is best fitted to negotiate the treaty. He may issue to the agent chosen by him—and neither Congress nor the Senate has any concern as to whom he chooses—such instructions as seem to him wise. He may vary them from day to day. That is his concern. The Senate has no right to demand that he shall unfold to the world or to it, even in executive session, his instructions or the prospect or progress of the negotiation. I said "right." I use that word advisedly in order to illustrate what all men who have studied the subject are willing to concede—that under the Constitution the absolute power of negotiation is in the President and the means of negotiation subject wholly to his will and his judgment. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 6, 1906, p. 2125.)

Senator Spooner further said:

> From the foundation of the Government it has been conceded in practice and in theory that the Constitution vests the power of negotiation and the various phases—and they are multifarious—of the conduct of our foreign relations exclusively in the President. And, Mr. President, he does not exercise that constitutional power, nor can he be made to do it, under the tutelage or guardianship of the Senate or the House or of the Senate and House combined. (Id., p. 2125.)
>
> Mr. President, I do not stop at this moment to cite authorities in support of the proposition that so far as the conduct of our foreign relations is concerned, excluding only the Senate's participation in the making of treaties, the President has the absolute and uncontrolled and uncontrollable authority. (Id., p. 2125.)
>
> Mr. President, it all comes to an entire corroboration by the Senator of the proposition which I made the other day, and which I supposed he had spent some time in attacking, that in the last analysis, so far as the question of constitutional power and constitutional duty is concerned, it is absolutely in the President. He is the sole organ of communication by this Government with foreign governments. At his option he may consult the Senate in advance or he may not. At his option he may send information requested or he may not.
> The Senator is mistaken when he says that all there is upon that subject in the Constitution is that line of the sentence which gives the President the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties. That is not all there is in the Constitution upon which I rely to sustain the proposition that under our system the President is the sole organ of negotiation and of communication between this country and foreign governments. Under the Confederation the Congress was the sole organ; the Congress negotiated treaties and ratified treaties; the Congress received ambassadors and ministers, and the Congress practically sent ambassadors and ministers.
> That was all changed when the Constitution was adopted. (Id., p. 2142.)
> Mr. SPOONER. Could the framers of the Constitution any more clearly have made the President the sole organ of communication between this Government and foreign Governments than they did? Of course, the power to receive an ambassador or a foreign minister implies necessarily the power to determine whether the Government or country from which he comes is independent and entitled to send an ambassador or a minister. So the President is authorized to determine, and he must determine, when he sends an ambassador or a minister to some other country, whether that country is an independent country, a member of the family of nations, entitled to be represented by an ambassador or minister here and entitled to receive an accredited ambassador or minister from this country. When the ambassador or the minister has any communication to make in relation to foreign affairs, he does not make it to the Senate. If it be in the negotiation of a treaty—and most treaties are negotiated here—he has no communication with the Senate. We will not tolerate that ambassadors or ministers or diplomatic agents from other countries shall communicate in any way with the Senate or with the committees of the Senate. (Id., p. 2143.)

There is no possibility of a discussion over the meaning of the word "negotiation." You "negotiate" a contract. Everybody understands what that means. "One of the definitions of the word 'negotiate' is to conclude by bargain, treaty, or agreement" (72 Mass., 423; 22 Ky., Law Reporter, 877; Anderson's Law Dictionary, 706). You negotiate a treaty. That is easily understood. Now, what has the Senate to do with the negotiations of a treaty, including the drafting of a treaty?

It would be nonsense, Mr. President, to talk of the President negotiating a treaty and yet of his not having the absolute power to reduce to writing the terms agreed upon at the end of his negotiation. He must have something to lay before the Senate. Is the signing of the treaty a matter that the Senate has anything to do with? Until the President is through the Senate's function does not begin. (Id., p. 2143.)

But I have a few sentences here from Mr. Jefferson. I do not know whether it will be any "light" to the Senator from South Carolina, but in Mr. Jefferson's Opinion on the Powers of the Senate, a very celebrated document, which he gave at the request of the President, this language was used:

"The transaction of business with foreign nations is executive altogether."

I will read that again:

"The transaction of business," that covers the negotiation of treaties, I should suppose, "the transaction of business with foreign nations is executive altogether. It belongs, then, to the head of that department, except as to such portions of it as are especially submitted to the Senate. Exceptions are to be construed strictly." (Id., p. 2145.)

Senator Spooner was regarded as one of the ablest exponents of the Constitution of Republican faith who ever sat in the Senate in recent times.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the gentleman from Texas also know that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has concurred most heartily in the exposition of the Constitution as given by Senator Spooner?

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the gentleman from Virginia for interrupting me by making that suggestion. As I stated a moment ago, I understood that the views expressed by Senator Spooner have been concurred in by Senator LODGE repeatedly.

Gentlemen of the House, the Senate of the United States, under the Constitution, has no function to perform nor any concern with regard to a treaty until it is laid before the Senate for ratification or rejection.

Article II, section 2, of the Constitution provides that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

Under the above language of the Constitution, even were it true that the conference should propose to draft a treaty, the President would have authority to appoint agents or representatives of his own choosing to represent the Executive in initiating the treaty; since its ratification would depend upon the action of the Senate that body's constitutional function would not be abridged.

If, as has already been pointed out, he may act directly and personally, why can he not perform the same function through his agents or representatives? Indeed it would seem from the very nature of things highly desirable, at least in some instances, that the President be enabled to exercise the greatest freedom in the matter of the choice of his agents. The delicate and confidential nature of negotiations sometimes attending the initiation of treaties would suggest that wisdom of the highest type would not hamper the President in his selection of representatives. Until a treaty is laid before the Senate for its action, it is the work of the President alone. If personally negotiated by him, the last statement can not be gainsaid. In the case of a treaty negotiated by commissioners or plenipotentiaries, it is still the document or instrument of the President. For, when the commissioners or plenipotentiaries report to the President, if he disapprove of the draft he may reject it and decline to submit it to the Senate. On the other hand, if its terms meet his wishes he may adopt the work of his agents and representatives as his own and lay the completed instrument before the Senate. The Constitution nowhere authorizes the making of treaties by commissioners or plenipotentiaries—only the President is authorized so to do, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Commissioners and plenipotentiaries whenever they act perform their duties for and in behalf of the President in his treaty-making capacity and not as agents of the Senate. An instrument negotiated by plenipotentiaries or commissioners is in no sense a treaty until it is approved by the President. If such an instrument were a treaty before its express approval and adoption by the President and subject to validity upon ratification by the Senate, the President could be denied the exercise of his powers with reference to treaty making altogether. Even after submission to the Senate, if ratified by the Senate with an amendment, it is invalid until such amendment shall have been approved by the President (14 Diamond Rings v. U. S., 183 U. S.).

These remarks have been submitted in view of the majority's assumption that the proposed conference may draft a convention or treaty. This assumption is held to be unwarranted, as I shall later point out.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] asserts that the commissioners who will attend this conference will be officers of the United States. I am surprised that the gentleman should have made any such contention. They will simply be delegates to the conference. The avowed purpose of the conference, as you will see if you will read the minority report, is not to draft a treaty, but ultimately it is possible that the results of this conference may form the basis of negotiations looking to future treaties.

The following dialogue occurred in the committee hearings between the chairman [Mr. ROGERS] and a witness:

The CHAIRMAN. It is not contemplated that this conference shall have any power of decision, I take it?

Mr. WALTER S. ROGERS. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. It will simply be a conference to get together and exchange views and make recommendations?

Mr. WALTER S. ROGERS. They will probably draft something that would look like a convention, and that would come back for discussion.

The following excerpt from a letter of the Secretary of State to the acting chairman of the committee [Mr. ROGERS], found on page 9 of the majority report, is quite pertinent:

With reference to your inquiry as to whether delegates should be confirmed by the Senate, I would suggest that it is not customary to stipulate that delegates to the conference shall be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate, and I think it would be wise to omit that stipulation. Even if we expected to negotiate a treaty, it would not, in my opinion, be customary or desirable that the delegates should be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, but it is not the purpose to have the delegates to the International Telegraphic Conference negotiate a treaty, but, rather, by a consideration of the subjects of communication in all its phases in relation to the views held by other Governments, to develop a basis upon which negotiations for an international convention may be undertaken by the regularly constituted agencies of the Government, provided the international regulation of communications shall ultimately be deemed desirable and practicable.

In view of the fact that the majority of the committee bases its contention that it is intended that the conference shall draft a treaty or convention on the testimony of the Secretary of State and Mr. Walter S. Rogers before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, it is believed that the direct and unequivocal denial of such purpose on the part of the Secretary of State and the equally clear denial on the part of Mr. Walter S. Rogers should be sufficient evidence to completely negative the contention of the majority.

For the purposes of this discussion it is immaterial whether the purpose of the conference is to draft a treaty or simply to discuss these matters in a preliminary way. The power of the President in dealing with foreign powers is absolute, except that the treaties which he may conclude, in order to be of validity, must be ratified and confirmed by the Senate.

But this is a conference of whom? It is a conference of representatives of the nations of the world. It is therefore a conference in which the United States will deal with representatives of foreign nations. But in dealing with foreign governments the United States acts through the President. It is therefore apparent that the function the commissioners or representatives to that conference are to exercise is one that belongs solely and unequivocally to the President of the United States. If it is the function of the President alone he should be permitted to perform that function through his own agents. If the conference should, contrary to expectation, draft a treaty it would first have to be submitted to the President, and be by him approved before its submission to the Senate. The Senate's ratification is still required to make it a treaty. The Senate is the final arbiter, and unless two-thirds consent the instrument is no treaty at all, only a "scrap of paper."

The Senate is not concerned with the personality of the men who negotiate the instrument any more than it is concerned with the personality of the typists or draftsmen who perform the physical work of putting it into form. The Senate is only concerned with the substance of the document, not with "who wrote it," but with "what is written there." Its only concern is to determine whether or not the proposed treaty is such a one as promotes the interests of the United States or its citizens and whose obligations may be safely assumed by this Government.

Allow me to call the attention of the committee to the minority report, where will be found a compilation of the precedents in cases of appointments by the President of the United States of commissioners or representatives to negotiate treaties or international agreements. This table covers all of the appointments of that character made from 1792 to 1888.

The total number of persons appointed by the President during this period of time without the concurrence or advice of the Senate or without the express authority of Congress as agents to negotiate and conclude treaties is 438. During the same time 3 were appointed by the Secretary of State. During this entire period there were appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate only 32 such representatives. Even in the 32 cases of such appointments in no instance, so far as I have been able to find, was there any requirement of law that the President should submit his nominations to the Senate. The present bill furnishes the first example in the history of the country where it is sought by law to compel the submission of such nominations to the Senate.

From the table referred to it appears that from 1827 to 1880 no President at any time asked the consent of the Senate to any such appointment. It will be noted that at no time did any of the following Presidents submit to the Senate nominations of this character, to wit: Jackson, Van Buren, Harrison, Tyler, Polk, Taylor, Filmore, Pierce, Buchanan, Lincoln, Johnson, nor Grant.

It may be said that since 1888 the practice has been the same as it was prior to that time. In a very few instances the President has seen fit to ask the advice and consent of the Senate in the selection of commissioners, but in the vast majority of cases these appointments have been made without the advice and consent of the Senate; in fact, in every instance except three, and there have been a great many of such conferences during that time.

But, gentlemen of this committee, it ought to be apparent already that this amendment is proposed by the committee purely for a partisan purpose. I do not believe the gentlemen on the committee on the Republican side of this House will deny that statement, save in public. From the time this session of Congress convened the Republican side of this House has been busy playing politics. Although during the war they paraded these halls and, wrapping the flag about themselves, took pride in the fact that "we are following the President; oh, we are following the President," since the moment that the war ceased they have been criticizing, they have been whining, and they have been objecting to every act of the President, and evidence of that fact has cropped out in this debate.

It cropped out in this debate that this particular bill is not in the minds of the majority of this committee. In several instances here gentlemen of the majority on the floor of the House have adverted to the league of nations. Well, what in the name of common sense has the league of nations to do with the question whether or not we should enact this measure and have this conference? But the Republicans on that side of the Chamber are boiling with wrath. They are angry, and they can not let the opportunity escape them to do something, whether seemly or whether unseemly, to exhibit their resentment and their spite and fear of the President of the United States—President Wilson.

It is asserted that the act of March 4, 1913, was passed by a Democratic Congress, and therefore was a partisan act. My information is that the Senate at that time was Republican. The Senate was not required to pass that measure, and most assuredly would not have passed it had it been designed by the Democratic House as an affront to a Republican President of the United States. Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the President who was then about to come into office was a Democrat and not a Republican, and a Democratic Congress would not likely seek thus to embarrass him without any cause or excuse whatever. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON]. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, this Government of ours is based upon a Constitution providing for three branches of the Government. It certainly was the intention of the fathers who framed the Constitution that there should be cooperation among these different subdivisions of the Government.

Under the Constitution the treaty-making power is vested in the President and one branch of the legislative department, namely, the Senate. Clearly there should be the heartiest cooperation in reference to matters which are under the jurisdiction of the treaty-making power. Yet, when such a measure as this is proposed which seeks to provide such cooperation, the gentlemen on the Democratic side create a great hue and cry about partisanship and the playing of politics. Mr. Chairman, if this be partisanship, I say "make the most of it." Some gentlemen seem to be of the opinion that there ought not to be any partisan lines drawn on any question relating to our foreign relations. In considerable measure this is true, but that does not apply in every instance. A question may arise any time as to a difference in policy affecting our foreign relations. Upon this question men may very easily honestly differ. If men may differ, so may organizations and political parties differ about the wisdom of any policy about to be embarked upon.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who has just closed the debate for the other side, made the statement that the Republicans seem to be apprehensive lest the present occupant of the White House is made the permanent President of the United States. The gentleman is mistaken. Let me remind him that a suggestion to that effect was made upon the floor of this House some weeks ago, but that it did not emanate from this side of the aisle. It did come, however, from another gentleman from Texas. Be that as it may, let me inform the gentleman that the people of the United States speaking in no uncertain terms will take proper and appropriate steps in the year 1920 to prevent any such possibility that the gentleman has suggested. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman does not mean that I made that suggestion.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No. I said another gentleman from Texas.

Now, as to the bill in question. The war brought home to us more than ever before the worth and value of international cable and radio communication. The countries controlling these means of communication not only enjoy increased trade advantages but in addition to that they enjoy the right to control the news that comes over those cables and informs their own nationals of the affairs of the world. Evidence was submitted to the committee that this right and power was used, or rather misused, at times to color events and their significance and also to withhold the publishing of events of significance.

There are four international news agencies that control the gathering and dissemination, so to speak, of the world's news. By a sort of mutual understanding the world is divided into four districts, one district being allotted to each news agency. These agencies use the cable almost exclusively in their work; at least they did so up to the period of the war when radio communication was greatly perfected. These agencies and their territory are as follows:

Associated Press (American): United States and Canada.
Wolff (German): Germany, Scandinavia, and Russia.
Reuter (English): Great Britain and Asia.
Havas (French): Latin Europe, Central and South America.

The control of the German Government over the Wolff agencies was used by them in helping mold public opinion. Undoubtedly some of the other powers did likewise. Some authorities even state that this control had more than a little to do with making possible a great World War.

Whether that is true or not, with the practice in the past before us we now know how important the whole question of international communication is, which is sufficient reason in itself for the calling of this conference.

Germany previous to the war controlled five international cables. All of these were cut by the British Navy, even those running from one neutral nation to another, thereby raising a new international question which up to this time has not yet been covered by international law or treaty.

The peace conference has turned over these five cables to Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and America, the so-called "Big Five." These powers now hold and control them jointly. It is my understanding that this proposed conference will sit and determine what, in its judgment, should be done in reference to the permanent disposition and control of these cables. It is the plan to have the recommendations of this conference embodied eventually in a convention or treaty. In a somewhat similar manner the Postal Union was brought about upon the initiation of this country.

The bill provides for a small appropriation to pay for the salaries of delegates, experts, clerical help, and other incidental expenses. With the magnitude of the problem involved the conference may last weeks, and possibly months.

It would seem, therefore, there is no question about the wisdom of the United States participating in such a conference, to be called by the President at his discretion. Yet my good Democratic friends are objecting because we have provided that the representatives or delegates of the United States to this conference shall be appointed by the President "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." They object to the clause providing for confirmation by the Senate and urge that the proviso is unconstitutional, as it encroaches upon the constitutional powers of the Chief Executive.

Let us see. Article II, section 2, of the Constitution provides:

He shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the departments.

In the early history of our country it was quite common for the President to nominate treaty commissioners and send them to the Senate for confirmation. The commissioners representing the United States in the treaty of Ghent were so nominated and confirmed. The gentleman from Virginia mentions this as the only instance where peace commissioners were confirmed by the Senate. That is true. Yet it must be considered that after the adoption of the Constitution there have only been three or four instances where we have required peace commissioners. He refers to the Spanish-American War and the treaty of peace following it, and President McKinley's failure to submit the commissioners for confirmation. In that connection, it must be borne in mind that President McKinley was always in close touch and communication with the Senate and that he appointed on that commission two Senators. There are, therefore, only three instances, one of which refers to the present war and the treaty of Paris.

Following the disputes with Great Britain growing out of our Civil War, resulting in the so-called "Alabama claims" and the treaty of Geneva, it will be remembered that President Grant submitted the names of his commissioners to the Senate for confirmation.

There would seem, therefore, to be ample precedents.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. BEE. Are these men who are to be appointed to these functions in any way officers of the Government of the United States? Is the Government of the United States bound by what they do? If not, what has the Senate got to do with any advice and consent as to their appointment unless they are officers?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do not know whether they have the power legally to bind the United States or not.

Mr. BEE. The gentleman knows they have no such power.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Let me answer the gentleman. I do know this, that gentlemen who sit in an international conference, who represent the United States in an important proceeding, have the power to commit the United States to a course of procedure to such an extent that after we have been so committed in good faith and morals it is difficult to get back to the point from whence we started. I will say to the gentleman that my authority for this is none other than the President of the United States. I quote from his book entitled "Constitutional Government in the United States," being a series of lectures delivered to the students of Princeton University in the year 1908:

One of the greatest of the President's powers I have not yet spoken of at all; his control, which is very absolute, of the foreign relations of the Nation. The initiative in foreign affairs which the President possesses, without any restriction whatever, is virtually the power to control them absolutely. The President can not conclude a treaty with a foreign power without the consent of the Senate, but he may guide every step of diplomacy, and to guide diplomacy is to determine what treaties must be made if the faith and prestige of the Government are to be maintained. He need to disclose no step of negotiation until it is complete, and when in any critical matter it is completed the Government is virtually committed. Whatever its disinclination, the Senate may feel itself committed also.

The President herein admits that constitutionally the Senate has coordinate power with the Executive in treaty making, but he says that by the Executive so using his power as the initiative he can thereby prevent the Senate from performing its constitutional function. Of course, that it true. The House of Representatives, with a similar disregard of the rights of other branches of the Government, can absolutely compel other branches to cease from functioning by withholding appropriations, but certainly no Member of this House would ever advocate the doing of any such thing.

The President, however, has put into force and effect the very principles which as a professor he enunciated.

Gentlemen, in that way the representatives of this conference can commit the United States, and if for no other reason than that I say to you that the appointees to this most important conference should be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. For a short question.

Mr. BEE. Is it not true that your chairman stated in the committee, on page 2 of the report, that it is not contemplated that this conference shall have any power of decision whatever? Then why are you talking about this binding anybody?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am talking about the representatives to this conference so dealing with the rights of the nations of the earth that they can in important critical situations really commit that conference and our representatives to ideas that the rest of the people of the United States do not share.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I can not; I have not the time.

At the close of the Great War there were great questions to be settled requiring the best thought of the Nation. Did the President follow the example of Washington, John Adams, Jefferson, Madison, John Quincy Adams, Grant, and McKinley? No; he did not seek the advice and consent of the Senate relating to the appointment of peace commissioners.

Upon his return to this country with the draft of the league of nations covenant, and immediately preceding his going abroad the second time, he sought to put into practice this alleged arbitrary power of the Executive as to foreign relations. He found differences of opinion as to the wisdom of the league of nations covenant among Members of the Senate and among his countrymen.

He said that those who questioned the wisdom of certain provisions displayed "comprehensive ignorance of the state of the world," and that it was the duty of such persons to accept the obligations put upon the United States in the treaty "without counting the cost." To those who suggested separating the covenant from the treaty of peace he said, in substance, that when he returned with the treaty the league of nations covenant would be so closely interwoven with the treaty of peace that the two would be inseparable.

He went back to Europe, and as the "initiative," "guided diplomacy," disclosing "no step of the negotiations until it was completed," and "virtually committed" the country.

It would seem, therefore, that with the present Executive having this conception of his powers it is a wise precaution to provide for confirmation as the committee has suggested.

Then there should be coordination between these two treaty-making bodies. In the same work that I have just quoted from the President in that connection, in referring to the powers of the Senate, says——

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, let me say that the statute of limitations has run against that monumental work. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The author had no idea of becoming President when he wrote those lines.

There can be little doubt in the mind of anyone who has carefully studied the plans and opinions of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 that the relations of the President and the Senate were intended to be very much more intimate than they have been; that it was expected that the Senate would give the President its advice and consent in respect of appointments and treaties in the spirit of an executive council associated with him upon terms of confidential cooperation rather than in the spirit of an independent branch of the Government, jealous lest he should in the least particular attempt to govern its judgment or infringe upon its prerogative.

* * * * * * *

But there is another course which the President may follow, and which one or two Presidents of unusual political sagacity have followed, with the satisfactory results that were to have been expected. He may himself be less stiff and offish, may himself act in the true spirit of the Constitution and establish intimate relations of confidence with the Senate on his own initiative, not carrying his plans to completion, and then laying them in final form before the Senate to be accepted or rejected, but keeping himself in confidential communication with the leaders of the Senate while his plans are in course, when their advice will be of service to him, and his information of the greatest service to them, in order that there may be veritable counsel and a real accommodation of views instead of a final challenge and contest. The policy which has made rivals of the President and Senate has shown itself in the President as often as in the Senate, and if the Constitution did, indeed, intend that the Senate should in such matters be an executive council it is not only the privilege of the President to treat it as such, it is also his best policy and his plain duty. As it is now, the President and the Senate are apt to deal with each other with the formality and punctilio of powers united by no common tie except the vague common tie of public interest, but it is within their choice to change the whole temper of affairs in such matters and to exhibit the true spirit of the Constitution by coming into intimate relations of mutual confidence, by a change of attitude which can perhaps be effected more easily upon the initiative of the President than upon the initiative of the Senate.

The adoption of the committee amendment "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" will work for that harmony that the author has referred to as so desirable. Furthermore, we can feel certain that if such a practice is followed out in the future men like Dr. Herron and Lincoln Steffens may receive nominations to represent the United States in Russia or elsewhere, but they can not get confirmation so as to proceed on their duties. But to sum it all up, the President's own conception of his powers is reason enough for supporting the amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired; all time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested and authorized in the name of the Government of the United States to call, in his discretion, an international conference to assemble in Washington, and to appoint representatives to participate therein, to consider all international aspects of communication by telegraph, telephone, cable, wireless telephone, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities for international communication on a fair and equitable basis.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the committee amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the committee amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not an amendment seeking to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause a preferential amendment which comes in before every other amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. It has been so held by numerous Chairmen.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "appoint," insert the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the entire general debate has been focused on this amendment I do not care to consume any further time, and I will yield the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I make the point of order that the amendment is not preferential; that perfecting amendments will come in first.

Mr. BLANTON. My amendment seeks to strike out all after the enacting clause. I submit to the Chair that under the holdings of various Chairmen it has been held to be preferential.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that the gentleman's amendment is not in order at this time until the perfecting amendments have been considered. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, just a few words in support of the committee amendment. One gentleman in referring to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] said that that gentleman had admitted that there was no law requiring the confirmation of such nominees. If the gentleman will substitute the word "statute" for "law," I believe he will have quoted the gentleman from Pennsylvania substantially correct.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania did admit that there was no statute requiring the confirmation of such appointments. Why is there no statute? Because we have a higher law covering the same subject matter. Subsection 2 of section 2 of Article II of the Constitution, defining the powers of the President, provides:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

Are these appointees to be officers of the United States? If they are not, then why are we considering the matter here? They are representatives of the Government in a very important matter; they are to be appointed by the President under a law that we are now considering, and it seems to me that unless some other provision of law has been made, they should be confirmed by the Senate. No statute is required if the President should send in their names. The Constitution itself provides for it if they are officers.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Not now. It is true there has been a line of precedents by which such representatives have been appointed and not confirmed by the Senate. That is not denied, but the Constitution has never been amended in that respect, and stands to-day as the fundamental law of the land.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. TILSON. Not now. The constitutional requirement is that officers appointed by the President shall be confirmed by the Senate, unless otherwise provided by law, and it is agreed that these appointees have not been otherwise provided for by law. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. If that is true, and the Constitution makes it necessary for them to be confirmed by the Senate, why write this statute? It is not higher than the Constitution. Why do you want to pass a law which requires the President to do a thing which you say the Constitution requires him to do?

Mr. TILSON. Because there has been a long line of precedents——

Mr. CARAWAY. But they do not abrogate the Constitution.

Mr. TILSON. In which appointments have been made without confirmation, on the theory that they were not officers, and then there have been instances where Presidents themselves have taken very liberal views of what is permitted under the Constitution.

Regardless of whether there have been precedents since the law of March 4, 1913, was enacted, requiring that conferences of this kind shall be provided for by law before the President may call them, we should now make a precedent by enacting a law consonant with the provisions of the Constitution requiring that such officers shall be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And there was no precedent for the law of March 4, 1913, either, was there?

Mr. TILSON. No; and we do not need a precedent now. We need to make precedents sometimes, and this is one of those occasions. All this talk about its being for partisan reasons is piffle. What this amendment provides should be the law all of the time, and I for one am willing to write it into the statute law of the land, so that it shall hereafter bind Presidents, whether they be Democratic or Republican.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by myself and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by himself and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think we have here an opportunity for the legislative department to assert itself and its proper functions in Government. I am not enamored, as I think many Members of the House are not, of the personnel of many of the commissions that have been appointed. I shall not enter into detail, but unfortunately the personnel of some of the agents that represented us in very difficult and sensitive situations in Europe in that socialistic conference do not reflect much credit upon the appointing power. I undertake to say that many of those men, if their appointment had been sent to the Senate and a thorough investigation of the principles that they had previously advocated been had, together with a thorough analysis of their life history, they never could have gotten by. Many of those appointments are a standing disgrace to the moral integrity of representative men.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I can not yield.

Mr. RUBEY. For just one question?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I can not yield. As a matter of fact, in another body attention has been called to the fact that men with utterly visionary and dangerous principles have been appointed upon one of the most important commissions in this country. I have no doubt but that charge will be sustained, and why any man should object here to the Senate acting as a censor on the fitness of men who are to represent the Government of the United States in foreign affairs I can not understand. It will not be long until a Republican President will have to make these appointments [applause on Republican side], and whether Republican or Democratic, there has been much talk in this body with regard to the Legislature assuming its proper functions. Now and here is an excellent opportunity for men to assert themselves upon that point. Indeed, I am constrained to believe that, as much as in any other possible situation, the determining factors in setting us toward certain definite currents are the appointment of men upon these various commissions. Of course, if a man believes that whoever may be elected President, because of his high office and because of the confidence that the people have expressed in him, he should be trusted to the uttermost, that his wisdom and the wisdom of those who advise him is superior to that of the body of men elected in the Senate, then I can see how he might vote against this provision.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the best way to determine whether one is sincere in advocating this measure or whether he is playing politics, I take it, is to read the amendment itself. The gentleman who has just left the floor expressed the belief that after awhile a Republican President would be making these nominations, and that this would govern him also. Well, I never knew the gentleman to pose as a wit before, but I judge he said that as a witticism. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And to show you they do not intend to let this amendment hamper a Republican President—should the people be so unwise as to elect one—they do not say hereafter these appointments shall be made "by and with the consent of the Senate," but they limit it to this delegation that is to be appointed under this particular act. Therefore, when you pretend you are wanting to limit the appointive power of some future Republican President—if the country should be so unfortunate as ever to have one—you know you are not doing it by this act; and, to say the least of it, you are not entirely candid in pretending this act will bind future Presidents. And the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] said you did not need an act of this kind for that purpose, because the Constitution itself requires this class of appointees to be confirmed by the Senate. Well, I want to say this in all seriousness: While I am not surprised at anything a Republican does, unless it is something patriotic—and I have not been so very often surprised by his doing that—I am surprised to hear a Republican in this Chamber say he wants to pass an act of Congress to strengthen the Constitution. That may be good reasoning in Connecticut. It would not pass as such anywhere else in the world. To say that the Constitution requires the President to submit these appointees for confirmation by the Senate, yet in order that he shall abide by the Constitution we will by act of Congress call his attention to it is an absurdity. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Another gentleman cited the President's book on Congressional Government, and quoted Mr. Wilson as having said that under certain circumstances the President and the Senate should be in the closest confidential relations. That was some time ago.

Why, I remember the most distinguished Republican that has been elected President of these United States since I can remember said not a great while ago he "would not trust the Constitution overnight" with this very body you now want to confirm these nominations. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And he knew them. He had been President when some of them were new then in the Senate.

I understood the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] to be complaining about the representatives this Government recently sent to Russia. He said their selection was so bad that if their lives had been inquired into they would not have been sent. Why, bless your soul, an ex-Secretary of State appointed by a former Republican President of the United States, was this representative. If there is anything so bad in his life, he ought not to have been appointed by a Republican President to any office. I think people are going to inquire into the lives of Republicans—not their private life but public acts and utterances on questions that now concern not only this Government but all the peoples of the earth—and then are not going "to appoint" them to any office next November year. If the gentleman refers not to the special representative of this Government who was sent by the President—Mr. Root—he must refer to the other men who were sent—of the Trade Commission—because there were only two sent, and those from the Trade Commission were confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, I will yield; I will do what the gentleman would not do for others; I will yield.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I said the associates sent——

Mr. CARAWAY. The gentleman did not say associates. The gentleman said representatives, whatever the gentleman meant to say——

Mr. FAIRFIELD. They were representatives of the Government, appointed by the President——

Mr. CARAWAY. What are their names?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Appointed by the President.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who was it?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Dr. Herndon—some one here suggested Herron—no, Dr. Herron.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, the gentleman came mighty near it, however.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, of course; yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The appointment smells so overnight; and I do not wonder the gentleman wanted to indicate to this Congress that I meant Mr. Root.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, I did not want to indicate the gentleman meant anything. I think the gentleman's speech was made without any thought on any question, and I think everybody knew that. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I have sent to get a document from which I desire to read, and as soon as it comes I will be ready; but I am not prepared now.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman from Virginia proceed?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] contended that under the Constitution the President is required to submit these nominations to the Senate. Well, of course, as suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas, if that is true, then it is child's play to put an act of Congress on the statute books in an attempt to strengthen the Constitution. The fact of the business is this: These commissioners and represenatives of the President in dealing with foreign governments or in negotiating treaties are not officers under the Constitution at all. They are not officers within the meaning of the Constitution, section 2, article 2—they are simply representatives of the President; they are his agents and servants for the purpose of conducting a negotiation with foreign powers.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman draw a distinction between a representative to negotiate a treaty, which I agree with the gentleman, and appointments of this kind, which are not to negotiate a treaty at all and are given no power to negotiate a treaty?

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] has not read the minority report.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman will.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] contends that that is the very purpose. We deny it. The gentleman from Massachusetts contends that the real importance of this matter is that this conference will perhaps draft a treaty. It does not make any difference whether they draft a treaty or not. It is a conference in which the United States confers with foreign governments, and when it does so it is bound to act through the Executive, who under the Constitution is empowered to carry on such negotiations.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Are these items of such importance that the President is required to have authority from Congress to make them?

Mr. CONNALLY. None whatever, except by the act of March 13.

Mr. FLOOD. That did not require it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know it did not. The President could have appointed them heretofore and could have called this conference without any legislative act. But the act of March 13 was passed, which said he should not call any of these conferences without the will of the Congress, but even the act of 1913 did not undertake to dictate to the President how he should appoint his representatives. In all the history of the Republic the President, under the Constitution, has had the power to appoint delegates to conferences of this character and of other character without referring the matter to the Senate at all.

The gentleman refers to the appointment of Mr. Root to Russia. He is a distinguished ex-Secretary of State, and I am surprised that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] should have complained about that matter. It is not the fault of the President that Mr. Root failed in his Russian mission. The President appointed another distinguished Republican to the conference at Paris, Mr. Henry White, a distinguished ex-diplomat of the United States, but after he got to Paris it would have taken a detective and a microscope to find him.

Mr. WALSH. If these are not such appointments as require the authority of Congress to make, what is the necessity of passing an act for them?

Mr. CONNALLY. Because the bill contains an appropriation to pay the expenses of these delegates. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that a great many appropriations we are passing here in this Republican House are excessive, but the majority of this committee thinks this bill ought to pass and the minority thinks it ought not to pass, with the committee amendment. Of course, if the bill is passed there will be some expense.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman please name some more distinguished Republicans the President has appointed on some of these important commissions?

Mr. CONNALLY. I can name three Assistant Secretaries of War that the President has appointed during the conduct of the war, and yet ever since the war has ended this House has been making charges and accusations against the War Department, which has been administered, as I understand it, under the direction of the Secretary of War, by three Republican Assistant Secretaries of War.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Do the Assistant Secretaries or the Secretary usually determine the policy?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, well, the policy was to whip Germany, and the Secretary of War determines that. The gentleman knows that the Assistant Secretaries carry out the details, and that the details are what you gentlemen have been complaining and quarreling and fussing about—the details of the administration, and not the great, overshadowing policy of the administration in conducting the war. It was because the Secretary of War did not sell this or that article of property the War Department had on hand; or, if he had sold property, he did not sell it as he should have sold it. Like garrulous and gossiping old women or rheumatic old men, you have found fault and fretted about this and that and the other detail of administration of the department when those very details were matters which the Republican Assistant Secretaries of War were charged with administering. There has been and can be no complaint of the larger policy of winning the war.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I object, in the first place, to a gentleman attempting to put me in the category of insulting the President of the United States. My word was "criticism," and what I wanted to say to him when he would not yield the floor to me was this, that the President of the United States is one man, and that 110,000,000 of American people at the last election criticized him by putting a Republican Congress in this body. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I want to go further. I have not said much in this House, but I can "speak my piece" if I want to. The President of the United States is the servant of the people, and he is no master; and every man in this House not only has the right, but it is his bounden duty, to criticize the President or any other official of this Government——

Mr. KNUTSON. When they need it——

Mr. LAYTON. When they need it. Now, so far as this bill is concerned. I submit that the judgment of this country is to-day that we have a President in the White House who has absolutely assumed more arbitrary power and has infringed more upon the Constitution, deliberately, than any President we ever had. [Applause on the Republican side.] I say that the Constitution of the United States says to him, "You shall take the advice and consent of the Senate in respect to international obligations." It is his duty. And yet in the most momentous crisis that this country ever had, in which we are about to be entangled in a world-wide treaty, with unknown consequences, the President of the United States not only would not advise and consult with the Senate, but insulted them by calling them "pigmy minds." [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I would like the RECORD to show what did take place between the gentleman and myself. I used the word "insulting," and the gentleman said "That is what we intend."

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. FLOOD. I want the colloquy between the gentleman from Delaware and myself read.

The CHAIRMAN. The RECORD will show. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that it is now too late to have the words taken down.

Mr. FLOOD. I asked for it as soon as I could. The gentleman got up and denied that he referred to the word "insulting," and I got up as soon as he sat down and asked to have those words read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly interested in what the past practice of the country has been relative to having confirmed by the Senate American delegates to international conferences upon matters that may lead to agreements and treaties. It may not have been our usual practice in the past. If it has not been, this is a good time to establish that practice. The very great importance of having the Senate confirm the American delegates to any conference, international in character, that may bind or attempt to bind the people of this United States—of permitting the Senate to have some voice and influence in the matter—has been tremendously emphasized by our experience in the last few months. If the Democratic side desires to take the position of centralization, if it desires to take the position of attempting to increase and augment the powers of the Executive as against those of the legislative branch of the Government, well and good. But in the light of the experience of the past few months the Republican side is satisfied and convinced that in the future, whether or no we have done it in the past, every delegate appointed to an international conference to discuss or pass upon matters that may be the subject of negotiation or treaty should be confirmed by the Senate of the United States. It is time we took that position on behalf of the legislative branch of the Government and, through them, on behalf of the American people who elect them. There is nothing in the Constitution bringing in question our right or authority to take this action, and it is not only in harmony to our theory of the balance of authority, it is conducive to wise and harmonious action in connection with our foreign affairs and relations. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, section 2 of Article II of the Constitution provides:

> The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone.

Now, the question is, Has the Congress the power to exercise the right to say that the appointment of the delegates to this international convention shall be by and with the advice and consent and approval of the Senate?

Undoubtedly it has that power and that right. There can be no question about that. It does not matter what the precedents in the past may have been. Every question that comes before us for consideration must be dealt with on its merits at the time. Congress may enact a law authorizing the President to make appointments without the approval of the Senate. It may enact a law to require the President of the United States to obtain the approval of the Senate. That is what we are doing now. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] says that the amendment is not for any good purpose. I deny that statement. The amendment is for the best purpose. It is for the purpose of seeing that men who are qualified and worthy are appointed as delegates to this important international conference. The men so appointed ought to be men of high technical training. They are to deal with a technical subject. It will not do to say that any person would be qualified to fill such a place. No one should be appointed who is not technically trained for the work for which the convention is to be convened.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] says the amendment is not one that we can constitutionally justify. Why, I have just read the provision of the Constitution that justifies it. No one can deny that the Congress can justify the exercise of a power laid down in section 2 of Article II of the Constitution, which makes the Congress the judge of whether the President shall appoint without the consent of the Senate or by and with the consent and approval of the Senate. If the President had the power to make the appointment of these delegates, this bill would not now be before us for consideration. The law of 1913 intervenes, and the fact that that law was passed indicates that the Congress has the power to say to the President, "You shall not make such appointments unless by authority of Congress." That is the authority that the President comes here to seek to-day, and I maintain that it is within the strict letter of the law and the Constitution that we shall exercise such discretion in granting the power to the President to make the appointment as we may think proper under the circumstances. There can be no doubt that in each case the merits of the proposition before us are to be decided upon, and that we can say now that we will require confirmation by the Senate, whereas in the next bill authorizing the President to make appointments we may refuse to say that. That is strictly within our rights, and in exercising our rights to-day we demand that no appointment shall be made except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired. The question is upon the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FLOOD) there were—ayes 132, noes 89.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. ROGERS and Mr. FLOOD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 113, noes 94.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be disbursed under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of State for expenses incidental to the conference.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I would like to add after the word "conference" the words "including personal services and rents in the District of Columbia notwithstanding the provisions of any other act."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I will accept the amendment if the words "and rents" are omitted.

Mr. WALSH. The amendment ought to be reported, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FLOOD: Page 2, line 9, after the word "conference," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following language: "including personal services and rents in the District of Columbia notwithstanding the provisions of any other act."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, my reason for offering this amendment is the fact that there are some laws on the statute books which would prohibit the employment of personal services in the District of Columbia without special authorization of Congress and the renting of any buildings for the purpose of holding this conference without such special authorization in this particular act.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. It was suggested by the Secretary of State in the hearings that probably the Pan American Building could be utilized rent free for the purpose of the conference. As I said a moment ago, I shall be glad to accept the gentleman's amendment if the words "and rents" are omitted therefrom.

Mr. FLOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I modify my amendment by striking out the words "and rents," so that the amendment will read "including personal services in the District of Columbia notwithstanding the provisions of any other act."

Mr. SEARS. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. WALSH. The amendment ought to be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks to have the amendment reported as modified. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered my Mr. FLOOD: Page 2, line 9, after the word "conference," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following language: "including personal services in the District of Columbia notwithstanding the provisions of any other act."

Mr. SEARS. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. ROGERS. It does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. SEARS. Oh, yes; it does. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts why he has changed his attitude from that assumed by the majority the other day when I endeavored to strike out the words "and rents" and the majority side voted to put in the words "and rents"?

Mr. FLOOD. If I understand——

Mr. SEARS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what is the character of the personal services that will be required to be performed in the District of Columbia under the provisions of this act?

Mr. FLOOD. I understand that the most important personal services that will be performed at this conference by the American representatives will not be performed by the delegates necessarily, but by experts in matters of international communication. For instance, we had one of them, a Mr. Rogers, before the committee. I take it, from the vast knowledge he displayed of questions of international communication, that he will have some connection with the conference.

Mr. WALSH. And he expects to be paid for whatever connection he has?

Mr. FLOOD. The experts will be paid, of course. The delegates will probably be paid nothing except their expenses.

Mr. WALSH. Is it expected that the delegates to this conference, which I understand will be assembled in Washington—that is, the delegates representing the United States—will not receive any compensation or salary?

Mr. FLOOD. The Secretary of State said they would receive no salary or very little salary. It has been the custom only to pay their expenses, and I take it that will be the case here; but there will probably be some high-priced experts connected with the conference.

Mr. WALSH. That is, they will be employed by the United States delegates and not by the conference?

Mr. FLOOD. Employed either by the Secretary of State or by the United States delegates—I take it, by the Secretary of State—and paid out of this fund.

Mr. WALSH. And the other nations will pay their own experts?

Mr. FLOOD. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Have we not experts in the State Department so that it will not be necessary to go outside and employ more experts?

Mr. FLOOD. I doubt if we have any in the State Department as efficient as the gentleman I have mentioned. He seemed to have absolute knowledge of the whole situation of international communication. I do not know that they will employ him.

Mr. GOOD. They must have a great many of these experts at the State Department.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know that Mr. Rogers will be employed.

Mr. GOOD. Outside of the employment of Mr. Rogers, have not they experts in the State Department on international communication; and if so, what is the use, when we have experts, paying them an annual salary, of employing some one else outside and paying them $200 or $300 a day?

Mr. FLOOD. I doubt if there are many experts in the State Department.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is Mr. Rogers employed by the Government at this time?

Mr. FLOOD. I think not.

Mr. BLANTON. Does he get any salary from the Government?

Mr. FLOOD. I think not. He was connected with the peace conference; that is, he was rendering service there.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he understands that the entire expense of the United States for the participation in this conference will not exceed $75,000?

Mr. FLOOD. I will ask the chairman of the committee; I was not present in committee when that matter was considered.

Mr. WALSH. I wanted the gentleman's idea—if he had any information.

Mr. FLOOD. My information is that $75,000 will pay the expenses; they may have asked for more.

Mr. WALSH. This will not pay many salaries.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; it will pay the expenses of the conference, the expenses of the delegates, and the expenses of the experts that are employed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, strike out "$75,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I will not take any time in discussing this amendment. If Members of the House want to retrench, they have the opportunity. If they want to keep on in the extravagant expenditure of our money, let them vote down the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to question this expenditure, but I observe in the conference held in 1912 there was an expenditure of $18,850 for entertainment, medals, and badges. It does seem to me that that is an expenditure that during these times ought to be prohibited. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts in charge of the bill if he would have any objection to putting in a provision that no part of this appropriation shall be used for entertainment or the purchase of medals or badges.

Mr. ROGERS. As far as I am concerned, I should be very glad to accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to follow the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] and adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the amendment just adopted insert: "Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used for entertainment or for the purchase of medals or badges."

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. GOOD. I may not know anything about it.

Mr. JUUL. If we vote for the amendment submitted by the gentleman, that will mean that they can not send an automobile to the station for the delegates, or take them to the hotel, or pay for a meal in the name of the United States.

Mr. GOOD. This is entertainment in the way the State Department sometimes entertains. The department has its own automobiles, as have other departments.

Mr. WALSH. Has not the State Department a fund out of which it can entertain visitors and delegates to any convention?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Do I understand that if we desire to buy badges for Members to wear that that would be prohibited by this amendment.

Mr. GOOD. It would be.

Mr. SEARS was recognized.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe for one moment that I can defeat the amendment, for the majority is in control, but I felt some one should congratulate the Committee on Appropriations for the wonderful economical system that that side has started out on, as shown by the amendment just offered. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The other day we refused to cut down appropriations which I believe should have been lowered because the taxpayers are getting tired. I think this great Congress—that is, the majority—ought to put the other nations of the world on notice that when we go there we will expect and get entertainment, but when they come here they may expect nothing at your hands.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I hope that this economical spirit will continue to grow, but in a different way, and in the few minutes allowed me I desire to call the attention of the majority to the fact that the Capital Traction Co. is now about to charge—that is, beginning on the 1st of November—will charge 7 cents for street car fare. I trust the majority will follow up this system of economy and not permit this, and thus save to the people, the employees of the Government, the newspaper reporters, and the thousands of visitors who come to the Capitol, this 2 cents extra in the ride down town and the 2 cents back, and in this connection I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, because I think it is a very valuable report, the report of Mr. Gardiner, one of the Commissioners of the District, clearly setting out his reasons why this should not be permitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes I have remaining, I want to say that I expected some Republican would object to the printing of this valuable report. Of course, it is not very important to the Members who are drawing $7,500 per year and who ride around in fine automobiles, but it is of vital importance to the thousands of Government employees and others residing in the District.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the amendment.

Mr. SEARS. I am talking on economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that the gentleman from Florida is not speaking to the amendment. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, what I say is absolutely germane, because these delegates may want to ride on the street car.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

Mr. SEARS. They may not care to walk.

Mr. MADDEN. I am making the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida will proceed in order.

Mr. SEARS. Is the point of order sustained?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the gentleman was not speaking to the amendment and sustains the point of order. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. SEARS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment will not be adopted, because if it should be adopted, these people who will be invited here will be put to this extra expense, and certainly we should make some appropriation to relieve them of that burden, even though the majority does not care anything about the people of the District of Columbia and of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. SEARS. Oh, I yield to my genial friend from Illinois.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KING. The gentleman is not talking to the amendment. He is talking through his hat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman is speaking to the amendment and that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. SEARS. The Chair rules that I am speaking to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, that statement might be expected, coming from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING]; but not having a hat on, I could not possibly speak through my hat.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the words of the gentleman from Illinois be taken down in which he referred to my colleague as speaking through his hat.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from New York comes too late.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I do not take this seriously. I know that my friends on that side are not economical. I know they care nothing about the extra 2 cents that the people of Washington will have to pay; and in conclusion I want to assure my good friend from Illinois [Mr. KING] that I am not permitted by the rules of the House to wear my hat in the House, and I would not do so, if permitted, because there are ladies in the gallery. Therefore, I am not speaking through my hat, but evidently over the heads of those on the other side, especially as I am making a just appeal on behalf of the people of the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already an amendment pending. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD and Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 86, noes 41.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend, on page 2, line 4, by striking out the figures "$75,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 2, line 4, strike out "$75,000" and insert "$50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 22, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DYER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9822 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the committee amendment, on which a separate vote is demanded, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "appoint," insert the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 125, answered "present" 3, not voting 142, as follows:

YEAS—161.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with Mr. STEELE. He did not vote. I voted "yea," and I would like to withdraw it and answer "present."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair for the day with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. GRAHAM. I voted "nay." I wish to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce myself as being present. I have a pair. I would vote "yea" if I were to vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Page 2, line 4, strike out "$75,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-one members are present, a quorum.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. ROGERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COMPENSATION FOR EMPLOYEES OF THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. STEENERSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, submitted a conference report on House joint resolution 151, to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making appropriation therefor, which was ordered printed under the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Points of order can be reserved at any time after the report is read.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but I ask it now.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXCHANGE OF LEGATION PROPERTY AT BANGKOK, SIAM.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I call up the bill (S. 2250) providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States at Bangkok, Siam.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, calls up the bill S. 2250. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2250, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2250, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2250) providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States at Bangkok, Siam.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, the bill is short. Let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2250) providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State, acting as the agent of the Government of the United States, is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the Government of Siam all title to and interest in that parcel of land located in the city of Bangkok, Siam, on the river Menam Chao Phya, together with the buildings and other appurtenances appertaining thereto, which His Majesty the King of Siam in 1884 presented to the Government of the United States for legation purposes, and to receive in exchange therefor from the Government of Siam title to all that parcel of land and the buildings and other appurtenances appertaining thereto situated on the Klong Poh Yome, in the city of Bangkok, Siam, which the Government of the United States now rents and occupies for legation purposes, together with a certain parcel of land contiguous thereto, the said transfer not to be made until satisfactory title to the property to be acquired by the Government of the United States has been made by the Government of Siam.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I hope to detain the committee only a very few moments for the consideration of this bill, because I think that the propriety of the measure and its usefulness to the United States will quickly become apparent.

In 1884 the Government of Siam presented to the United States a tract of land along the river front of Bangkok for legation purposes. At that time the only means of approaching and leaving Bangkok for commerce and travel was by the river, and consequently the location on the river front was extremely desirable for our legation. Since that time Bangkok has been connected with the sea by railroad and by electric trolley, and therefore the same reason for being on the river front does not now exist.

In 1884 and for some time thereafter all the other legations of foreign Governments were located on the river front. Since that time almost all of them have moved away to higher ground and to a more salubrious climate in other parts of the city. The United States and one or two other Governments are practically the only ones still left on the river front. Our property has gradually worn away by erosion and the building itself has suffered very materially from the inroads of the river.

The result of the change in the neighborhood and of the gradual decay of the property was that in 1913 the legation found it impracticable and perhaps unsafe to occupy the property any longer; so in that year we, too, moved up to the residential neighborhood in the center of the city. But since 1913 we have retained the old property along the river front, first and primarily, because it was a gift from the Government of Siam which we could not in courtesy dispose of, and second, because the question of title entered in and the suggestion was made that we could not give a clear title to any purchaser.

This last year the Government of Siam, seeing our embarrassment and the awkwardness of the situation, agreed to take back that 1884 property, which it could use advantageously for customs purposes, and give us instead the property in the residential quarter of the town which we were already occupying and near where the legations of the other countries were located. The new lot thus proffered is rather more than twice the size of the old lot and in a better locality. The building is better; the property is worth more. We save the rental that we have been paying on it since 1913. We save the expense of keeping a custodian at the old property, which has been necessary since we vacated it six years ago.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what the language in lines 7, 8, and 9 on page 2 means: "Until satisfactory title to the property to be acquired by the Government of the United States has been made by the Government of Siam"? We do not ordinarily speak of making a title. I wondered just what that was intended to mean. Has the title been made?

Mr. ROGERS. I think that is very inartistic language.

Mr. WALSH. It is not only inartistic, but I think it is doubtful whether it means anything.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not think there is very much doubt that the intent of the language would be deemed to be accomplished by the word used.

Mr. WALSH. What is that, if I may ask?

Mr. ROGERS. The intent of the language, I take it, is that the title in the new property shall be vested in the United States before we let go to the title to the old property.

Mr. WALSH. It says:

The said transfer not to be made until satisfactory title to the property to be acquired by the Government of the United States has been made by the Government of Siam.

I assume that it means "conveyed."

Mr. ROGERS. I shall offer an amendment, if the gentleman does not care to, striking out the word "made" and substituting the word "conveyed."

Mr. Chairman, if there are no other questions, I will reserve the balance of my time; and if there is no more debate I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia, the ranking member of the minority, desire recognition on the bill?

Mr. FLOOD. I think not, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State, acting as the agent of the Government of the United States, is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the Government of Siam all title to and interest in that parcel of land located in the city of Bangkok, Siam, on the River Menam Chao Phya, together with the buildings and other appurtenances appertaining thereto, which His Majesty the King of Siam, in 1884, presented to the Government of the United States for legation purposes; and to receive in exchange therefor from the Government of Siam title to all that parcel of land and the buildings and other appurtenances appertaining thereto situated on the Klong Poh Yome, in the city of Bangkok, Siam, which the Government of the United States now rents and occupies for legation purposes, together with a certain parcel of land contiguous thereto, the said transfer not to be made until satisfactory title to the property to be acquired by the Government of the United States has been made by the Government of Siam.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "made," in line 8 of page 2, and substituting in lieu thereof the word "conveyed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 2, line 8, after the word "been," strike out the word "made" and insert in lieu thereof the word "conveyed."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman thought how the language would appear in the amendment—"until satisfactory title to the property to be acquired by the Government of the United States has been conveyed by the Government of Siam"?

Mr. ROGERS. I think that is satisfactory. I ask for a vote on it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARD. It seems to me the language is better in the first place, providing for the making of a title and the exchange of property. You do not often hear of conveying a title. You hear of a title you have made good after investigation. The making of the title is that it is made satisfactory to the parties to the conveyance, but the conveyance is the actual deed itself. I assume they have deeds to land in Siam?

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Suppose you insert the words "until the conveyance of a satisfactory title has been made."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is not the word "made" used in the sense of creating a title? The owner can transfer, but the State makes the title.

Mr. GARD. I do not know. I think in Siam the first property we got was from His Majesty the King of Siam, in 1884.

Now, we have a title conveyed by the Government of Siam. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] covers the case better than any language that has heretofore been mentioned.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I offer as a substitute to insert the words "conveyance of."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND of Missouri as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 2, line 7, after the word "until" insert "conveyance of."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if that is the proper language to put in here. Of course, the transfer can not be made until conveyance of title has been made. The only question which arose in my mind was whether the word "made" was proper phraseology to be employed. It would seem to me that the transfer should not be made until satisfactory title to the property to be acquired by the Government has been conveyed by the Government of Siam. Of course, you can convey a title. We speak of it ordinarily as conveying title to property, or deeding title to property.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. It will then read—

Until conveyance of satisfactory title to the property to be acquired by the Government of the United States has been made by the Government of Siam.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, you can not make a transfer until you convey the property.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. That is true, and that would be a conveyance of sufficient title. That is all you intend.

Mr. ROGERS. I think it is pretty clear that the word which is customarily used among lawyers and among laymen is the word "transfer." Therefore, I am inclined to think that the original suggestion of my colleague [Mr. WALSH] is the right one, and that my amendment is the one that ought to prevail.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. ALMON. How would it do to make it read?—

The said transfer not to be made until satisfactory title to the property to be acquired by the Government of the United States has been found satisfactory by the Government of Siam.

Mr. ROGERS. That would just reverse the meaning of the provision.

Mr. WALSH. It is the Government of the United States that has to be satisfied.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (S. 2250) providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROGERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE FIRST DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9205, the first deficiency bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9205, the first deficiency bill, disagree to all Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa, who seeks to have the bill sent to conference, if the House can have any assurance that when the conference report is presented some of these exorbitant increases made in the other branch may perhaps not appear in the report.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. Were these exorbitant increases put on the bill by a Democratic Senate or a Republican Senate?

Mr. MONDELL. They were asked for by a Democratic administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it is time that a Republican House should sit down on them when they ask for extravagant estimates.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that when the conference report is presented I do not believe he will find in the bill any of these very large appropriations put on by the Senate. I am satisfied that the House would never agree to many of these large appropriations which have been put on by the Senate by way of amendment. If it means failure of the deficiency bill to agree to those, I am afraid there will be no deficiency bill.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, some are clearly not deficiencies.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is right; they have no place in a deficiency bill, and I do not believe for a minute that the conferees will seriously ask that they shall be retained in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Reserving the right to object, can the chairman give any idea as to how soon the conferees might agree?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I have not met with the Senators who will be managers on the part of the Senate, and I do not know what their attitude is. I am only anxious that the conferees may get to work at the earliest possible moment, and I assure the gentleman that we will not delay the conference any longer than is necessary.

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, for I have such confidence in the conferees who will be appointed on the part of the House that I do not desire them to give any assurances in advance. I think they ought to go into the conference without instructions. I feel confident, however, that the House expects that the Senate additions to this bill will in a very great measure disappear from it when the conference report is presented. One of the largest items is not a deficiency item at all and has no business on a deficiency bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, everybody who has been here any considerable length of time knows that the House for some unaccountable reason thinks it is under obligation to vote for the previous question on bills, and also to vote for conference reports. Therefore there ought to be some assurance or arrangement by which Members can get a chance to vote on what they consider objectionable items in conference reports; and until Members get out of the delusion that they must vote for every conference report it ought to be the rule to permit the House to have ample time to vote on items and segregate them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. GOOD, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2716. An act to relieve the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of said Thomas H. Hall of the payment of money alleged to have been misappropriated by a clerk in said office; to the Committee on Claims.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 23, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HARRISON, Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. GERRY, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. EDGE, Mr. BORAH, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. ELKINS, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. WATSON, Mr. HARDING, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. KING, and Mr. REED entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to announce the absence on official business of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the absence, as members of the Joint Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are absent on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. He has a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent on account of illness in his family. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ARMENIAN MANDATE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As in legislative session, the Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The communication is as follows:

HOUSE OF BISHOPS,
Detroit, October 18, 1919.

To the PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the following is a true copy of a resolution adopted by the House of Bishops on October 18, 1919:

"Resolved, That the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church assembled in the city of Detroit, respectfully urges upon the President and Senate of the United States the acceptance of a mandate for Armenia, if it be offered this country, as an opportunity for unselfish service in the restoration of the peace of the world, and that the members of this house be urged to press upon their Senators the high privilege of this hard and most necessary task."

Very respectfully, yours,

GEORGE F. NELSON, Secretary.

ROBERT A. MINOR (S. DOC. NO. 141).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a response from the Secretary of War to the Senate resolution with reference to Robert A. Minor, which will be printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 22, 1919.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution, dated October 10, 1919, by the United States Senate, relative to one Robert A. Minor, referring to a previous resolution, dated July 31, 1919, and stating that the Secretary of War had made no report to the Senate on said resolution dated July 31, 1919.

The records of the War Department show that under date of August 14, 1919, a reply was addressed to Hon. George A. Sanderson, Secretary, United States Senate, Washington, D. C., signed by Gen. Peyton C. March, Acting Secretary of War.

This reply quoted a cablegram from Gen. Pershing, dated August 12, 1919, as follows:

"Robert A. Minor arrested in Paris by French authorities because of request British Intelligence Army of the Rhine. Subsequently turned over by the French to American authorities at Coblenz, who investigated his case with a view to trial by military commission. Minor charged with preparing and attempting to circulate a leaflet among American troops in Germany designated to create dissatisfaction. Released without trial for lack of evidence to substantiate charges. Was never accredited correspondent to the American Expeditionary Forces."

The original of this letter was duly mailed from the office of the Chief of Staff on August 14, 1919.

The circumstances incident to Minor's detention in Coblenz were as follows:

Early in February, 1919, a noncommissioned officer attached to the Intelligence Section (G–2), Advanced General Headquarters, American Expeditionary Forces, was sent from Treves to make an investigation of the activities of the German Spartacist group in Dusseldorf, reported to be planning to spread Bolshevik propaganda among the troops of the army of occupation. Representing himself as an American deserter who wished to do all he could for communism, the officer called at the Spartacist office, No. 39 Immermannstrasse, and after a long conversation with the secretary he was accepted as a comrade, though kept under observation for two days. It was explained to him that the main ideal of the Spartacists, like that of their Russian comrades, the Bolshevists, was to bring about a world revolution and the dictatorship of the proletariat, and he was urged to return to the Army and do propaganda work among the Americans. He attended several meetings, at one of which it was decided that he should go back and carry on the work of distributing among the Americans pamphlets which the Spartacists would send over from Dusseldorf. At one of these meetings he met two representatives, an Englishman and American, who introduced themselves as Philip Price and Robert Minor, respectively. Minor stated that he was a cartoonist by profession, formerly on the staff of the New York Call, and that in 1915 and 1916 he had made himself conspicuous through his writings about Russia and other European countries, and in 1917 participated in a publicity campaign in favor of Thomas Mooney and took part in San Francisco in organizing antidraft demonstrations.

At another meeting Minor and Price stated that they had been working together in Russia, printing an English newspaper for the Bolshevik cause, which they had distributed among the British and American troops by aviators.

At a later meeting in the office of Seidel, a Spartacist leader, Minor volunteered, at the request of Meta Filip, a woman at the head of the propaganda work, to prepare a pamphlet for distribution among American troops, and asked informant the following questions:

"Do the American troops still have to drill, and how many hours a day?" "Are the American troops allowed to associate with the German civilian population?" "Do the American soldiers who are being sent home easily get back their old jobs?"

These questions were answered to the effect that soldiers still had to drill five hours a day; that they were not allowed to associate with German civilian population; and that, according to the press, American soldiers were getting back their old jobs, but were not well paid. Minor wrote down the answers and said that he had enough material for a good pamphlet. At the next meeting he presented a typewritten document dealing with these questions, which was read by informant and then given to Meta Filip, who had it printed. Later informant was given about 6,000 copies for distribution among American troops. This pamphlet was entitled "Why American soldiers are in Europe." Minor warned informant to be very careful, as the American Army might have intelligence men in Dusseldorf.

About the 15th of April Minor went to Paris, and was reported to the British intelligence as being active in connection with French socialists interested in the transportation strike then taking place, notably Loriot. The chief of the intelligence section of the British Army on the Rhine went to Paris, and, after consultation with an officer of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, requested the French to arrest Minor. He was taken into custody by the French on June 8 and sent directly to Coblenz under French guard.

Minor made to the French police authorities a long statement constituting a sort of general denial, but refused to sign his name to it, except in the presence of a lawyer or a friend who understood French. The statement taken under the "proces verbal" is accordingly signed only by the police commissioner.

Although Minor was arrested by the French at the instigation of the British, he was given into the custody of the commanding general of the Third Army at Coblenz, and it was suggested by the British on June 14 that he might be tried by an American court, as his offense was directed more against the American than the British Army.

On June 11 Minor was identified by the noncommissioned officer who had made confidential investigations of the Spartacists as the American journalist whom he had met in Dusseldorf.

On June 18, 1919, the assistant chief of staff, G–2, Third Army, American Expeditionary Forces, presented all the facts in Minor's case to the judge advocate, Third Army, and to the officer in charge of civilian affairs. The judge advocate was instructed to prepare charges, and a commission was appointed for his trial by order dated June 20.

The charges served upon Robert Minor as violation of the laws of war contain specifications briefly summarized, as follows:

"1. As an American and a private citizen, he engaged in a campaign of propaganda of and for the purpose of weakening the military power and force of the United States Army and the armies of the Allies, and prepared documents with the object of weakening the morale and fighting efficiency of said forces.

"2. At or near Dusseldorf, Germany, in February, 1919, he composed a certain document and caused 60,000 copies thereof, in the form of a handbill, to be printed and turned over to a member of the Army of the United States for distribution among the soldiers of said Army then within the territory of the German Empire."

Minor was given all possible privileges consistent with his safe custody. Newspapers were allowed him and all mail and telegrams were delivered to him. He was also advised that he might see any person with whom he might desire to talk, and no person was allowed to see him against his will.

On June 23 a telegram was received from the chief of staff, general headquarters, American Expeditionary Force, directing that action be suspended pending further orders. Nothing further was done toward bringing the case to trial, except that a copy of the proposed charges was served upon Minor by the judge advocate, Third Army, June 28. In the meantime the judge advocate, American Expeditionary Forces, and an assistant came to Coblenz to make an investigation of the case, under instructions from the commander in chief, American Expeditionary Forces.

On June 28 the judge advocate, American Expeditionary Forces, submitted a report of his investigations in the form of a memorandum for the commander in chief, American Expeditionary Forces. His conclusions and recommendations are set forth in the following extracts from the report referred to:

"The case against Minor at present amounts to this: He is charged with as serious an offense as a man can commit, but there is only one witness against him—Siegfried. Every effort is being made by the Third Army authorities and by the British at Cologne to obtain corroborating witnesses. There are three persons in the hands of the British and American authorities who, it is believed, can corroborate, more or less, the testimony of Siegfried as to the activities of Minor at Dusseldorf, though it has been impossible as yet to get them to do so. One of them is among the seven undergoing trial by military commission at Cologne, and efforts will be made to get him to tell what he knows as soon as his trial is finished, which will be this week.

I have interviewed Siegfried, the officers of the G–2, and the judge advocate's department at the headquarters of the Third Army, and have, with Col. Mayes, visited the military commission sitting at Cologne, etc. I thoroughly believe Minor to be guilty, but if I were sitting on a court I would not vote guilty on the evidence now available—the testimony of one man only, and that man acting in the character of a detective and informer. If his testimony were substantially corroborated by other witnesses I believe a conviction would be justified. It is desirable, of course, if the man is to be convicted, that the case against him be as strong as possible. An offense that is so serious should, in order to justify conviction by a court and approval by the confirming and reviewing authority, be supported by the strongest proof, and since this is a case in which a dangerous element in the United States has the greatest interest, it had better not be tried at all unless there is proof which fully warrants conviction. An acquittal, a disapproved conviction, or an approved conviction on any thing short of conclusive evidence would be injurious to the cause of good government. It should be known within a week or 10 days at the furthest, I think, whether substantial corroboration of Siegfried's testimony can be had, and if it can I think Minor should be tried. If corroboration can not be had I think it would be better to dismiss the case."

No corroborating evidence having been submitted, on July 5, under orders from general headquarters, American Expeditionary Forces, the assistant chief of staff, G–2, Third Army, American Expeditionary Forces, sent Minor to Paris in charge of an officer, who conducted him from the military prison in Coblenz to the Gare de l'Est in Paris and then gave him the papers which he had received from the assistant chief of staff. This officer was unaware of the identity of his charge or of the nature of the case. This constituted his release.

Shortly after Minor was released important additional information was obtained as to his connection with the propaganda pamphlet in question. The day following his release Meta Filip entered the English occupied zone en route to Coblenz to testify as to Minor's authorship of this pamphlet. In addition to this an intelligence agent sent to Dusseldorf from Coblenz was told by the head of the concern who actually printed these pamphlets that Robert Minor was the man who brought the copy to him, obtained estimates for the printing of same, and who actually directed they be printed. This information was corroborated by another German in the office of the printing establishment. In the month of March an intelligence agent who was stationed in Berlin and was supposed to be a Spartacist was told by Robert Minor that the time was ripe for the spreading of Spartacist propaganda among the American troops of occupation.

Respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. KING. I ask that the communication from the Secretary of War, just handed down by the Vice President, be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA (S. DOC. NO. 142).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $17,000,000 required by the Alaskan Engineering Commission for construction and equipment of the railroad between Seward and Fairbanks, Alaska, fiscal year 1920, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GOOD, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2250) providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9822) to authorize the President of the United States to arrange and participate in an international conference to consider questions relating to international communication, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I send to the desk a telegram and ask that it may be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., October 22, 1919.

Hon. J. S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We have noted with approval your comments as reported in the press on the demands of the coal miners and that you are quoted as stating that the demands would result in an increase in prices to consumers of from $2 to $2.50 per ton. It may interest you to know that the increases in western Washington would amount to from $3.50 to $5, and probably more, per ton. We have in the western part of the State the deepest mines and the most difficult mining conditions in the United States, likewise the highest wage scale. Present costs in western Washington mines run from $3.50 to $5 per ton at the mine. If miners' demands acceded to in full the present cost of production will be doubled in single-shift mines and probably nearly trebled in double-shift mines. Inasmuch as the principal mines are double-shift mines, the physical limitations of which would not permit of increased production on single shift through employment of additional men, the increase in western Washington would undoubtedly average close to $5 per ton and the State's production would be cut from around four and one-half to probably less than 3,000,000 tons per year. Our production, while nominal in comparison with that of the rest of the country, is extremely important to the communities and industries of this State. The demands, if acceded to, would make the cost of coal so high as to be prohibitive, and the result would not only be the closing of important mines but would be disastrous to the State's prosperity. Our contract with district No. 10 of United Mine Workers, which comprise the State of Washington, provides that it will continue for the duration of the war, the same as eastern contracts, but it also contains a clause providing that six weeks prior to the expiration of the contract both parties shall meet to negotiate a new one. The district has not notified us of its intention to consider the present contract as terminating, neither has it asked us to negotiate a new agreement, but this district and its local unions have been ordered by the national to cease work on October 31, and they doubtless intend to do so, irrespective of these provisions of the existing contract. It is such failures on the part of organized labor to fulfill its contract obligations which, as we view it, creates distrust in the minds of employers and leads them to question whether the form of collective bargaining now indorsed by organized labor is the one which will bring industrial peace. Our secretary is now in Washington, and we have asked him to call on you and supply any further information concerning our situation here which may be of value or assistance.

WASHINGTON COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent to have another short telegram, which I send to the desk, read for the further information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DANVILLE, ILL., October 22, 1919.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Miners in this district practically unanimous against strike. The demands advanced by their officials are not supported by the membership of the unions. Thirty hours per week working time would materially reduce the net income of the miners, and for that reason they are opposed to that program. The only individuals that approve of such a program are the wild theorists, who want to reduce working hours without reference to conditions governing the industry. What the miners actually want is the same hours and conditions of employment, with perhaps a slight advance on their wage rate. All other demands have no support among the membership and are made for trading purposes only. Everyone in the industry deeply appreciates your efforts to bring the truth about this question to public attention.

F. E. BUTCHER,
Manager Electric Coal Co.

Mr. ELKINS presented a resolution adopted by the congregation of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, of Fairmont, W. Va., favoring an investigation into recent race riots and mob violence in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Grant and Pendleton Counties, in the State of West Virginia, praying for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, remonstrating against placing the New York Barge Canal under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MCNARY:

A bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. ELKINS:

A bill (S. 3285) granting an increase of pension to Harry B. Robb; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 3286) for an examination to determine location of safe and adequate harbor facilities on Texas coast contiguous to Corpus Christi, Aransas Pass, Port Aransas, and Rockport; and

A bill (S. 3287) for rebuilding of the causeway in Corpus Christi Bay; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HARRISON:

A bill (S. 3289) to authorize the issue to States and Territories and the District of Columbia of rifles, pistols, machine guns, and other property for the equipment of home guards; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 118) to amend a joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on certain mining claims during the year 1919, approved August 15, 1919; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 119) granting to honorably discharged student nurses the $60 bonus allowed by the Government; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PROTECTION OF PUBLIC HEALTH.

Mr. FRANCE submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 14), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee be, and is hereby, created, consisting of three Members of the United States Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, respectively, to make a survey of and report on those activities of the several departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies of the Government of the United States which relates to the protection and promotion of the public health, sanitation, care of the sick and injured, and the collection and dissemination of information relating thereto.

SEC. 2. That such committee is directed and empowered to report to the Congress not later than March 1, 1920—

(a) The statutory powers and duties conferred by the Congress on any department, division, bureau, office, or agency of the United States Government to carry on any work pertaining to the conservation and improvement of the public health, together with any rules and regulations authorized or promulgated thereunder;

(b) The organizations now existing in the Federal Government for the purpose of carrying out these powers and duties, together with the personnel of, appropriations for, and expenditures by each department, division, bureau, office, and agency during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919;

(c) The coordination now existing between said departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies together with any conflicts, overlapping or duplication of powers, duties, functions, organization, and activities;

(d) The cooperation and coordination now existing between the Government of the United States and the government of the several States or extragovernmental agencies for the conservation or improvement of the public health;

(e) Such further information as such committee may deem proper;

(f) Such recommendations as such committee may deem advisable to offer for the improvement of the public health work of the United States Government.

SEC. 3. That such committee be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ experts, deemed necessary by such committee, a clerk and a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before such committee, such stenographer's service to be rendered at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page; the expenses involved in carrying out the provisions of this resolution, one half to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and the other half out of the contingent fund of the House; and that such committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Congress.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. SPENCER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 218), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate resolution No. 42, agreed to June 6, 1919, authorizing the Committee on Claims of the United States Senate to employ an assistant clerk during the present session of Congress be, and the same hereby is, extended and continued in full force and effect during the remainder of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insists upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. UNDERWOOD conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9822. An act to authorize the President of the United States to arrange and participate in an international conference to consider questions relating to international communication was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on amendment numbered 1 reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations on page 19 of the treaty. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 19 insert the following proviso at the end of article 3:

(1): Provided, That when any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, which are also members of the league, the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, with an innocence which does infinite discredit to my experience in this august body, I originally introduced the pending amendment believing it would be acceptable to everybody; that it would find an answering echo in every Senator's bosom; and that, with a unanimity seldom accorded any proposition, it would at once be adopted enthusiastically and with acclaim. I am sorry, indeed, that I so mistook the situation. I fondly believed that in this particular conjuncture an amendment of this character, asserting only a national right, appealing only to the nationalism presumably inherent in every American heart, would spontaneously ignite the fires of common sense; that our normality for a brief period would return to us; and we could see the situation now confronting us and the world exactly as it is.

Perhaps I have wholly mistaken the present situation. I am sure I have mistaken the attitude of some of my brethren. Nevertheless, because originally I offered this amendment, I desire to present very briefly some of the arguments which seem to me all controlling upon the question, and those which should in the American Senate give to the amendment an overwhelming majority.

The design of the amendment is known to all. Its design is simply to give to the Republic of the United States a representation or a vote in the assembly and the council of the league of nations equal to the representation or the vote of Great Britain. It is a design, Mr. President, which I should imagine, under ordinary circumstances and without an irrational international emotionalism, would appeal to every American citizen and particularly to every American Senator.

The design, it was asserted last night in the closing speech upon this subject, was not fully accomplished by the amendment. I listened with great attention to the learned Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] in presenting his objections. I observed that, apparently, in the first part of his address his objection was because there was insufficient vitality to the amendment, but as he proceeded I observed that his objection to the amendment was because it had any vitality at all. I fear that that is the situation with very many of my brethren; that those who declaim loudest against the amendment are not opposed to it because it does not in every aspect accomplish its design, but are opposed to it because it accomplishes any part of the design and any of its purpose at all.

In order that we may sequentially follow the argument let me read the amendment and the corollary of the amendment which was presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. The amendment is, after article 3, to insert:

Provided, That when any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, which are also members of the league, the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league.

I turn now to the corollary of this amendment, found on page 31 of the printed copy of the treaty, which was offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. The two are but part of the same design:

Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

The purpose of the two amendments, of course, was, as far as we could, to give equal representation to the United States in this league with Great Britain, and to make it impossible in questions which might arise between one of the British colonies and the United States for the other members of the British Empire to vote upon any such question. We sought, as I say, so far as we were able, to accomplish these results.

There were various ways in which it was suggested our purpose might be wrought. It was insisted by some that we might by reducing the votes of the British Empire and by according to the British Empire but one vote, that is, one vote for the empire and for all its colonies, accomplish our design; but there were to this particular method objections which seemed to have inherent justice. Particularly in view of the manner in which the league has been fashioned, and of the fact that the status of the colonies had already been fixed, not only by the members of the league but by our President himself to endeavor to eliminate the colonies from the status which has thus been accorded to them and for which they have fought so long, and in which fight they had been successful, might seem to do an injustice to those who had been part of the war, part of the great struggle through which we have just passed, and who have been admitted finally to a particular status within the league, presumably with our consent because under the written declaration of our President.

The argument which has been made by some of the Members of the Senate and by others reduces itself to an absurdity when carried to its logical extent. It has been repeatedly said, not only by Members of the Senate, but I think repeatedly stated in the discussion which has been going on in the country, that it is a matter of no consequence that this voting power, this disproportionableness of the membership in the assembly has been accorded to Great Britain, because after all there is little or nothing that can be done either by the council or by the assembly. It is asserted, on the one hand, that the council has little power and the assembly has none, and that by reason of these facts the vote of Great Britain, six times as great as ours, has no importance in the ultimate deliberations of the league and in its final consummation; but this argument, Mr. President, proves too much. If it is true that there is nothing that can be done by either the council or the assembly, that the vote is of no consequence because it can never be used efficaciously, it follows as a logical conclusion that the league has no vitality and no efficacy, and that we have then a mere pact here which is without power, without vitality, without the ability to accomplish anything of any kind whatsoever.

If that argument, which has been so often made by some who are in this body and some who are without, that the voting power is of no consequence because it can accomplish nothing, is sound, it leads to the irrational and ridiculous conclusion that the league is of no consequence and has no efficacy; and from that you may argue that the league before us is of so little consequence and of no importance and no value.

So we may pass the first of the arguments made against this amendment.

It has been insisted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], in a speech which he made I think upon the 6th day of October, that this amendment would deprive the self-governing colonies of Great Britain of their right in the assembly and of their right in the league; and he delivered an eloquent apostrophe to the sacrifices which had been made by Canada and by the other colonies of Great Britain, and asked whether we desired to take from Canada and from the other self-governing colonies the position which they had earned by their tremendous sacrifices and valiant stand in behalf of humanity and for the life of civilization.

Of course there might be force in the argument of the Senator from North Dakota if there were any foundation for it; but his argument proceeds upon mistake, misapprehension, and misunderstanding. I will not designate it misrepresentation at all, because I do not believe that he or any other Member of this body would indulge in misrepresentation concerning any amendment or concerning any fact within the jurisdiction of the Senate. When he asserts that we would deprive Canada and the self-governing colonies of Great Britain of the high position which they had won through their sacrifices in the war he asserts that which is entirely without foundation, because this amendment preserves to Canada, South Africa, New Zealand, Australia, and even to India, every position acquired by them by virtue of the war and every single attribute that is accorded them under the league of nations. It takes nothing from any colony of Great Britain. It adds to the voting power of the United States to make the voting power of the United States, so far as we are able, equal to the combined voting power of the British Empire and the British Empire's colonies.

It is asserted as well that we have a veto power, and that this veto power of ours will enable us, in any action which hereafter may be taken by the assembly, to protect ourselves and forever to prevent any one of the English-speaking colonies that owe allegiance to Great Britain from acting with a preponderance of power or authority over us. Upon this I will touch in a moment or two; but because of the constant misstatement and the constant misapprehension and the repeated misunderstanding—I do not say misrepresentation—concerning the status of the English colonies, I want to establish beyond the peradventure of a doubt just what that status is; and when we know that status, and that that status is as was asserted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] last night, we may then determine whether we wish to minimize the votes of the British colonies or whether we desire to make our vote equal to that of any other nation on the face of the earth.

In the beginning, Mr. President, I am unable to understand why it is that the twin specters, doubt and fear, accompany us in our desire here to remedy defects in this league of nations, and why it is that there is timidity, hesitation, and halting whenever we seek to do that which we ought to do in behalf of our country. To-day I appeal to a national spirit, it is true. I frankly admit that in standing here upon this amendment I am making what appeal I can to the Senate as a nationalist, as an American, if you please. I am making that appeal, first, because it is my right; secondly, because it is the appeal that has been made in every nation upon the face of the earth to-day in behalf of that particular nation.

Look abroad at every country that is involved in this great scheme. England views it from the standpoint of England's national interest, England's national power, England's national glory, England's national future. France views it from the standpoint of France's progress and France's prosperity and France's greatness. Every nation on the face of the earth, through its statesmen and its representatives, is looking at this great pact with which we are involved and upon this great peace treaty from the nationalistic standpoint. Is it possible that only here in the United States Senate we are denied the right that is conceded to every other nation on earth, that we are denied the viewpoint that every other statesman on the face of the earth has to-day; that we, and we alone, in the United States of America, can not look at this particular treaty and at this pact, the league of nations, and at this amendment, from our standpoint, the standpoint of our Republic; that we can not look at it as Americans alone?

Whence come these times upon which we have fallen to-day, when we must look abroad alone, and, with a mental farsightedness, view all the ills and all the difficulties, all the troubles and all the wars and all the controversies upon the face of the earth, beyond our borders, and that we are denied the right in the United States Senate or in the United States of America to look upon our own Nation and upon our own Nation's honor and its dignity, its position, and its power?

It is from the standpoint alone of our national dignity, our national prestige, our national progress, our national power, our American glory, and our American rights that I am making the appeal to-day in behalf of an amendment that would not have been opposed three years ago when we were mentally normal, and which three years hence, when we have recovered our mental normality again, would never be questioned for a moment either upon the floor of the Senate or in any other part of the United States of America.

I ask for myself and for the Senate just that which is taken by every other nation on earth, that which has been adopted by every man speaking for every other nation on earth. I ask the right to consider this pact and this document and this treaty from our standpoint, our future, and our destiny.

That is what I am seeking. I am seeking only what every other nation on earth has sought and obtained. I am asking only what has been granted every o her nation on earth, and which we, the representatives of this the most powerful nation on earth, are about to deny to the United States of America. I ask only that in this matter we consider this country; that we here, just as France and as England and as Italy and Japan and every other nation on God's footstool have done, considering it from the standpoint of our own country, do what we know to be right concerning the voting power and representation in this league, and that we amend, so far as we are able, the injustice which has been done to our Nation.

Now I desire, for a moment or two, to fix the status of the British colonies. That status was fixed yesterday in the very eloquent address of the Senator from Idaho, but there are one or two additions which I think may be made, and I wish that the RECORD may show clearly just what that status is.

It becomes important not alone to ascertain the position accorded by the peace conference to the colonies of Great Britain, but it becomes important as well in order that we may settle once for all the question whether, in a dispute between a colony of Great Britain and any other country, the other colonies of Great Britain, its remaining votes, will act in the assembly upon that dispute.

I lay it down as an undoubted proposition from the documents in the case and from the evidence at hand, first, that the status of the colonies of Great Britain, fixed by the peace conference, acquiesced in by our country through its President, affirmatively determined, that that status was exactly like that of independent sovereign States, and that, just like separate entities, independent sovereign States, they take their place in the league of nations, and vote exactly as separate entities and independent sovereign States. Secondly, I lay it down as an undoubted proposition flowing from the former and from the determination of the peace conference at Paris, that when it comes to a question of determination in the assembly and the league of nations, every part of the British Empire will vote upon any question there occurring. Only the part, the single fraction, which may be a disputant, will stand aside if interested. All other parts and fractions vote, and thus have a controlling interest, by reason of their preponderance in the voting of the assembly.

Yesterday reference was made to the remarks of Mr. Borden in the Canadian Parliament. I wish to place in the RECORD, not again to weary you with reading, just what transpired in the House of Commons of Canada on the days of September 2 and September 8. I do this in order that we may have chronologically a record of what has transpired in the neighboring country to us, which conclusively establishes the facts for which I contend, and which makes the record one which none can dispute.

I ask leave, without reading, Mr. President, to place in the RECORD, the first and second columns of page 22 of the House of Commons Debates, Official Report, Ottawa, Tuesday, September 2, 1919, for the purpose of establishing the status of the colonies as I have suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

It is desirable to note an important development in constitutional practice respecting the signature of the various treaties concluded at the conference. Hitherto it has been the practice to insert an article or reservation providing for the adhesion of the Dominions. In view of the new position that had been secured and of the part played by Dominion representatives at the peace table we thought this method inappropriate and undesirable in connection with the peace treaty. Accordingly, I proposed that the assent of the King as high contracting party to the various treaties should, in respect of the Dominions, be signified by the signature of the Dominion plenipotentiaries, and that the preamble and other formal parts of the treaties should be drafted accordingly. This proposal was adopted in the form of a memorandum by all the Dominion prime ministers at a meeting which I summoned, and was put forward by me on their behalf to the British Empire delegation, by whom it was accepted. The proposal was subsequently adopted by the conference and the various treaties have been drawn up accordingly so that the Dominions appear therein as signatories, and their concurrence in the treaties is thus given in the same manner as that of other nations.

This important constitutional development involved the issuance by the King, as high contracting party, of full powers to the various Dominion plenipotentiary delegates. In order that such powers issued to the Canadian plenipotentiaries might be based upon formal action of the Canadian Government, an order in council was passed on April 10, 1919, granting the necessary authority. Accordingly I addressed a communication to the prime minister of the United Kingdom requesting that necessary and appropriate steps should be taken to establish the connection between this order in council and the issuance of the full powers by his majesty so that it might formally appear of record that they were issued on the responsibility of the Government of Canada.

The new and definite status of the Dominions at the peace conference is further manifested in the constitution of the league of nations. Since they had enjoyed the same status at the peace conference as that of minor powers, we took the ground that the Dominions should be similarly accepted in the future international relationship contemplated by the league. The league of nations' commission, while inclined to accept this in principle, did not at the outset accept all its implications as was apparent in the first draft of the covenant. This document, however, was professedly tentative. The Dominions' case was pressed, and in the final form as amended and incorporated in the treaty of peace with Germany, the status of the Dominions as to membership and representation in the assembly and council was fully recognized. They are to become members as signatories of the treaty, and the terms of the document make no distinction between them and other signatory members. An official statement as to the true intent and meaning of the provisions of the covenant in that regard was secured by me and is of record in the archives of the peace conference.

* * * * *

So that the Britannic Commonwealth is in itself a community or league of nations, which may serve as an exemplar to that world-wide league of nations which was founded in Paris on the 28th of last June.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Those are the words of the Premier of Canada, Sir Robert Borden. In addition to that I desire to call attention to the House of Commons Debates of September 8, 1919, and to the remarks of Mr. Sifton, a member of the Government, concerning the labor convention, and containing the letter which has been referred to so often, signed by Messrs. Clemenceau, Wilson, and George. I ask leave to insert a portion of the first column on page 89 and the first column on page 90 of these debates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

The leader of the opposition contends that we can take no part in the league of nations. Let me say that Mr. Clemenceau, President Woodrow Wilson, and Mr. Lloyd-George disagree absolutely with the honorable gentleman in that contention. I quote the following:

"The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view, that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article, representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council. We have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view. If there were any doubt it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles of the covenant are not subject to a narrow or technical construction.

"G. CLEMENCEAU.
"WOODROW WILSON.
"D. LLOYD-GEORGE.

"Dated at the Quai d'Orsay, Paris, the 6th day of May, 1919."

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will not stop to read again the letter of the President, Mr. Clemenceau, and Mr. George, but I want to read just a word concerning the labor situation. Mr. Sifton says:

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that for the first time perhaps in my life while I was overseas I assumed the duties of the minister of labor in his absence and took a special interest in this matter. I did this the first day that I saw the report of the International Labor Convention, which was prepared for the purpose of being submitted, without change, to the peace conference. I found that so far as that convention was concerned the gentleman who drafted it thoroughly agreed with the leader of the opposition—they thought that the delegates of the British Government could better look after the labor interests of the Dominion of Canada than we could; and it contained a special clause to the effect that the self-governing dominions should only have certain representation upon that governing body, and under no circumstances could there be any other. So far as I was concerned, Mr. Speaker, although I would have been willing to sacrifice many things in connection with the matter, I said that that was not in the interests of the Dominion of Canada, and that the fight would be kept up until the last minute before I would ever consent to a document of that kind under which the labor men of Canada, who were so proud of their international union, would have to go to the city of Washington on a footing inferior to that of the negroes of Liberia. I kept up the fight, and Sir Robert Borden kept up the fight and made it stronger perhaps, and finally, only the day before the peace treaty was signed, those clauses were struck out and the Dominion received exactly the same recognition in regard to that International Labor Convention that was accorded to any of the 32 allied and associated powers.

It is perfectly plain from these statements of Mr. Sifton and the Premier of Canada, and from the letter of the President, which has been read again and again in evidence here, that the status of the colonies was fixed at the peace conference, and that that status was fixed only after weeks of debate, consideration, discussion, and probably contest, and that when finally it was fixed, the status of the colonies of Great Britain was fixed for the purposes of the league as separate and as independent, sovereign States, with all the rights, the duties, the powers and the obligations appertaining to them that appertain to separate, distinct, and sovereign States.

Not only have we the testimony thus afforded us from Canada, but we have as well Gen. Smuts's statement made to the South African Parliament. I now read a dispatch appearing in the Montreal Daily Star on September 13, and this I wish our friends would follow, for it has been asserted with positiveness and with epithets upon this floor that the British Empire constitutes a whole, and that only as a whole may it vote in this league. It is astounding that such statements should be made with the evidence at hand demonstrating the contrary. I am unable to comprehend that sort of misunderstanding and that sort of misinterpretation. This dispatch is as follows:

In replying to the Nationalists in the House of Assembly, Premier Smuts made a notably important statement on the constitutional relationship of Great Britain and the Dominion, as modified by events of the war period and the decisions of the Versailles conference.

Until last year, he said, Britain ministers had signed all documents and dealt with all matters affecting the Dominions. A change had come in Paris when the Dominion representatives had, on behalf of the King, for the first time signed a great document, the peace treaty. The change was that in the future the representatives of the Dominions would act for the Dominions. The precedent is now laid down for all time.

Premier Smuts said the change was a far-reaching one which would alter the whole base of the British Empire.

Regarding the league of nations it was incorrect to say that in the league the British Empire was a unit. The Empire was a group, but South Africa had exactly the same rights and voice as the United Kingdom. Though the United Kingdom was a permanent member of the central council, South Africa could be elected to that council.

Of course, this is exactly what was determined by the President, Mr. Clemenceau, and Mr. George in their letter to Premier Borden of Canada, and of course if the colonies of Great Britain can be members of the inner council, as well as members of the assembly, then the disproportion in the membership and voting is so obvious and apparent that any man, no matter what may be his viewpoint or the motives actuating him concerning this amendment, can not misunderstand the power thus given to Great Britain and the little power proportionately that is thus given to our own country.

All of those in power and authority now agree that the self-governing colonies of Great Britain have a status in the league of nations equal to that of independent, sovereign States. Not only that, but that they do not constitute a group, but each separate and individual fraction constitutes a separate and independent voting force, with the right, as a separate and independent voting force, to be heard upon any question, to vote upon any question, to act upon any matter in which it and it alone is not interested and is not one of the disputants.

To say, therefore, that it is a matter of no consequence that Great Britain shall have six votes and the United States shall have one is to deny the very facts; is in the face of the admissions that have been made by every government that is concerned in the matter; is in the teeth of the very statement of our President himself; is to insist that that exists which does not exist.

Suppose, Mr. President, that we were sitting here to-day making a league of nations. Suppose that there had been thus far no voting power accorded to any particular country. Assume, for the purposes of the argument, that we were sitting here without over us the terrible pall of internationalism, and without behind us the specter of fear concerning countries beyond the sea. Suppose that we sat here to-day just as Americans, forming a league of nations with all the rest of the world, and some over-zealous friend of Great Britain arose and said, "I move, Mr. President, that India be made a member with exactly the same power in this league as the United States of America."

What would Senators say? Is there any man upon this floor who has the temerity to assert that he would enthusiastically, or at all, adopt the suggestion that India, in the first instance, should be admitted as a member of the league of nations with exactly the same power and the same voting strength in this league that the United States of America has? All the apologies for the power of Great Britain in this league, Mr. President, every argument made, omits India. India does not come at all within the definition of self-governing dominions and colonies as provided in the pact.

India has no more right to be a member of this league than you have to set up an individual in the center of Patagonia and there and then say that he shall be a member of the league. There is nothing in the league itself that permits it for a single instant. There is nothing in reason or in logic that would tolerate it for a single instant. How far have we strayed from the paths of logic, how far have we gone from the path of justice, how obscure is our vision when, to-day, representing this great Nation, we view not only with equanimity but with a tremendous enthusiasm the admission of India into the league of nations with an equal voting power and an equal strength with the United States of America? This instance alone should bring home to us so clearly, unless our mentality has been distorted by the psychological reflex of war, the enormity of the present proposition that argument upon it should be wholly unnecessary.

But assume we go further, and as we sit here as Americans trying to do what is right, endeavoring to do what is just, to all peoples on the face of the earth and all countries, suppose some other individual should arise after we dispose of India, and that we would dispose of India instanter as a member of the league under those circumstances I think no one will question—suppose another arose and said, "Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, Australia have played the man's part, the valiant and the brave part, in this war—Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, and Australia, after all, represent Anglo-Saxon hopes and Anglo-Saxon aspirations; they should be admitted to this league."

You and I would sit and think for a moment. We perhaps would see the justice of it, and say, "Yes, they have done their part; they have done it well; they have made their sacrifices; yes, they may be admitted to the league." But what would you say about their power after they were admitted, even if you determined on the justice of their admission? You would say, "Admit them. Yes, admit them, yes." But being parts of this great empire, being fractions of this country whose drumbeat is heard around the world, who boasts to-day of the annexation of 800,000 square miles as a result of this war, owing their allegiance to their mother country, you would say, "Yes, admit them, but as fractions of this great empire."

In the formation of a league, if there were none of this peculiar pall that hangs over us now as a result of the war, and as a result of what we have seen in the last few months, and what perhaps from propaganda and a political terrorism we have felt, perhaps you would say, "Admit them." But there is not a man upon this floor but would say, "When you admit them, give them altogether with their single allegiance no more power, no greater representation, no higher vote, no more exalted place in this world's forum, than you give to our own country, the United States of America."

Would you not say that in the beginning, even though your sympathies went out to those colonies, and to those colonies you accorded this right? I think that no man will question that if we were standing here forming our league of nations to-day, first we would instanter dispose of India and never permit her to be a member of the league under the circumstances now existing; and, secondly, if we did permit the colonies of Great Britain to become members of the league, there would not be a dissenting voice in this whole Chamber, if we were forming the league, to saying that the United States of America should have a power and a representation and a voting strength in the league equal to the aggregate of the British Empire and its colonies and dominions.

What is it that has changed this viewpoint? If this we had in the beginning, what is it to-day that makes us shrink from doing the same thing now? What is it that holds us back, makes us timid and makes us fear to touch what is a national problem, and to do what we know is a national justice? What, I ask you, is it? Is it a fear of saying to some other country beyond the seas, "We are as great, we are as powerful, we demand equal representation with you"? Is it that? I can not believe it, Mr. President, at all. I can not believe that there is any man in America to-day who will hang his head and place himself voluntarily in a position of subordination, put his nation voluntarily upon a plane lower than that of any other nation on the face of the earth. What is this unholy thing that frightens us now and makes us fear to take for our country what we know is its due?

I appeal to you gentlemen upon this floor, if, in the first instance, you would deal with this pact by making equal representation for the United States with any other country, to-day will you not deal with it in exactly the same fashion, in order that our country may be adequately represented and that we may preserve its prestige, its position, its honor, and its dignity? I ask that to-day we do what we would do in the original instance. I do not think there would be the slightest objection from any nation on the face of the earth, not one. I do not think that from Canada, for whom eloquent appeals are made upon this floor while America is forgotten, would come an objection to this sort of voting power and this kind of representation on behalf of our Nation. In order that you may understand a little of the Canadian public sentiment, I read from an article recently appearing in one of the Canadian papers. Reprinted in the Literary Digest in a late number is this excerpt from the London (Ontario) Free Press:

> The London (Ontario) Free Press mentions a proposal that in order to offset the preponderance of British voting power in the council of the league, the United States should have an equal number of votes, and it avers:
> "There ought to be no difficulty in the matter. Obviously, America is entitled to as large a voice in the league as is the British Empire."

There is only one place on earth where that is denied. It is not denied in Canada, it is not denied in Great Britain, it is not denied in Europe. It is only denied in the United States Senate, and in the United States Senate alone.

This Canadian newspaper asserts:

> Obviously, America is entitled to as large a voice in the league as the British Empire. We want no advantage in the voting strength. Responsibility and voting power go hand in hand. If Washington accepts equal responsibility with Britain, then Washington must have an equal voice in determining the policy and practices of the league. There must be the utmost recognition of national rights in the conduct of the league or it can not continue to exist. Great Britain will not be jealous of any increase in the number of United States votes.

Great Britain will not be jealous of any increase; it is only the United States Senate that is jealous of any increase in the votes of the United States.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. I wonder if the Senator wants to be recorded as saying that only in the Senate is the denial made? I have rather gathered the impression that there are other eminent authorities making the same denial.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am speaking generically, not of individuals, not of personalities. I am speaking within the legitimate limits of a forensic discussion entirely. Of course, I presume the Senator refers to the position occupied by the President. I have no doubt the President takes the position that the Senator from Ohio suggests, but I have no desire in this discussion to indulge in any criticism of individuals. I am speaking generically in all that I say, and I want to make that very, very plain.

It is true that there is another source in this country that wants just this thing. It was a source that I did not intend to speak of and a source to which I did not intend to refer, but there is a propaganda in this country, sir—and I am not speaking of the propaganda of the League to Enforce Peace particularly. There is a propaganda in this country from a certain part of the press that would club and bludgeon Americans to-day into doing exactly what Great Britain and Japan would desire, and that would club and bludgeon them from doing their American duty to-day. Were I to stand here and deliver a panegyric upon these votes of Great Britain, were I to stand here to-day and make an argument as best I could in behalf of the preponderance of voting power of Great Britain, were I to stand here to-day and say that it was a noble thing and a just, a marvelous, a rather remarkable thing, and the only thing that could be tolerated, that the United States should be given one vote and Great Britain six, there is a certain part of the press, the Anglo-Japanese press of this country, that would fill its columns with eulogiums of that which I said. What I say to-day in behalf of Americanism and in behalf of the rights of our country, its national justice and right—that sort of thing finds neither answering echo nor applause in this part of the press of the United States that has devoted itself exclusively in the last few months to propaganda in behalf of Great Britain and Japan.

We may pass that, however. It is a matter of little consequence. With that part of the press, it is a reproach to be an American to-day. With that part of the press, no longer can a man stand here, speaking solely from his heart, for all those things that he thinks should be American and in behalf of America alone, without meeting with abuse and vilification and denunciation from them. That is a part of their present game. This Hall has rung in the past with lofty patriotism. The voices may be stilled of those who have stood in this Chamber in years gone by and spoken for America, but to-day, Mr. President, there should be in this Chamber those who place American nationality first and who speak as they see American national rights to be, who should, notwithstanding an Anglo-Japanese press in this country, notwithstanding any consequences which may flow from their acts, still be American and still voice American sentiment, still stand, as they see it, for American rights and for the justice of America under a league of nations or in any voting trust or voting power, with any other nation on the face of the earth.

I have been fond of using an expression, and I used it a moment ago. Suppose three years ago when, untouched by the anguish of war, some man had come among us and said we should form a partnership with a foreign nation, and that the nation abroad should have six times the voting power and six times the strength of membership that we have in that partnership. For an instant you would not listen to him. If the same thing were to occur three years hence, when we have become normal again mentally, and any man would stand in this Chamber and insist that we should join in a covenant that would give to a foreign nation six times the voting power and strength that we have, you would not permit, for a single instant, his words to have weight with you.

To-day what is there that changes this situation? The bald statement of the proposition none would consent to. If one were to come to you and suggest that in any new arrangement six votes should be given to any foreign country and one to us, you would not listen for a moment. None, I am sure, will gainsay this. What is there that has happened that has lowered our prestige and our dignity and our position and our rights? What is it that has occurred that has taken from us the justice of our high position and has made us subordinate and subject to any other nation in any partnership or in any pact or in any treaty or in any league?

I have read to you the utterances of Canadian and of South African statesmen. The French statesman, M. Leon Bourgeois, who I understand will be a representative of France in the league of nations, recently said:

> We hope that as Great Britain has obtained representation for its dominions and colonies in the assembly, we will obtain the same right. Our colonies were not like her dominions, represented in the conference; they had no voice. But France will obtain in the assembly, we do not doubt, the total representation to which it has every legitimate right.

Thus France will equalize the voting power, and France has not only the league of nations but a separate alliance for her protection.

I could read to you the utterances of Borden concerning the Empire of Great Britain and the empire within the league. He uses exactly the statement—I do not know whether the Senator from Idaho was aware of it or not—that yesterday was used by that Senator. He says in so many words, and here they are in the debates of the House of Commons of Canada, that there will be two leagues, that there will be the league of nations and within it the league of the British Empire. Two leagues under your league of nations, the Premier of Canada says—the league of nations and the league of Great Britain within the league of nations.

Now I am not objecting to that; some of my colleagues certainly do not object to it; but if there be two leagues, the second being the league of Great Britain within the league of nations, upon what theory will you give it the power to split itself into fractions in the ultimate voting upon any question, and say to us that we shall have less power in the league?

There are three distinct reasons why this amendment should be adopted. First, it is right and it is just; secondly, the very self-respect of America demands it; and, thirdly, pride and patriotism command it. All three of these reasons give to us this amendment and should permit us an equal voting power. Do not soothe a perturbed conscience with the idea of a reservation which will adopt in the first instance a wrong and then reserve a protest against the wrong.

You are not going to cure this defect, if defect it be, by reservations to the league covenant and to the treaty. You can not give these six votes to Great Britain, this enormous power to the British Empire, and then, after assenting to it and giving it to Great Britain, by a reservation give yourselves equal power and equal right. The reservation which was submitted, I think, by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] yesterday does not reach the case and does not at all meet the exigencies of the league and the voting preponderance given unto Britain. The only way you can reach it is to give equal power to the United States, so far as you are able to give that equal power to the United States.

I recognize some inherent defects in the amendment which has been proposed, but those inherent defects are not those which make it more drastic or render it unjust at all. Those inherent defects are those which prevent it from going as far as it ought to go. If any Senator upon this floor who objects to the form of the amendment or who says that it does not go to the extent to which it ought to go will vote for the amendment with an amendment correcting what he says is the defect, I will be very glad, for one, to propose such an amendment and to endeavor to have the particular amendment of mine perfected by its addition; but when Senators argue that this amendment does not go far enough, what they mean is that it goes too far for them, and, even if it were amended and went the whole distance that they insist it should go, they would not then be in its favor and would not then vote for it.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] yesterday stated that the whole argument fell because of the requirement of unanimity in action by the council. All now admit what was not admitted until it was developed, I think, by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] upon this floor, that the British colonies may be members of the council, the only body having any vitality according to the proponents of the league; but he says that, though they might be members of the league, there is a veto power existing in the United States concerning their admission, and, therefore, the right that is thus given of eligibility upon the council is a mere naked right and of no consequence at all.

The singular ethics of those who argue for this league, Mr. President, is past my understanding. First, it is said to Canada, for instance, "You may become a member of the league; that is your right; you have gotten it after two months of struggle and of difficulty and of fighting over in Paris; the United States of America grants it to you now." Then, in the next breath, the argument is made that, having granted the right, you can without justice arbitrarily deny it. What kind of ethics is this of the proponents of this great idealistic instrument—the ethics which says, "Yes, it is your right; the circumstances are appropriate; the time is propitious; it is your right to be in the council; and yet without any justice whatever and arbitrarily we are going to deny the right"? No nation on earth could afford to do such a thing any more than an individual could afford to do it. So when the circumstances are appropriate, Canada, South Africa, New Zealand, and Australia will be admitted to the council of the league of nations. They will be admitted because it is their right—their right under the decision of the league at Paris over the very signature of our own President.

Oh, what a reflection there is, my friends, in the fact—how, indeed, it does gall some of us—that, after all, we have had to learn these facts not from our representatives, not, as is our right to know them, in the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, but we have had to learn these facts, not as you would imagine in a democracy the facts would be disclosed, but we have had to learn them from the parliamentary debates of Canada and from Gen. Smuts's statement to the South African Parliament! Oh, what times are these! You can only imagine how this sort of thing can be done without protest, and can be done even with the assent of our people, when you realize our people can contemplate, for even a second, the idea that any other nation in any pact or any agreement has six votes and we have but one. What a sad commentary, Mr. President, it is upon a once great body—with all its past and with all its traditions—upon a once great body that has stood its ground for a century or more for America and for democracy, when to-day it can only learn of what has transpired, that intimately concerns it and that deals with its destiny, through the Canadian Parliament and the proceedings at Cape Town of the South African Union! This is the exact situation now confronting us.

No man in this Nation, apparently, publicly knew anything about the letter sent by the "Big Three" to Borden at Paris concerning the status of the English colonies; nobody in this country, at least publicly, knew anything about the proceedings over there which gave to the British colonies the independent, sovereign rights of separate States to vote in the league of nations. We asked for this information, Mr. President, for you will recall the resolution that went through the Committee on Foreign Relations asking the data and the proceedings at Paris of our representatives and of the peace conference. They were denied to us. We do not now know what transpired there. There is not a Senator upon this floor who has the slightest conception of the commitment in the future of the treasure and the blood of this Nation. There is not a man in the United States, at least publicly declaring it, who has any conception of what is in store for us from treaties yet to come; and in this league of nations, where our sacrifices are greater than those of any other nation, where we, the only one nonprofiting nation out of this war, where we, the unspent democracy from this cataclysm, have pledged our future for the benefit of the world, we to-day are without the knowledge of what transpired at Paris in reference to the pact; we to-day know nothing of the debates or the transactions over there upon which decisions were rendered and upon which our fate may have been sealed.

Oh, it is a sad, sad thing to contemplate, Mr. President, that this body finally is in that condition where it must derive its information upon important subjects and matters dealing with its destiny from the Parliament of Canada and from the Parliament of the Union of South Africa.

Again, Mr. President, not only could we not in good faith arbitrarily and unjustly deny Canada and the colonies of the British Empire a position upon the council, but, in addition to that, as was demonstrated by the Senator from Idaho yesterday, the true construction of the particular provision relating to the four temporary members is that those four temporary members shall be selected by the assembly in accordance with the league covenant and selected by a majority of the assembly. These four temporary members, if you will recall the reading of the pact, are to be chosen from time to time in the discretion of the assembly. It is asserted that the decision that would thus be rendered would require unanimous consent; on the other hand, it was claimed by some that it might be a method of procedure and would not require unanimous consent; but if it is asserted that the selection of these four temporary members will require unanimous consent, then there can never be a selection at all, and the provision that the selection shall be made from time to time in the discretion of the assembly is a mere nugatory provision without any vitality or without any force of any character.

We have learned from the President's letter that this document is to be liberally construed. It could not have been the intent of its framers that these four temporary members of the council who are to be selected from time to time in the discretion of the assembly should be ever permanent, although it is quite possible in the minds of exponents of the league that temporary equals permanent, just as they demonstrated by mental gymnastics and a mathematical paradox that six equals one; and it is possible, Mr. President, that in construing the league covenant the temporary members of the council, the four who are to be selected from time to time in the discretion of the assembly, are permanent members instead of, as described in the document, temporary. Such a construction of course would not surprise us in view of the amazing constructions which have been made concerning 6 equaling 1, and 1 equaling 32, and the like. The Senator from Idaho, however, demonstrated yesterday, and I will not weary you with repetition of his able presentation, that in the first instance these four "temporary" members may be chosen by a majority of the assembly.

But, Mr. President, this question goes further than the mere right or the mere justice of it. Its logic can not be denied; the right of it can not be questioned; its justice can not be gainsaid; and, as a matter of right and as a matter of justice, we should, so far as we are able to accomplish the purpose by amendment, have equal voting power and equal representation with any other country on the face of the earth.

But there is something beyond that, Mr. President. God put in every man's breast something beside a mere internationalism or a mere world vision far beyond his country's confines. I may cherish my neighbor, but my love after all is in my little home with my family. I may, indeed, have an admiration and an enthusiasm for another country, but after all God put in my heart, just as he put in the hearts of most men, a love for my native land. This question, Mr. President, far transcends in importance any mere justice, any mere right, any mere voting power or voting strength in this league; it goes far beyond that and touches the very dearest sensibilities that God has implanted in every man's heart. This question touches our pride; it touches our patriotism; it touches our self-respect. You can not, as you did the other day on the Shantung matter, break down the moral fiber of a nation upon a purely moral question and expect it to be in the future what it has been in the past. You can not take a Nation such as ours that has grown to greatness and to power; that to-day is the one great Nation in all this world—you can not take this Nation and permit its representatives to make it subordinate to any nation upon the face of the earth without touching the God-given attribute that is in every man's bosom concerning his native land.

What I appeal for, Mr. President, is not alone the justice, not alone the right, not alone the logic of the position which is here presented; but what I appeal for is that this country which we all love, this country which is ours after all—I do not care where it shall be placed or in what league it shall be put—that this country, America, shall stand before the world in every pact the equal of every other country upon the face of the earth, not in subordination to any other country in all this world. It is that, Mr. President, for which I appeal to the Senate to-day. It is not the question merely of votes; it is the question of the dignity, the prestige, the position, the honor, the love of country that I appeal to in this debate. All ye who would not permit under any other circumstances this sort of thing to be done to your land, how in the days to come will you explain your action to yourselves, how will you answer to yourselves for the country that is yours and that you now represent in the Senate why it was that on this day when finally the question confronted you of whether your country is equal to the Empire of Great Britain you decided it in the negative?

There was once a Democratic President who faced a similar situation and who faced it bravely and as an American. I wish to read to you the concluding part of his message on the Venezuelan question lest ye upon the other side forget and lest ye have forgotten all that that man, that brave man, did in that crisis of our Nation. I read you the closing paragraph of Grover Cleveland's message on Venezuela:

> In making these recommendations I am fully alive to the responsibility incurred, and keenly realize all the consequences that may follow. I am, nevertheless, firm in my conviction that while it is a grievous thing to contemplate the two great English-speaking peoples of the world as being otherwise than friendly competitors in the onward march of civilization, and strenuous and worthy rivals in all the arts of peace, there is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice, and the subsequent loss of national self-respect and honor, beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

And to-day, Mr. President, I say to you, behind this question stand the national position, the national dignity, the national prestige, aye, the international honor of the United States of America. To-day, you and I are the trustees for future generations of that national prestige and that national dignity. To-day, you and I, for those who follow us, are the trustees of this which is most dear in our national life. Most of us here have passed the meridian, Mr. President. Our race of life is almost run. Most of us here have responded as best we knew how to that which has come to us in public life. But in the few years remaining to us, Mr. President, in this great crisis in our Nation's history, I appeal to-day to those men who have held aloft the standard of America, the old Stars and Stripes, America's prestige, America's honor, America's position, to stand firm and valiant for America.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, before addressing myself to the pending amendment, I desire to call attention to the statement in this morning's Washington Post attributed to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] concerning the preamble that it is reported was adopted yesterday by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I quote:

> Senator HITCHCOCK, administration leader, stated yesterday that the preamble would operate exactly as an amendment and would send the treaty back for consideration by other powers.

I can not believe that the Senator from Nebraska is correctly quoted in that statement, nor can I believe that that is possibly the Senator's position, for I am sure that the Senator can not hold any such opinion as that. The matter in controversy over which this statement arises is whether there shall be incorporated in the resolution of ratification a requirement that three of the principal allied powers shall assent to our conditional ratification before it becomes effective or whether the resolution of ratification shall be silent upon that subject.

In either case I think it is admitted by everyone that there must be consent, either implied or expressed; and if reservations are adopted this treaty will not go back anywhere. It will not go to the Paris conference. The peace conferees will have nothing to do with it. If reservations be adopted to the treaty—and they are going to be adopted, of course, or the treaty will fail—the assent of these nations will be obtained through the usual diplomatic channels.

I speak of this matter this morning because I believe it is in the interest of the adoption of this treaty that the express consent of these three powers shall be required. If, before we deposit our ratification, the consent of Great Britain, France, and Italy is expressly given, there is no possibility, in my judgment, of any other nation objecting; and if there were any doubt of it, it will insure securing the assent of all other nations after these three powers have assented to it.

I merely wished to refer to this because I am sure the Senator from Nebraska would not have the country understand that his position is correctly quoted in the press.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I supposed the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I have not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject may I ask him a question? I confess very frankly that it has been somewhat difficult for me to understand the position which has been taken with reference to amendments and reservations. If an amendment were put in the treaty, could not that be accepted by the different nations through diplomatic channels, the same as a reservation?

Mr. LENROOT. Possibly.

Mr. BORAH. Then what is the particular attitude of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LENROOT. The difference is that if we propose an amendment it changes the text. We propose to the other nations that the text of this treaty shall be changed. The natural order would be for this amendment to go back to the peace conference and open up the entire treaty——

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. LENROOT. While in the case of a reservation we say to the other nations: "We are willing to enter into this treaty upon these conditions. Take us or leave us." That is the difference.

Mr. BORAH. But the difference is no difference to me. Here is the proposition: Suppose we should strike the Shantung provision out of this treaty entirely, and then the Executive department, through the Secretary of State, should see fit to communicate that to the different nations and ask them if they accepted or acceded to that proposition. Would it be any different from a proposition of reservation?

Mr. LENROOT. In that particular case it certainly would, because if we strike out the Shantung provisions from this treaty by way of amendment we strike them out not only for ourselves but for every other nation. By a reservation, however, we say that we do not assent to the provisions concerning Shantung. The other nations may continue to be bound by those provisions if they so desire. It is no concern of ours.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so; but in any event you must have, either by silence and acquiescence or by affirmative action, the assent of the other nations, whether it is a reservation or an amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. I agree to that.

Mr. BORAH. You can have that assent through diplomatic channels or you can have it by sending it back to the conference at Versailles; either one.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator this question, because he is one of the most learned Senators here upon international relations, next to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether the Senator is sarcastic or not.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I am not. I am entirely in earnest, because the Senator has made a very profound study of international relations. That is merely a preface to what I was about to say.

Mr. BORAH. But I want to say that I am asking in the utmost sincerity, because I have been wholly unable to understand the distinction which has been drawn here between amendments and reservations with reference to requiring action from other Governments, and I am asking this in the utmost good faith.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not question that; and I want to ask the Senator this question: Whether, in all his study, he has ever found a case where one nation has amended a treaty and it has become effective without affirmative action, either reopening it at the peace conference, if it happened to be a treaty of peace, or otherwise? Has he found a case where an amendment to a treaty has been accepted by silent acquiescence?

Mr. BORAH. I am frank to say that I do not recall any particular case of that kind now; but that does not change the proposition that there can be no possible doubt that if a contract is submitted to me as an individual, and I strike out a clause of the contract, and the other party who had signed the contract acts under that contract, whether he does it by affirmative act or whether he simply proceeds to live up to it, he is bound by it with the clause stricken out; and that is true with reference to a reservation or an amendment just the same in one instance as in the other.

For instance, we put on a reservation here with reference to article 10 that a reservation, in order to bind the other nations, must be accepted either by affirmative action or by such silence as can be considered to constitute affirmative action. That is just the same. That would be true if we should strike out article 10. You may take it up through diplomatic channels and settle it in one instance just the same as in the other. If the peace conference at Versailles were at an end, if it were closed and forgotten, you could take this up and close it with every nation in the world by diplomatic communication.

Mr. LENROOT. That is possible, of course.

Mr. BORAH. Well, then, I do not see the difference.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator from Idaho will at once see the difference. A reservation, as ordinarily made, does not attempt to interfere with the terms of a treaty or change the obligations of the other parties to the treaty. It affects only the obligations of the parties making the reservation, leaving the treaty intact as to all of the other parties. Now, I admit that we might have an amendment in form that was in effect a reservation.

Mr. BORAH. Or a reservation in form which was in effect an amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I think not. I do not agree that we could make a reservation that was in effect an amendment. For instance, I do not think we could say, by reservation, that Shantung shall be transferred to China instead of to Japan.

Mr. BORAH. Why, yes; we could; and Japan could accept it through diplomatic channels just as well as she could at Versailles.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, it is not a reservation; that is the point I am making. A reservation, under the whole course of diplomatic relations, is one nation agreeing to provisions of a treaty and reserving or declining to be bound by some provisions of the treaty. The Senator, in all his study of all the treaties, can not find a case where a nation by reservation has undertaken to change the text of the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. I will not interfere with the Senator further; but I ask this question because I know the Senator has given a great deal of time to the consideration of the distinction between amendments and reservations, and at some future time I hope, either privately or publicly, to have some sort of a discussion with the Senator on the subject.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course, we are all interested in this discussion. Does not the Senator differentiate between the character of amendments to what is ordinarily called the text of the treaty and reservations? Is there no difference in the mind of the Senator with reference to the character of the amendment itself?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; there is. As I stated, I think an amendment may be in effect a reservation.

Mr. FALL. An amendment, in other words, may not change the obligations of the parties?

Mr. LENROOT. I agree with that.

Mr. FALL. It was upon that theory that the Foreign Relations Committee reported out certain amendments, some thirty-odd in number, to the treaty. The amendment striking out the participation by the United States, through a commissioner, in a certain commission, was, in fact, merely a declination upon the part of the United States to be bound by the provision of the article prescribing and laying down the duties of the commission; it was simply that the United States itself would take no part in the discharge of those duties. What is the difference between that and a reservation?

Mr. LENROOT. I think there is a difference, and it is just this: Even in the case of an amendment, that is in fact a reservation, such as the Senator suggests, I think it would require the express assent of every nation party to the treaty. Let me follow that up for just a moment. Take this very treaty and suppose these reservations that the Senate will very soon discuss were in the form of amendments, but in exactly the same wording as they will appear as reservations, and the treaty is finally in full force and effect not only as to the three nations that have now ratified it, but the United States as well. How will the text of the treaty appear? Will it appear with the amendments made by the United States without all the other parties having expressly assented to them? I think not. I think it would require their express assent at least, if not a meeting of the peace conference, to make changes, even though they were in effect reservations. But if they are put in merely as a ratification with reservations the text of the treaty, when published, will not be changed in the slightest particular, but the ratification of the United States, following the treaty itself, will contain the reservations, and any nation that has not expressly objected to it is bound by it through acquiescence.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. FALL. I will not detain the Senate nor interfere with the Senator further. I will not take up the time now to give the reasons for my dissent from his proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish to very briefly discuss the distinction, to my mind, between amendments to the covenant of the league of nations and amendments to the balance of the treaty. A week or two ago I stated the distinction, as I saw it; but in view of the pending amendment, I wish to very briefly restate it this morning.

It has been repeatedly charged upon the other side of the aisle, and especially by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], that any amendments to this treaty, or any amendments to the covenant of the league of nations, would have to be submitted to Germany before they could be accepted. I agree as to amendments to all portions of the treaty other than the covenant of the league of nations. But it is not true, Mr. President, that amendments to the portion of the treaty that we are now considering will require submission to Germany, or necessarily, as the conditions now exist, to any powers other than those to whom, by the preamble in the resolution of ratification, the treaty must be submitted.

The provision of the treaty with reference to the time when the treaty goes into effect has been read so many times I hesitate to read it again, but it is provided that—

> A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany, on the one hand, and by three of the principal allied and associated powers, on the other hand.

Then it provides for the taking effect of the treaty. The treaty has been ratified by Great Britain, by France, and by Italy. It will come into effect perhaps any day now. It will come into effect as soon as this procès-verbal is issued. Under the terms of the covenant of the league of nations, the members constituting the league of nations at the time this treaty comes into effect have the power to amend the league of nations. The league of nations, therefore, will come into being the moment that this peace treaty becomes effective against Germany, but the league of nations at that time will consist of the representatives of the nations who have ratified the treaty. The league of nations, therefore, in the first instance, will consist of the British Empire, of Italy, and of France, and any of the other smaller nations that may have ratified. I think Belgium has ratified. They then constitute the league of nations. It will be within their power to entirely revise this covenant of the league of nations the very next day after it has come into being; and Germany has consented to that. It provides that amendments to the covenant will take effect when ratified by members of the league whose representatives compose the council, and by a majority of the league whose representatives compose the assembly. When the treaty first comes into force, the British Empire, France, and Italy will compose the council, and they will also compose a majority of the members of the league, and they could just as readily write into the league covenant the amendments that we desire, so that the covenant will read as we want it to read before we deposit our ratification, as they could expressly assent to the ratification. There is this difference——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator do violence to the letter and to the spirit of the treaty in contending for the construction which he is now placing upon the treaty? As I recall, article 26 provides as the Senator has stated, but does not the Senator think that it should be read in order to be interpreted correctly, as if it should say, "Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council, to wit, the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Japan, and Italy?" Does not the Senator think that amendments are not contemplated to be made to the league until after all the representatives there indicated have come into the league, and the league in virtue of their presence in the organization, begins to function? In other words, does not the Senator think that Germany had a right, when she signed this treaty, to reckon upon the United States being a member of the league?

I can readily conceive that Germany might be perfectly willing to come into a league of nations if the United States were a member of that league, and would not want to join a league of nations if the United States were not a member of the league, and that she would be willing to take her chances about amendments to the league after the United States had come in and the league had functioned with the United States being a member of the league.

It seems to me the Senator's construction of the provision of the article might work disadvantageously to Germany, might induce Germany to believe that a fraud had been perpetrated upon her, and that a limping, incomplete, halting organization was forced upon her and upon all the members of the league before the league as contemplated by Germany when she signed the treaty had been called into existence.

Mr. LENROOT. In the first place, Mr. President, the Senator argues as to what Germany's deliberations may have been, or her considerations were, in signing the treaty. But the Senator knows quite as well as I do that from the very meager information that we were permitted to receive from the peace conference Germany was not permitted to consider a single paragraph of the peace treaty in any negotiable way. She was told, "Sign here," and she did.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, conceding that what the Senator has said is true, nevertheless, when we presented the treaty to Germany there were provisions in it which contemplated that the organization of the league should consist of a council, and that the United States of America should be one of the nations represented upon that council; and notwithstanding the fact that Germany admitted in the treaty that amendments might be made to the covenant of the league, yet she had a right to believe that amendments would not be made until the United States of America was a member of the league and participated in those amendments.

I can readily understand that notwithstanding the treaty was forced upon Germany, Germany might have been more reluctant to sign, might have made more objections, and they might have been effectual if she had known that amendments could be made textually to the league without the United States being a party to the amendment, and I can readily understand that she would have been brought to the signing of the treaty with a greater celerity and with less difficulty if she knew that we were going to be a member of the league than if she had known that we were not to be a member of the league.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am very sorry, indeed, that the Senator from Utah has made the argument that he has just made, because by the very same process of reasoning the time may come when Germany, using the Senator's own words, will say that she is not bound by the provisions of the treaty because, following the Senator's reasoning just one step further, if the United States rejects the peace treaty there can be no league of nations at all; that if the United States rejects this treaty there can be no treaty of peace; that the treaty can not stand in any of its parts, notwithstanding the express provision that upon being ratified by three of the principal allied and associated powers it shall become effective.

If the Senator's argument has any standing Germany is out of this treaty to-day and will not be bound by it, because China is named in the treaty as one of the contracting powers. Yet China has not signed it and is out of it now, and proposes to remain out of it. Does the Senator say that the league of nations can not function because China is not a member of it? Does the Senator say that there will be no league of nations if the United States does not ratify this treaty?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. Just a moment. If that be true, what becomes of the provision in the treaty with reference to the right of withdrawal? It provides that the league of nations, on the Saar Basin, shall exercise sovereign control for 15 years. Suppose two years hence the United States withdraws from the league of nations, as it is given a right to do. The Senator's argument, then, could be used by Germany to the effect that "when we agreed to this the United States was a party to it, and, the United States having withdrawn from the league of nations, we are no longer bound by the provisions with reference to the Saar Basin."

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask if there is anybody here in the American Senate who wants to hesitate about protecting the rights of America because, forsooth, it might not please Germany, or Germany might feel badly about it, or Germany might actually have to be brought to the table again and required to consent to it?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I do; because the question seems to be directed to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Utah does not look at it from that point; but that is the legitimate consequence of his argument.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Just for a brief statement.

Mr. KING. The question of the Senator from Missouri, I submit, with all due respect to him, is a very unfair question and was not warranted by the statement which I made in reply to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I do not care what the feelings of the Senator or myself or any Senator may be toward Germany, we will deal fairly and justly with Germany, and if a contract has been entered into that does give some favor to Germany we will live up to that contract, though by breaking it it might be of some advantage to the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is the very point—"if a contract has been entered into." If we make a contract with Germany we will keep it; but we have not made any contract yet. We are in the act of making one or refusing to make one. I want to know if anybody will hesitate to do what he thinks ought to be done for the protection of the United States simply because Germany has signed a contract and passed it over to us and we have not yet signed it? Are we so tender of Germany as that?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say, in further response to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], that if this language is not to receive its ordinary construction, if the league of nations does not come into being at the time that Germany agrees that the peace treaty becomes effective, then I say to the Senator from Utah that there is not only 1 paragraph but there are 50 paragraphs in the treaty that would permit Germany to escape from its provisions. But it does, and I have not before heard anyone question it except the Senator from Utah.

Now, there is this difference, and I want to be entirely frank and fair about it. If a reservation is proposed and these three nations assent to it, silence upon the part of others gives acquiescence, while if an amendment to the covenant portion of the treaty is made it will require the express action by these three; and if Japan, for instance, shall have ratified the treaty before we come to the deposit of the ratification, it will require the express action of Japan as well, because all of the members of the council must be unanimous in order to secure an amendment of the treaty, and for that reason I prefer reservations wherever reservations can accomplish the purpose.

That brings me, Mr. President, to a discussion of the pending amendment. I have heard the very eloquent speech of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and his desire to protect American rights and American interests and safeguard the glory of our great country. We all agree with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from California, and I yield not to him or anyone else in my determination, in so far as one Senator can assist, to secure equality between the United States and the British Empire in all matters affecting the interests of the United States. But I undertake to say, Mr. President, and I think I will be able to demonstrate before I conclude, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from California does not protect a single American right or safeguard a single American interest. It does do this, and I am in accord with it—it does, upon matters that do not concern us directly, give us a larger participation in world affairs in an advisory capacity. It does give us a voice in the election of new members. It does give us a larger voice in the procedure merely of the assembly and the council. But that is all.

Now, I shall undertake to demonstrate the proposition that I have made that it does not protect any American rights or safeguard any American interests. Whether this amendment be adopted or defeated, a reservation will be necessary to protect America, because the Senator's amendment does not do it, and I shall come to that a little later.

First, as to the amendment, I want to call attention to not only its language but its relation to the text of the treaty and to what language it is a proviso. The treaty reads that:

> At meetings of the assembly each member of the league shall have one vote, and may not have more than three representatives.

That is the text. The pending amendment adds the proviso:

> Provided, That when any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, which are also members of the league, the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote of such member of the league and its self-governed dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league.

That is, it modifies the text of the treaty so that where it says a member shall have one vote, it gives to the United States as large a number of votes as, in effect, the British Empire and its self-governing colonies and dominions have, where it has a vote; but it does not undertake to and does not increase the voting power of the United States one iota except in cases where, under the text of the treaty, the United States has one vote.

Let us take the first proposition. The amendment, therefore, does not protect the United States in the case of a dispute between the United States and any member of the British Empire. I concede now—for I think without a reservation that would be the construction—that in a dispute with Great Britain all of her self-governing dominions and colonies would have the right to vote, but this amendment would not give us the right to vote in that case, because we would be one of the parties to the dispute, and the language of the treaty is that neither party to a dispute shall have a vote at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question, if it will not interrupt the course of his remarks?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to yield to the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I want to call attention to the corollary of this amendment, and, as I said in the beginning of my remarks this morning, they should both be read together as a part of the same plan. If this amendment be adopted and the subsequent amendment be adopted, is not the case stated by the Senator met?

Mr. LENROOT. Then I want to ask the Senator if he concedes that where we are a party to the dispute we do not have any vote?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, there is no question about that.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Let me ask further, does not the adoption of the second amendment meet the situation suggested?

Mr. LENROOT. It does so far as a dispute with the British Empire is concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The two go together, and what is the use of criticizing? The two are part of the same plan, the same amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I was not criticizing. I propose to lead up to and discuss every possible dispute that the United States might have of which the league of nations or the council could take jurisdiction, and I propose to show that in no single case would the Senator's amendment protect the United States, and I took that as the first one.

I am very frank to say that that can be cured, and I assume will be cured, either by reservation or amendment; so I pass on to the next.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. But it is cured by the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], which is a part of this same plan.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes; and there are other things that will be cured. I sincerely hope that the defect in the Senator's amendment in failing to protect the interests of the United States will be cured subsequently by reservation.

Let us go on to the next character of dispute. I have now established—admitted by the Senator from California—that wherever the United States is engaged in a dispute we have no vote, and his amendment will not affect that situation. Then suppose, Mr. President, that we have a dispute with Japan. We are a party to the dispute. It goes to the council. To bind us against making war the council must be unanimous, and we may fear that the council will be unanimously against our contention in that dispute with Japan, and therefore we remove the dispute to the assembly. That will be the only reason that could possibly exist for our ever taking the initiative in removing a dispute from the council to the assembly, in the hope that in the assembly we could secure a majority of the other members of the league who would not sustain the unanimous action of the council. Otherwise there could be no possible object in our taking the dispute out of the hands of the council and putting it into the hands of the assembly.

But what, then, would be our position? The Senator from California admitted a few minutes ago that wherever we were a party to a dispute we had no vote; therefore his amendment could not affect that situation in the slightest degree. Nevertheless, with this amendment adopted, in that dispute, removed by us to the assembly, Great Britain would have her six votes; she would have her five votes in the assembly to sustain her action as a member of the council.

I will undertake now to demonstrate—and I think I can demonstrate—that the adoption of this amendment will not give the United States an equal number of votes with the British Empire wherever a dispute between any nations is referred to the assembly. Article 15 reads:

In any case referred to the assembly all the provisions of this article and of article 12 relating to the action and powers of the council shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly: Provided, That a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

Now, let us see whether this amendment would have the slightest application in the case of a dispute between two countries, neither of whom is the British Empire or ourselves. Suppose a dispute between Greece and Bulgaria comes to the council and one or the other of the parties, believing that the council will be unanimously against it, removes the dispute to the assembly in the hope that a majority of the assembly can be secured to veto the action of the council, will we have six votes there? The British Empire will; there is no doubt about that; but under the amendment now pending, purporting to give the United States equality with the British Empire, we shall have but one vote in the assembly. Note the language:

Provided, That a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and a majority of the other members of the league—

We are on the council in that dispute between Greece and Bulgaria; but we are not, and this amendment does not make us, one of "the other members of the league" that have a vote.

So that in the event of a dispute between those two countries being transferred from the council to the assembly we would have no vote in making that majority, whether this amendment would purport to give us 6 votes or 600 votes. Mr. President, there can be no doubt about that construction, for note the language with reference to certain other provisions of the treaty—for instance, in relation to amendments of the covenant:

Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

In that case the members of the council help to make up the majority required in the assembly; that is clear. So, too, with reference to amendments to the labor provisions:

Amendments to this part of the present treaty which are adopted by the conference by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present shall take effect when ratified by the States whose representatives compose the council of the league of nations and by three-fourths of the members.

There again the vote of the nation that is represented on the council is also counted in the assembly to secure the majority, but not so in the case of a dispute, for there, Mr. President, is the little word "other"—"and of a majority of the other members of the league." Is it not entirely clear, therefore, that although this amendment be adopted we shall not have six votes upon any matter in dispute between any nations, irrespective of whether or not we are a party to the dispute?

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield first to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, at this juncture, if it will not disturb the harmony of the Senator's argument, I want to inquire whether under the provisions of the first amendment it would not operate to give the United States six votes in the council?

Mr. LENROOT. I think not, because the British Empire would have only one vote in the council.

Mr. THOMAS. The language is ambiguous.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that if Canada should ever be admitted to the council it would give the British Empire two votes in the council.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the intention; but as drawn it would seem to be sufficiently broad to have the effect of increasing our vote in the council.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I quite understood the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin, but if I did understand his position it was that whenever there was any controversy submitted to the assembly, being a member of the council, we would have no vote in the assembly?

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. KING. Applying the same rule, Great Britain, then, would have no vote in the assembly?

Mr. LENROOT. Great Britain would not, but her five colonies would.

Mr. KING. Yes; the Senator thinks that her five colonies would have a vote, but that Great Britain herself would not?

Mr. LENROOT. She would have five votes in the assembly to our none.

Mr. KING. I wanted to understand the Senator's position.

Mr. LENROOT. But Great Britain herself would be excluded from the assembly as we are excluded from the assembly because we are a member of the council.

Mr. President, I feel very certain that upon reflection every Senator must agree to this construction and agree that this amendment does not protect any vital interest of the United States. Therefore, whether this amendment be adopted or defeated, a reservation will be absolutely necessary if the United States is to be protected against inequality in voting.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator if I am correct in my conclusion that it is the judgment of the Senator that the adoption of this amendment will have no effect whatever?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; I am coming to that. It has no effect whatever upon any matter affecting directly the vital interests of the United States. I say that absolutely and without qualification. The United States ought to be protected in that regard. There ought not to be this inequality between the British Empire and the United States upon matters affecting the vital interests of the United States. So, Mr. President, I have proposed to the Committee on Foreign Relations a reservation upon this subject, which I ask to have read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, have had more than one vote; or in case of any dispute between the United States and any member in which such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically shall have voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed reservation will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask that it simply lie upon the table, as the Committee on Foreign Relations are already considering it.

The effect of that reservation, Mr. President, is to protect the interests of the United States against this inequality of voting, because under it we assume no obligation to be bound wherever Great Britain with her colonies and dominions have cast more than one vote; nor are we bound in case of a dispute either with Great Britain or any of her colonies or dominions where they have voted at all. That gives us equality so far as protecting our vital interests is concerned.

Now it is said that Canada, our neighbor—for whose sacrifices in the late war too much praise can not be given—ought to have the fullest recognition as a nation in the league of nations. Mr. President, I have no objection to Canada becoming a member of the league of nations; I have no objection to Canada having a vote of an advisory character in any matter; but I do object to the British Empire having six votes to bind us while we have only one vote to bind them.

If Canada—and I say it in no spirit of criticism or reflection upon her—wants to enter the sisterhood of nations, with all the sovereign powers of a nation, let Canada declare her independence and secure her full sovereignty. Why, Mr. President, if Canada at the conclusion of this war had declared that she desired her independence from Great Britain, who is there that thinks it would not have been granted, because Canada could have maintained that position if it had not been freely granted? She did not see fit to make such a declaration. Canada desires to retain the protection and the privileges of being a portion of the British Empire, and that is her business, not ours. If she desires to remain a part of the British Empire, if she desires to remain in the condition she now is, where we as a Nation can have no communication officially with the Canadian Government except through the British Empire, if she desires to continue that relationship, that is her business and not ours; but she has not the right in the same breath to demand all of the privileges of a sovereign nation and the right to bind us by her vote when in all her foreign relations she is absolutely under the control of the mother country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to preface my question with the statement that I most heartily concur in what the Senator has just said in regard to Canada. It seems to me that his statement is perfectly logical and is not susceptible to any question.

The question I wanted to ask the Senator was in regard to his proposed reservation, which I do not criticize either. But suppose that we adopt this reservation and approve the treaty with it as a part of the resolution of approval. Does not the Senator think that it goes much further in its legal effect on the treaty than any amendment that has heretofore been proposed? And if objection is made, for instance, to the Shantung amendment because it will have to go back, as some claim—which I do not admit—but assuming that to be true, does it not follow that this reservation which the Senator has proposed will make the approval of the treaty, at least by Great Britain and her colonies, an absolute impossibility?

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all. I think the Senator will plainly see the distinction between this reservation and the Shantung amendment, for instance. The Shantung amendment proposed to rewrite that portion of the treaty and change the name of the grantee from Japan to China. It not only would have changed the formal text of the treaty, but it would have changed one of the very material parts of the treaty. This reservation changes nothing. We do not in this reservation deny to the British Empire six votes. They may cast their six votes in any matter that they choose, but in that event we assume no obligation to be bound by the action there taken.

Mr. NORRIS. That applies whether we are in the dispute or not, according to this reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely; and it ought to.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator on that. I am not criticizing his reservation, but I am trying to get at the legal effect of it. To my mind it absolutely in effect, although it is done in the form of a reservation, will take away from Canada, from New Zealand, from Australia, and all other dependent colonies of that kind who are members of the league the absolute power that they have under the league as it now stands. In other words, no dispute could arise in which these self-governing dominions voted where the decision would, for instance, bind the United States. If we are going into a league of nations with a provision attached that we will not be bound in any case unless we want to, where these self-governing colonies vote, we make it absolutely ineffective, it seems to me.

Mr. LENROOT. I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me, in the first place, that England and her self-governing colonies, if each of them wanted to have—as I assume they do—the same powers as any other member of the league, could not under any conditions accept this reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Why not?

Mr. NORRIS. Because it destroys that power absolutely. I think it is the right principle. I do not think they ought each one to have a vote. I agree with the Senator there fully.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see. In case they desire to bind the United States, they must content themselves with one vote; that is all. If they are indifferent as to whether the United States is bound or not—which may well be the case, for instance, in the illustration that I gave between Greece and Bulgaria—they may exercise and probably would exercise their right to cast six votes; but in any case where we are a party to the dispute we say we are not bound by the action if they cast more than one vote.

Mr. NORRIS. But this applies to any dispute, whether we are a party to it or not.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. And its adoption would result in giving to each one of these component parts one-sixth of a vote.

Mr. LENROOT. However they chose to arrange it between themselves.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The effect of this, to be very frank about it, is that in any case, if they want to bind us, they must content themselves with one vote.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator conceive, in the business that will come before the assembly and the council, of such a reckless method of doing business? We would have some decisions that would be binding, and some that would not be binding. If some other country did the same thing that the United States does, by means of a reservation similar to this one, and they undertook to cast their entire six votes, I can hardly conceive how they would be able to accomplish anything, because there would be continually part of the nations that would be bound and part of the nations that would not be bound in practically everything that might come before them.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator has forgotten the very material proposition that nearly all of the obligations that are imposed by this treaty are imposed by the treaty itself, and are several obligations of each nation; that there are very few cases, indeed, where the league or the council is given any jurisdiction to make any decision that is binding upon anybody; and the only one that now comes to my mind is the one with reference to arbitration and inquiry. So far as disputes between other nations are concerned, I am not very particular as to whether they cast their votes there or not; but wherever we have a dispute with any nation I do not want the British Empire to have six votes to our none, and, when they are engaged in disputes, I do not want us to have only one vote to their none.

Mr. NORRIS. I can hardly conceive of anything that might come up officially before the council or the assembly to which we were not parties, even, where we would not be interested in the result of the decision.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, interested, certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. We would be vitally interested in practically everything, I think. That would have been true if we had had a league before this war, and Germany had undertaken to go across Belgium as she did. We would not have been a party to it, probably, but we were just as much interested as anybody who would have been a party to it; and I should think that would apply to the great bulk of the business that would come before either the league or the council. I can not conceive of an exception.

Mr. LENROOT. I again state that except in the case of disputes I do not now call to mind anything in the treaty that would create a binding obligation upon the United States by action of the assembly or council.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is probably true. The treaty binds the various nations to do and not to do certain things, independent of disputes; but the real, vital thing, if the league is effective to maintain the peace of the world, is going to be that it will settle satisfactorily the disputes that arise. We do not care anything about anything that does not amount to a dispute; but when we get into a dispute we are interested in it, because it is out of the disputes, the disagreements, and the misunderstandings that wars come.

Mr. LENROOT. I am surprised to hear the Senator's statement. Does he think that if this league comes into being, and we become a party to it, the nations will generally, under the procedure defined in the league covenant, make decisions that are binding upon anybody?

Mr. NORRIS. Why, Mr. President, if the decisions are not going to be binding, there is not any use in having any decisions. I do not mean by that that any nation could not defy them and have an international revolution, probably, or anything of that kind; but I mean to say that if the disputes that arise in the future between the nations of the world are settled, they must be settled because the various nations, whether directly interested or not, are bound by the settlement that is made; and machinery that does not bring that about will not accomplish anything.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am very much surprised at the confidence that the Senator seems to express in this league covenant, for, while I am for it, with proper reservations, I want to say very frankly that I never have believed that it would be possible very often to secure a unanimous decision of the nine members of the council and a majority of the other members of the league upon any dispute between any two great nations. If I thought that was the beneficial part of the league, I would have very little confidence, indeed, in it. I believe that the beneficial portions of this league covenant are, first, article 11, whereby all the members will agree to discuss international matters affecting the peace of the world, not attempting to make binding decisions upon anyone, but bringing the moral influence of the nations of the world to bear upon a nation committing wrong.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. How does the Senator construe the other part of that article?

Mr. LENROOT. Where it says "take such action"?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; "take such action as they deem necessary to preserve the peace of the world," or that is the substance of it.

Mr. LENROOT. I construe that to mean that the only action they can take is by way of recommendation.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is more familiar with these articles than I, says that the language is that they "shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations."

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. What does that mean?

Mr. LENROOT. That means, in my judgment, merely that they may express their opinions, they may make recommendations to the various members as to what action they think the members ought to take to safeguard the peace of the world; but no jurisdiction is vested anywhere in this league of nations to enforce any of its decisions, and, in the absence of that, there is no power, military or naval, contemplated to be placed at the disposal of the league, and there is no coercive power except under article 16 for a violation of the covenants with reference to arbitration and inquiry. There are no other penalties; and so, in the light of an explicit grant of jurisdiction, it does not seem to me that one is warranted in saying that this league has any power to enforce in any way any findings that it may make or any recommendations in which it may concur.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, what has the Senator to say about subsection (c) of article 23?

Mr. LENROOT. It reads:

> Will intrust the league with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs.

The Senator desires to know my construction of that?

Mr. FALL. Yes. What authority has the league under that?

Mr. LENROOT. None, independently. My construction of that language is that the members undertake by subsequent action to explicitly provide for the supervision to be exercised by the league, but according to my construction they could not exercise any powers independently of this substantive grant.

Mr. FALL. No; but there is already a series of international agreements, particularly one with reference to the traffic mentioned, to which Germany and other nations are parties. Under this provision are you turning it over to the league?

Mr. LENROOT. It is "subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon." To my mind that simply means that if we had in the past an international convention, with some bureau exercising supervision over it, that that supervision is transferred to the league.

Mr. FALL. Oh, no; you enter into a general agreement, as you have done by the present agreement, and each nation itself supervises and executes the provision which it obligates itself to. But under subsection (c) you are now delegating that power, as I understand it, to the league.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not to the extent of this league having any independent power of enforcement, any more than you may say we have entered into a treaty and it has the force of law, but with no force provided to make it effective, and that, of course, is behind all law. None is provided in this league of nations, and in the absence of it the most that could be said, if a nation fails to carry out such a promise as is implied by the Senator, would be that it was a breaking of the covenant by that nation.

Mr. FALL. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Under part 13 of this treaty, which is a part of the league itself, there is a provision for the meeting of the labor council, and set forth in the article itself is the agenda for that first meeting. In the agenda of that first labor meeting is the consideration of child-labor laws. The Congress of the United States has already passed child-labor laws, and the Supreme Court of the United States has upon two occasions declared them unconstitutional. As I read the provisions of part 13, which go back to and have back of them for their enforcement the league provisions to which the Senator is now referring, if two-thirds of the nations adopt the agenda proposed—that is, if they adopt in words the child-labor law passed by the Congress of the United States, and the Congress of the United States again agrees to it—the Supreme Court of the United States has lost its jurisdiction, and it becomes a law by delegation to the league of nations and to the league of labor. It gives the league power to enforce its decision. I am merely suggesting this because of the line of argument the Senator is making that the league can not enforce anything. So we are confronted with the situation, in the face of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, if the Congress of the United States again passes a child-labor law which has been recommended by the council of the labor unions of the world, it will become the duty of the league, as well as of the league council, to enforce that law, despite the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say, in reply to that, that in the first place no delegation of power can be granted in this or any other treaty for any representatives or to anybody to perform any act in violation of our Constitution.

Mr. FALL. There the Senator and myself are in thorough accord. I have taken that position from the beginning. But I am simply calling the attention of the Senator to my construction of an attempt, at any rate, to violate the Constitution of the United States by a delegation of power.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think there can be any doubt about it.

Mr. FALL. That it would be unconstitutional?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FALL. If I may trespass further upon the Senator's time, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the argument of the Senator, not only that which he is making now but that which I have heard him make before in reference to the voting and the effect of the Johnson amendment. The Senator, as I understand it, takes the position that by virtue of the fact that the United States is a member of the council, under article 15 it would have only one vote, at any rate, and that with regard to the Johnson amendment, providing that in a vote either in the council or in the assembly the United States should always have as many votes as Great Britain and her self-governing colonies, the Senator takes the position, I understand, that by virtue of our being represented on the council, under the Johnson amendment we would not be entitled to the total of six votes.

Mr. LENROOT. Not under the Johnson amendment or the original text, either.

Mr. FALL. Is it not the proper construction, that in the assembly, under article 15, where the matter goes either automatically or by request of the parties to the assembly, in the instance that the Senator has been citing in the assembly the nations vote by groups? They are simply grouped for voting. In the assembly there are so many votes, and in the assembly to-day Great Britain has six and the United States has one. They are in the assembly.

Mr. LENROOT. They are in the assembly for certain purposes.

Mr. FALL. For certain purposes, but they vote by groups, and it is provided that the vote of one group shall be unanimous, and the vote of the other group by a majority, shortly speaking. Yet the Senator says that under the Johnson amendment we would have only one vote and Great Britain six. I can not understand that.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly, because we belong in one group where we have one vote.

Mr. FALL. But we are voting in the assembly, and the voting is by groups only in the assembly.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but it takes the two groups, and it says in one group there must be unanimous action.

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, there must be a majority of the other groups.

Mr. FALL. Precisely.

Mr. LENROOT. And we are not in that other group.

Mr. FALL. Oh, yes; we are in the assembly, and the assembly is composed of a total of two groups. Great Britain has one vote in one of the groups and five in the other. The Johnson amendment gives the United States its one vote in one and five in the other.

Mr. LENROOT. How do we get in the other?

Mr. FALL. We are in there by virtue of being in the assembly.

Mr. LENROOT. No; here are two groups in the assembly. In which group are we? We are not in both.

Mr. FALL. We are in both under the Johnson amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. We certainly are not.

Mr. FALL. We certainly are.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see. Does the Senator say that in the absence of the Johnson amendment we would have one vote in one group and one in the other?

Mr. FALL. We would have the one vote in the assembly.

Mr. LENROOT. Would we have two votes in the assembly?

Mr. FALL. If we cast the one vote against the other eight members of the council group, then the council vote would not be unanimous; but our vote would be a vote in the assembly and not a vote in the council.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me read the language:

> At meetings of the assembly each member of the league shall have one vote, and may not have more than one representative.

How many votes, under the text of the treaty, will we have in the assembly—one or two?

Mr. FALL. If you say that Great Britain has six, despite that wording, then I say that under the Johnson amendment we have six.

Mr. LENROOT. Great Britain has five.

Mr. FALL. A total of six.

Mr. LENROOT. Five in this group of the assembly, that is required to make up the majority.

Mr. FALL. The Senator makes the mistake, in my judgment, of undertaking to say that because you vote by groups you do not vote in the assembly.

Mr. LENROOT. I have to pay some attention, Mr. President, to the language of the treaty. What definition or construction does the Senator give to the words "a majority of the other members of the assembly"?

Mr. FALL. Exactly what was intended by Great Britain, in my judgment, was that if she voted with the other nine she could veto the action of her self-governing colonies, possibly, in the assembly.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then they are only "other members of the league" who are included in the majority. We can not be a member of one group and also a member of the other group.

Mr. FALL. We can under the Johnson amendment. We can not under your insistence.

Mr. LENROOT. The Johnson amendment has nothing to do with increasing membership. It has only to do with increasing the votes of one member.

Mr. FALL. The Johnson amendment distinctly provides that we shall have in the council and assembly an aggregate vote equal to that of any other nation with all of her self-governing colonies.

Mr. LENROOT. Is that the construction the Senator gives to it?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. If that is true, we have five votes in the assembly where we are a party to the dispute. Is that the Senator's construction?

Mr. FALL. No, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. Then if we do not have five votes in that case, why not?

Mr. FALL. The Senator's construction gives Great Britain five votes in the assembly.

Mr. LENROOT. Because they are different members of the league. That is a complete answer.

Mr. FALL. That is a complete answer in the Senator's conception of it. A complete answer to the Senator's position is that it would be very much better for the United States to adopt the amendment and exclude herself forever from the council. Then she would have six votes.

Mr. LENROOT. But I shall not repeat my argument on that, Mr. President. I think it is entirely clear that throughout this treaty the representatives who constitute the council vote in the assembly where they together constitute a majority. It says that. But in this particular case the language is "the other members of the assembly," and that very clearly excludes the United States.

Mr. President, I have made this argument not in opposition to the amendment but because there has been so much said about it as protecting American rights and American interests that I think the country ought to know that this amendment does not give the protection the United States is entitled to have, and it is for that reason only that I have gone into this matter as fully as I have. There is, Mr. President, one character of action by the league that this amendment will apply to, and to my mind in a very beneficial way, and that is under article 11, where it is provided that the league may take jurisdiction of matters affecting the peace of the world; but there it is not provided that the league can take any action that is binding upon anybody. Under the Johnson amendment, in meetings of the league or assembly, under article 11, it is true that we would have six votes with the six votes of the British Empire, but only in an advisory way. It is true that we would only have six votes, Mr. President, in participation in world affairs not directly affecting us or concerning us. I am rather surprised, Mr. President, that some of the advocates of this amendment, when the only substantial effect of it is to give the United States a larger participation in the affairs of the world, are supporting it so strenuously, when, if I understand the position of some of them, they are against the United States participating even in an advisory capacity in any affairs in the world that do not directly affect America.

I am not one of those who hold that position. I believe that the United States ought to take an interest in the affairs of the world, and throughout this controversy my position has been that I have not been willing by my vote to have the United States assume obligations under this treaty that would destroy the free will and the free judgment of the people of the United States. But in a meeting of the nations of the world to discuss the peace of the world, without the right to make binding obligations upon us or upon anybody else, I think there ought to be an equality in an advisory way between the United States and the British Empire. That being the only effect, in my judgment, of this amendment, I see no harm at least in adopting it.

But, Mr. President, I must call attention to the fact that while some Senators are so eloquently declaiming that the United States shall protect its glory and its honor, if I understand their position, when the final vote comes upon the treaty they will vote, some of them at least, not that the United States shall have six votes to the British Empire's six, not even that the United States shall have one to the British Empire's six, but when it comes to the final act they will vote that the British Empire, so far as they are concerned, may have six votes in the league of nations having to do with the peace of the world, but they do not want the United States of America to have any vote there, even in an advisory way. With that conclusion I can not concur.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I desire in a very few words to state why I am opposed to the Johnson amendment. I am in favor of some remedy for curing the inequality which the Johnson amendment seeks to cure, but I do not think the inequality can be cured by means of that amendment. I think the amendment, as applied to the covenant, is unworkable and impracticable.

In framing the league of nations three courses were open. The league might have been framed upon the principle that each sovereign nation was a member and had a single vote. It might have been framed upon the principle that each sovereign nation was a member and had a single vote, and that the self-governing colonies and dominions were also members but without any voting power. In either of those cases the Johnson amendment, or any similar provision, would not have been necessary. But the league was not framed on either of these principles. It was framed on the third principle, namely, of giving every sovereign nation a single vote as a member of the league, and giving every self-governing colony or dominion a single vote as a member of the league. Therefore, we have sovereign States members of the league, each entitled to a single vote, and we have self-governing colonies and dominions members of the league, each entitled to a single vote. In other words, self-governing colonies or dominions are put upon an absolute equality with sovereign States, and each member has a single vote.

Now, it is very difficult to meet this principle of inequality which arises from the fact that each of the self-governing colonies or dominions has a vote. I do not believe, however, that it can be remedied by the Johnson amendment.

Suppose the assembly of the league were gathered together in this Chamber, and the question before the assembly was the admission of a new member to the league. There are 32 members present, each entitled to a single vote. Thirty-one members vote. There are 31 votes cast, one by each member. The thirty-second member, which is the United States, is called upon to vote, and casts six votes. Five of those members who have voted are self-governing colonies or dominions. Twenty-seven of them are sovereign States, several of them world-empire States, and yet the United States casts a vote equal to the votes of six of the largest States or nations.

Suppose we admitted the 15 neutral countries to the league, as now contemplated. We then have 45 members of the league; and, the question before the assembly being the admission of a new State to the league, the voting proceeds. Forty-four members, nations as well as self-governing colonies and dominions, vote, each casting a single vote. The forty-fifth nation, the United States, is called upon to vote and casts six votes. Thirty-nine of those members who have cast their votes represent sovereign nations. Is the United States entitled to six votes to the one vote each of those sovereign nations? Is that curing the principle of inequality?

But suppose, as the covenant contemplates, the league embraces the world. Suppose Germany, Austria, and other nations have been admitted, so that the league comprises 50 members, and the members are gathered together in the assembly to vote upon the question of an amendment to the covenant. Forty-nine of those members cast a single vote each, and when the United States is called it casts six votes. Is that curing the principle of inequality?

Mr. President, the framework of the league is founded upon membership voting, each member having one vote, and when you disturb that principle of membership voting you have got to reconstruct the league covenant from beginning to end. Let us see. The first function of the assembly—and I am paying particular attention to the assembly, is to elect new members. New members are admitted, if the admission is agreed to, by two-thirds of the assembly—that is, two-thirds of the members of the assembly. How are you going to apply the Johnson amendment to that provision? You must certainly change the text in order to apply it. In the covenant as now framed it is the members who vote, and when you change it by giving the United States 6 votes it is a good deal as if 95 members of the United States Senate each had a single vote and the ninety-sixth member, the Senator from California, for example, had 6 votes. Is that a workable form of voting?

In a corporation there are two methods of voting, as applied respectively to the directors and to the stockholders. The directors vote as members of the board, and each member has one vote. As for the stockholders, the vote of each stockholder is measured by the number of shares of stock he owns. In the Johnson amendment it seems to me that in principle you are undertaking to combine these two inconsistent forms of voting. At least this can not be done without you reconstruct the covenant, and I do not believe you can reconstruct the covenant so as to combine membership voting with a plurality of votes given to one member.

As to the provision with regard to electing new members by the vote of two-thirds of the assembly or two-thirds of the members of the assembly, you will have to change the text there, and I am unable to see how you can change the text to make it conform to the Johnson amendment.

The second function of the assembly is to make rules of procedure. How are they made? They are made by a majority of the members of the league represented at the meeting of the assembly. Mind you, all through it is the league and the members of the league represented in the assembly who vote, each having one vote. How are you going to apply the Johnson amendment there? I do not know.

Again, if we turn to article 15, where provision is made to refer a dispute to the assembly, you will find that the assembly then votes in two groups, one group comprising the council, where the vote must be unanimous, and the other comprising the remaining members of the assembly, where the vote must be by a majority. And here, again, I ask, How are you going to adjust the Johnson amendment to these provisions? To do this you must certainly change the method of voting in these provisions. That is the third function of the assembly.

The fourth function relates to amendments. Article 26 provides:

> Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

Now, it is apparent that you can not apply the Johnson amendment to this provision without reconstruction.

From these illustrations it is manifest that if you are going to undertake to apply the Johnson amendment to the text of the covenant, you have got to reconstruct the whole covenant and insert in different provisions appropriate language to make it clear that these provisions cover the Johnson amendment. For these reasons I think the Johnson amendment is impracticable and will not accomplish the object it seeks.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COLT. I should prefer not to yield just at this point. I am about through. Instead of attempting to destroy the covenant, I think the best way to cure this inequality is by the reservation suggested by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. This reservation provides in substance that in any case in which we feel that this inequality has worked an injustice to us we shall not be bound; in other words, that we shall not hold ourselves under obligation to be bound by any decision, report, election, or finding of either the assembly or the council in which a member and its self-governing colonies or dominions have more than one vote. I believe that is the most practical suggestion that has been made, and that it is the only way that we can meet this question of inequality.

So far as the Moses amendment is concerned, the difficulty can be easily met. It can be met by the reservation of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]; it can be met by the Lenroot reservation. It is perfectly easy to meet that proposition; and let me tell you why.

Under the covenant the parties in interest are excluded from voting in a dispute, and we want the word "parties" or "party" to include the member and its self-governing colonies and dominions; and it is perfectly easy to do this by a reservation. I do not want to vote for the Johnson amendment, because I do not believe in any amendment to the treaty which calls for a resubmission to the other signatories; and, further, because I believe that this inequality can be met by a reservation.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, while I favor the adoption of reservations rather than textual amendments, and have, I believe, consistently followed that course and policy, still at the outset of the short statement I propose to make, I wish to say that I see no reasonable objection to the suggestion which has been made that if the treaty is finally ratified with reservations individual acquiescence on the part of three of the major nations should be required. I say that for this reason: If the reservations finally adopted by the Senate are unsatisfactory to other members of the proposed league, most assuredly they propose to say so; they must enter their objections. If, on the other hand, the reservations we make are satisfactory to them, or at least they feel that they should not enter formal objection because of many matters incidental thereto, then, presumably, there is no reason in the world, as I analyze the situation, why likewise they should not say so? So I can see no reason why, if the treaty is ratified with reservations, whatever the reservations may be, we should not insist on having them agreed to or acquiesced in by three of the nations, and that fact clearly stated.

In a speech I delivered in this Chamber a few weeks ago, I endeavored to make clear that, while I was in full sympathy with the objects sought by practically all of the amendments that have been offered, I felt convinced that they could be better attained by including strong, unmistakable reservations in our resolution of ratification, covering every one of these questions from the American standpoint, rather than by making textual amendments to the document. The former at least gives promise of a much earlier disposition of the whole matter, and all must admit that the latter means more delay.

Most naturally and properly, the intent of the amendment under consideration has been generally approved. Were I not convinced that a reservation to be later offered would provide even greater protection, or if I believed the question could not be covered by a reservation, I would without hesitation vote for the pending amendment. But, in my judgment, even this amendment would not protect America in a practical way to the extent that the reservations covering the same subject are designed to do. For instance, the treaty clearly provides that parties to a dispute will not be permitted to vote; I have been greatly impressed with the contention that, if America became involved in a dispute—say, with Japan—it would not make any difference whether America had 6 votes or 60 votes, she would be barred from voting. The passage of this amendment would in no way help that situation. The reservation which will undoubtedly be adopted, if the treaty is to be finally ratified, provides that in just such a case as cited no other country could cast, in effect, more than one vote, thus precluding Great Britain from using her 6 votes. If the reservation be not adopted, but the pending amendment be adopted, Great Britain's 6 votes would count, but America's 6 would be excluded from voting in any such hypothetical case as I have cited.

Which is more beneficial, a vote for temporary political expediency, because it touches a popular chord, or a vote for the lasting protection of American interests?

As stated, if there were no other way to correct this glaring inequality, I would unhesitatingly vote for the pending amendment, but I feel absolutely convinced that the method of reservation I have discussed protects America even more positively and completely and will accelerate action, which we certainly agree should be in great part the essence of our efforts.

It seems to me only reasonable to assume that textual amendments to the document mean necessarily a reconsideration on the part of the powers abroad collectively, just as amendments to any pending measure mean in any legislative or deliberative body. While, on the other hand, reservations, as I view them, and which view seems to be acquiesced in by high legal authority, simply present the terms upon which America agrees to or ratifies the treaty, and in our making reservations we in no way deny other countries the same privilege. True, in effect, these reservations may, and I grant it, amount to amendments, but precedents seem to establish that the method of consideration of reservations versus amendments is more simple, and probably will not require joint meetings of the parties involved, with their attendant discussions and disputes. If we adopt this amendment, is it not reasonable to assume that other nations would demand a like consideration? I am impressed with the view that our object is more practically accomplished by, in effect, reducing Great Britain's voting strength, rather than by increasing our own, which purpose I am confident will be accomplished by reservations to be later considered. If other countries demand similar understandings, we can have no objection.

When voting against this amendment, I want it to be clearly and emphatically understood that I propose to vote for reservations covering the same subject, and which, in my judgment, will protect America even to a greater extent than does this amendment. If the other countries, either individually or collectively, are not satisfied with the reservations we make, then the "scrapping" of the treaty is entirely up to them.

I further want it emphatically understood that if reservations are not included in our resolution of ratification which, in my judgment, will fully, completely, and unmistakably protect the independence and sovereignty of America, then I shall refuse to vote for ratification. Therefore there should be no question in the minds of the public as to the determination to protect this country fully and unequivocally on the part of those who believe that reservations are the most practical method to pursue.

I have always taken the position that the duty of the United States Senate was not to attempt to rewrite the treaty with the meager information at hand, but to protect the country we represent. The covenant as presented to the Senate is far from being a perfect instrument. Grave injustice has been done to some peoples, notably to China in the Shantung action, but the responsibility and censure for such wrongs will be placed by history exactly where they belong. While deploring such wrongs, however, I am interested, first, in the welfare and independence and sovereignty of the United States. I will support any and every reservation, no matter how strong the drastic, which I believe necessary to protect the United States. But beyond that I am satisfied to leave the rectification of others' wrongs to the future.

The adoption of amendments means more parleying and delay—delay and procrastination which will injure the United States tremendously. Business hesitates, restrained by the apprehension of uncertainty, and through this delay America is losing its advantageous position in the race for world markets and world trade. By the adoption of reservations which will specify explicitly the positive, concrete terms on which the United States ratifies the treaty and covenant, this precious time may be saved, and the sovereignty of the United States will be protected and preserved. What more can we ask?

I do believe, however, as we evaded no responsibility in time of war, we should evade none in time of peace, and that we should be a part of a league of nations with the protection I have briefly discussed fully determined. The league provides for consideration of threatened international disputes and dissensions, and such consideration entails no hardship and might prevent war. So, therefore, I am entirely ready for our country to contribute its moral influence, its moral power, and moral aggressiveness in cooperation with other countries of the world in endeavoring to maintain peace, but I am determined in so doing she will retain that control of her own destiny, which policy has made her great and will continue to maintain her power and influence for good, for peace, and for world tranquillity.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, other Senators have presented the impracticability of the so-called Johnson amendments. I want to point out infirmities beyond their mere impracticability. I wish to present to the Senate the gross inequalities of amendments that are proposed to prevent inequalities.

The first Johnson amendment reads—and I invite Senators' attention to the language of that amendment—

Provided, That when any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, which are also members of the league, the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league.

The object of this amendment, Mr. President, says the Senator from California, is to equalize the voting power of the countries; but the effect of the amendment is to make thrice unequal any inequality which by any possibility can be claimed to exist.

Now, let us analyze this amendment. The amendment does not modify in any way the previous clause of article 3 to which it is added except in the case of the self-governing British dominions or colonies. This previous clause reads:

At meetings of the assembly each member of the league shall have one vote.

But, of course, this is modified by article 15 of the league covenant, which provides that the parties to the dispute are excluded in the findings by the assembly. Now, I shall give but two instances of the gross inequality created by this proposed amendment.

There is no question but that Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India have one vote each in the assembly, separate and apart from that of the mother country, on every question except where the British Empire or any of its parts is a party to the dispute. Under the terms of this amendment the right of the United States to cast six votes is not dependent upon whether the British colonies can or can not vote on any subject in the assembly; but, because of the fact that they are merely members of the assembly, the United States can at all times and on all subjects cast six votes.

In other words, the United States can cast six votes on every subject except in a dispute to which the United States is a party. Then she can cast no vote. Neither can Great Britain nor her dependencies, under the just construction of this covenant, cast any vote when either Great Britain or any one of her self-governing dominions is a party to the dispute.

Suppose, for instance, that there is a dispute between the British Empire and Spain. Every member of the British Empire is excluded from voting. I know it is said that because these colonies are made members and given voting powers in the assembly they are therefore in some way separated from the mother country and are not parties to the dispute; but that will not stand the test of inquiry. In such dispute France will cast one vote, Italy one vote, Belgium one vote, Brazil one vote, and the United States will cast six votes, under the Johnson amendment. Now, do you suppose that France and Italy and Belgium and Brazil would for one moment consent to such an inequality?

But, for further elucidation, let us take a case where the British Empire is not a party to the dispute, where it and all of its colonies and dependencies would be entitled to vote. Suppose there is a quarrel between Sweden and Denmark concerning fishing rights in the Baltic Sea. These countries fail to settle their dispute diplomatically. One country brings the matter into the council. It is then transferred from the council to the assembly; and it is only in the assembly, of course, that the British colonies can vote. The assembly first attempts to effectuate a settlement of the difficulty. We will suppose that it fails to do so. Thereupon it proceeds, as it must, to ascertain what the true facts in the case are. The representative of Canada makes his finding. The representative of Australia makes a different finding, because these two representatives are not governed by the home country in their findings in any way whatever. The representative of New Zealand makes still another finding. Now, a compromise agreement as to the facts must be made before the conclusion has any binding force; and on the final determination of what the facts are we have Canada voting one way, because Canada casts her own individual vote without any control by Great Britain or any other country; we may have Australia voting with her, New Zealand voting against her, and South Africa voting against her, each voting its own separate conviction and itself casting its own vote. Then comes France, and she casts also one vote, which may be with Canada or against her. Then Italy casts one vote, which may be in accordance with the Canadian view, or it may be against it, and then the representative of the United States comes in and casts six votes. The United States' six votes would all be cast en bloc, because they would all be cast by one member.

So the United States, as a single entity, in every instance would have six votes as against every other country or every other colony represented in the assembly.

Thus, Mr. President, we are asked to give to the United States as a single entity a vote six times as great as that of any other power. I say six times as great as that of any other power, because Great Britain can not cast the vote of Canada or any other of its dominions, while the United States would cast its full six votes.

Mr. President, I want to take up now another matter to make clear the position that it is absolutely unnecessary, so far as a dispute between nations is concerned—in which case the nations are excluded by the terms of the covenant—to have an amendment that we shall have six votes to equal the six votes which are excluded. I know that some Senators have disagreed with the assertion that in a dispute with a country having dominions or possessions represented in the assembly all such representatives are excluded in any finding or decision, but those Senators who have disagreed can find no logical foundation for their disagreement.

The question was presented at our conference with the President about like this:

If we should have a quarrel with Great Britain, could Canada or Australia or New Zealand vote upon that dispute?

The President answered, in substance, no; because it is all one country, and the whole Empire is a party to the dispute; that a dispute with a part is necessarily a dispute with the whole, and a dispute with a dominant country is necessarily a dispute with all the dependencies and possessions of that country. The President not only declared that that was his understanding, but also declared that it was the understanding of the conferees, and it is borne out by every syllable in the covenant itself.

Before proceeding with that, Mr. President, I want to answer one innuendo that has been shot into the Senate and upon every platform in the United States. I am always willing to concede that anyone may differ with me materially, absolutely, unconditionally, upon every feature of this league of nations, and he may be just as true and just as much a red-blooded American as I am. All I ask of him is that he accord to me the same qualities of Americanism, even though my views differ radically from his.

I am not questioning the red-blooded Americanism of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], or of any Senator who disagrees entirely with me. But, Mr. President, I am getting a little bit tired of Senators swelling themselves to a bursting condition, thumping their breasts, and declaring that they are the only true, red-blooded Americans, and that anybody who disagrees with them is necessarily a traitor to the cause of America. Mr. President, there are too many great and good and intelligent men in the United States supporting this league, heart and soul, for anyone to challenge either their intelligence or their Americanism.

Red-blooded Americanism? Do I cease to be a good American because I believe that America has a conscience bigger than a flea? Do I fail to recognize American sentiment and true Americanism when I believe that America has in its red blood sympathy for other nations of the world? Does Americanism mean selfishness? Does true Americanism call for the attitude of a bully toward all who are inferior in power? A bully is ordinarily a coward, and America is not a coward.

Does Americanism mean the same as amphibianism, neither hot-blooded nor cold-blooded? Does Americanism mean that this country should go along with a chip on its shoulder, defying every other country on the face of the earth? If that is true, then I admit that I fail to recognize what is true Americanism.

I have always felt, Mr. President, that the best American is the American whose sympathy was the broadest, whose kindliness toward all the world was the greatest, and whose generosity was without measure. It is not true that the only way that I can be an American, a red-blooded American, is to be so everlastingly selfish, so everlastingly hoggish, that I can not look beyond the borders of the great American Continent and extend a sentiment of kindliness or sympathy or helpfulness to my brothers across the ocean. They were our ancestors, Mr. President. We are blood of their blood and bone of their bone. We can not damn them without damning ourselves. We can not accuse them of selfishness, of all the selfishness and lack of honor, devoid of any nobility of purpose, as we have been accusing them on this floor day after day, without accusing ourselves, their children, because we must have inherited some of those qualities from them. I love my own country best, but that does not necessarily mean that I have to hate every other country and become suspicious of every other country in order that I may be a red-blooded American. I have confidence in the intelligence of the great American people that they will be able to hold their own in any contest, mental or physical, with any power or number of powers of the Old World. I am not afraid that we will be outwitted and that we will be outvoted in all of our contests with the nations of the Old World. I can not recall a single instance in which we have gotten the worst of it in any matter we have ever submitted for arbitration or international settlement.

Mr. President, I hope that each one of us can have an honest view upon this question of the league of nations or against the league of nations without the imputation that the opponent of our views must necessarily be un-American.

I want to get now right down to the provisions of this league of nations. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in his discussion this morning said, in substance, that in my argument I did not intend to give a wrong construction, but that I have done so. Mr. President, I have not done so, and I can establish, beyond any possibility of doubt, that my construction of this league of nations is absolutely correct.

No matter how often one quotes the clear, unequivocal language of the league provisions, we find Senators who will still persist in making broad declarations that can find no warrant whatever in the wording of the covenant.

Senators still persist in the assertion that the council and the assembly created by this treaty have the powers of a court of arbitration, and that they will decide questions of international disputes as a court of arbitration or a court of justice; that Great Britain in such decisions will have six votes and the United States but one. Both propositions are contrary to any fair construction of the instrument.

Mr. President, I assert these general principles that have no exceptions or modifications in the covenant whatever, namely:

First. Neither the council nor the assembly can ever sit as a court of justice or as a court of arbitration in the settlement of international disputes.

Second. The only question of international dispute which can be submitted, either to the council or to the assembly, is the determination of what the true facts are in respect to any dispute and in suggesting a proper means of settlement.

Third. Mr. President—and this bears directly upon the pending amendment—in any dispute in which the British Empire or any one of its self-governing dominions is a party, all representatives of the dominant and the dependent countries are excluded from voting. Therefore, if any dispute in which the British Empire is a party arises, such empire not only does not have six votes but it has no vote whatsoever.

Fourth. The only case in which the self-governing dominions could have a vote would be a case in which the only question in dispute is between two other nations, and an investigation in that case would be merely to ascertain what are the true facts concerning the dispute.

Suppose there was a dispute between Serbia and Bulgaria and the dispute was brought to the council. In the council, of course, the British dominions outside of the dominant country, Great Britain, would have no vote, because the dominions are not members of the council. But if the dispute should be transferred to the assembly, then each one of those dominions would have a vote in determining what the true facts of the dispute were and recommending a basis of settlement.

We are, therefore, called upon to decide by these amendments, first, whether Canada, by reason of her entering into the war of her own volition, by reason of her four years of carnage to uphold the great principles for which we were battling, by reason of her mighty sacrifices in blood and treasure has earned the right which she demands to be heard in this lower body, this assembly, when neither she nor Great Britain is a party to the dispute, in investigating and passing judgment upon what the true facts are in reference to any dispute; and, secondly, whether there is any danger to the United States in allowing Canada a voice in the determination of such facts.

Mr. President, I proceed to analyze the covenant now to show that these declarations are supported by every line and every letter of the covenant. The first question is this: Has the council or the assembly any authority to act as a board of arbitration or to render any judgment binding in any degree upon any member? Section 11 has often been quoted for the purpose of bolstering up the suggestion and argument that the council or the assembly can pass a binding judgment on any question that may be brought before it. Nothing could be further from the truth. No one questions the fact that any member of the league may bring before the council or the assembly any circumstance or fact which such member thinks may threaten or disturb the peace or good understanding between nations. The door is wide open to present any circumstance, just the same as under our Constitution the door is wide open to the public to present any kind of a petition to Congress to petition Congress, for instance, to do that which, under the Constitution, Congress could not possibly do. We can not exclude a petition because it requests us to do that which is prohibited by the Constitution; but nevertheless our powers under the Constitution are quite clearly defined and limited.

So, Mr. President, the authority of the council or the assembly to act upon the circumstances presented is also clearly defined. The limitation to its action is clear and definite. What is it that the members who adopt the league are obligated to do? Article 12 sets out the only thing which they agree to submit to either the council or to the assembly and how they agree to submit it so far as relates to disputes. Article 12 reads:

The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council.

Mark you now, Mr. President, they do not agree to submit the matter to arbitration by the council, but simply to submit their dispute to an arbitration outside of the council or to an inquiry inside of the council as to the facts. That is made doubly clear by the succeeding article 13, which reads:

The members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

But the question arises, Submit it to whom or to what? That question is answered in the third paragraph of this article, which reads:

For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.

In other words, this matter of arbitration is to be settled entirely outside of the council and outside of the assembly. In the case of the United States we have already provided by covenant with many nations how our court of arbitration shall be constituted. That ought to settle once and for all this everlasting assertion that the council or assembly actually decides disputes.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] seems to insist that they must arbitrate these questions or else there is nothing to the league of nations whatever. That does not follow. The Senator may think there is no power back of the league of nations unless the league has the power to decide absolutely what this nation or that nation shall do. The real power of the league of nations is the persuasive power which will be found in public sentiment when that public can rely upon the facts that have been found by the league to be the true facts in any dispute. In other words, if the people of any country know that their country is wrong they will not allow their country to wage a war for such wrongful purpose.

Then follows article 15, which relates to the cases which have not been submitted to arbitration outside of the council or the assembly, and that article reads:

If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13—

That is, submitted to arbitration outside of the league—

the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council.

And again the question, Shall submit to the council for what purpose? It has been argued again and again that if they submit it to the council, they must submit it for either arbitration or the decision of the council upon the merits. But that is not the way the covenant of the league reads.

The first purpose is immediately answered by the third paragraph of article 15, as follows:

The council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful, a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the council may deem appropriate.

In other words, the moment the matter comes to the council, the council endeavors to effect a settlement. It exercises its good offices, advises and suggests in the effort to induce the disputants to come to some agreement. It may even, under this authority, go far enough to suggest what the council thinks ought to be done by the one or the other party to the dispute, but so far the only power to be exercised is the power of persuasion.

But, Mr. President, suppose that these efforts also fail to bring about a settlement. Then what is to be done? The very next paragraph answers the second inquiry. It is this:

If the dispute is not thus settled—

That is, by persuasion—

the council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

Now, Mr. President, that is the full authority and the limitations of the council when any dispute is presented to it. If the good offices of the council fail to bring about a settlement, then the council investigates the facts and makes a recommendation in regard thereto. If the dispute is removed from the council to the assembly, which must be done within 14 days after the dispute has been submitted to the council, if removed at all, when it reaches the assembly it is dealt with exactly the same as though it had remained in the council by the express provisions of the league—

Provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

The only binding decision that can possibly be made in the assembly, as in the council, is the final conclusion as to what the facts in any given case are.

Now, you will look in vain, Mr. President, throughout the entire provisions of the covenant, from article 1 to article 26, inclusive, to find a single word or sentence that gives to either the council or assembly the right to do more than exercise its good offices, and, if that fails, to find the facts and make a recommendation with reference to any dispute.

Therefore the only question that our neighbor, Canada, could vote upon would be a question of what the facts of any dispute are. For my part, Mr. President, I have confidence in her integrity, confidence in her judgment in such an investigation, and, I might add, confidence in the fact that these two great North American countries, with the same laws, the same history, the same ideals, the same moral and religious sentiment, will never be found to be very far apart in their conclusions upon a set of facts and their views concerning a just and righteous settlement.

Mr. President, we now come directly to the question whether Canada or Australia can vote in a dispute between the United States and the British Empire or between that Empire and any other country. No one questions that Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand are parts of the British Empire. It has been stated that inasmuch as we give them separate votes we recognize them as wholly independent nations. We can not and we do not recognize that which is not true and which we know can not be made true. They were given separate votes, not because they were not members of the British Empire, but because they were so sufficiently self-governing that they voted themselves into the war, that their sacrifices were protionally equal to those of France, of Great Britain, of Italy, and that inasmuch as this conference accorded a vote to every nation which had made a paper declaration of war against Germany, and which had not expended a single dollar nor furnished a single soldier in the great battle, it could not consistently deny an equal voting power to Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand, which had fought so valiantly and sacrificed so greatly to save the world from slavery, upon the simple question of the foundation of the facts in dispute.

Mr. President, I want to read a statement from Sir Robert Borden, premier of Canada, as to how and why Canada was accorded a vote independently of the vote of the British Empire. This is what he states:

In the end I proposed that there should be a distinctive representation for each dominion similar to that accorded to the smaller allied powers, and, in addition, that the British Empire representation of five delegates should be selected from day to day from a panel made up of the representatives of the United Kingdom and the dominions. The proposal was adopted by the imperial war cabinet.

These are the reasons, as he states, why Canada was accorded a vote.

On behalf of my country I stood firmly upon this solid ground: That in this, the greatest of all wars, in which the world's liberty, the world's justice—in short, the world's future destiny—were at stake, Canada had led the democracies of both the American Continents. Her resolve had given inspiration, her sacrifice had been conspicuous, her effort was unabated to the end. The same indomitable spirit which made her capable of that effort and sacrifice made her equally incapable of accepting at the peace conference, in the league of nations, or elsewhere, a status inferior to that accorded to nations less advanced in their development, less amply endowed in wealth, resources and population, no more complete in their sovereignty, and far less conspicuous in their sacrifice.

That was the theory on which Canada secured her right. Great Britain never asked that that right be accorded to Canada; she was perfectly willing to assume the responsibility of casting the vote for all of her dominions; but Canada and Australia refused to accept a position secondary to black Haiti, to blacker Liberia, to Uruguay, to Hedjaz, and to 20 other nations that never turned their hands over in the great world struggle.

Mr. President, giving them this vote, however, does not make them any the less members of the British Empire. Of course, Canada and Australia can not vote in the council, because they are not members of the council.

The ninth paragraph of article 15—and this is a graph upon which I base my argument—provides that ever pend-ency of Great Britain is excluded, as well as Great Br a her-self, in any dispute either with the mother country with any dependency, possession, or self-governing dominion. The ninth paragraph reads:

In any case referred to the assembly all the provisions of this article and of article 12, relating to the action and powers of the council, shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league—

Now, mark the words—exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof—other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

In order, therefore, to give any effect whatever to the finding of the assembly, the report must be concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented in the council; and I might add here that that concurrence must be by unanimous vote of the council, excluding the parties to the dispute, and, in addition, by a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute. In both instances it will be observed that there are eliminated both parties to the dispute, whether in the council or in the assembly.

This brings us right up to the major question: Can there be a dispute with a part that is not a dispute with the whole? That is all there is to this proposition. Can we have a dispute with a part of the British Empire unless there is a dispute with the whole British Empire? Have we ever had a dispute or a misunderstanding with Canada that we did not settle through the mother country?

Did we ever settle a dispute with Canada herself? Senators know well enough that we never did, and we never can, because Canada and Australia have no ambassador, minister, or other diplomatic representative in the United States; they are represented by the Empire itself; they are not represented, mark you, as separate entities, but are represented by the British Empire, of which they are a part. So, too, it is equally certain that when we have a dispute with England we are having a dispute with Scotland; we are having a dispute with Canada, Australia, Wales, and New Zealand. The dispute is with the power that represents the whole, not with each one separately. The question was asked the President at our meeting at the White House—I do not remember at which one—whether that was the view taken at the conference, and he answered in substance that it was; that we could not have a dispute with a dominion that was not a dispute with the Empire.

Mr. President, I do not doubt for a single moment that every nation represented in the Paris conference took that same view, the reasonable view, the only view, to my mind. I want those Senators who are present to stop a moment and ponder upon that proposition. I wish to say to them that France was represented at that conference by one of the wisest and one of the strongest men in Europe, M. Clemenceau. Does anyone believe for a moment that this great statesman, the old "Tiger of France," remembering how often in past centuries his country had been engaged in deadly conflict with the British Empire, regarded it as possible that Great Britain should have six votes to one accorded to France, or if France had a dispute with Great Britain, that Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India would be left free to outvote the interests of France 5 to 1? Such a conclusion, to my mind, would be an insult to the intelligence as well as to the patriotism of the great representatives of France, Italy, and every other country parties to the conference. None of them voted to give Great Britain that superior power, because every one of them understands clearly that any dispute with any member of the British Empire was a dispute with the entire Empire, and excluded that Empire and all its parts from any vote whatever in the controversy.

Mr. President, we have been laboring to meet not only every legitimate objection but every illegitimate objection to this treaty as well; and the assertion regarding the voting power of Great Britain has been so often published to the American people that I think we are justified in adopting a reservation which will place this question beyond cavil. For that reason some time ago I submitted a reservation which I still think should be adopted as the principal reservation in determining this question and placing it beyond any possibility of doubt. That proposed reservation is as follows:

That the United States understands and construes the words "dispute between members" and the words "dispute between parties" in article 15 to mean that a dispute with a self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in the assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein and that a dispute with such dominant or principal member is a dispute with all of its self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies; and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in the last paragraph of said article will cover not only the dominant or principal member but also its dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

That is what the President says is the true meaning of this article. That is what every nation that was engaged in it understands to be the true meaning; and the only people that have ever doubted it have been some Members of the Senate and those of the country who have been misled by their broad and unqualified statements. To meet that misleading view, I believe we should adopt this reservation.

But, Mr. President, it is alleged that by some kind of legerdemain these British colonies can also be made members of the council; and on this point I shall be glad to have the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who has taken a different view.

Even if they could be made members of the council, they would still be excluded in every case in which Great Britain or any of her dependencies might be a party; but, Mr. President, they could not in any event become members of the council. I not only find nothing to justify any conclusion that they could be made members of the council, but, on the contrary, I find that such possibility is carefully guarded against by the very wording of the instrument.

It will be observed that Canada and Australia and these other British Dominions are by the provisions of the league of nations covenant made members thereof. They are present members, and I want Senators to remember that. They are not prospective members, but they are members to-day as much as Great Britain and France and Italy. They are not in the list of those who are invited into its membership, but by the very terms of the instrument they are original members of this league of nations, and they can not therefore be included in those members who may be added. When you are already in a league you cannot be added to the league afterwards. "Added" means something outside that is brought in to swell the total number.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a minute, until I finish the sentence. They can not be added to the league, and thus they do not come in the category of those whose representatives, so added, may become members of the council.

Now I will listen to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator mean to say that if Newfoundland, for instance, which is a British colony, should hereafter be admitted to the league it could become a member of the council by proper action, and that Canada, New Zealand, or Australia never could be?

Mr. McCUMBER. Canada takes in all to-day; but whether or not you consider that Canada has such a broad, general sovereignty from ocean to ocean as would include Newfoundland in Canada, certainly Canada is a part of the league to-day, or will be when the league covenant is ratified. If Newfoundland could come in as a separate entity afterwards, and the United States and everyone else should vote to put her in, of course then she could be added to the league, because that would be an addition; but that would be an impossibility, a thing they never would do.

Mr. WATSON. Well, I know, but I am talking about the thing that might happen. The Senator's theory, then, is that Newfoundland, after being admitted to the league under those conditions, thereby becomes eligible to a position in the council. Is that right?

Mr. McCUMBER. If a country not a member, one that is not now a member of the league, one that is not one of the original members of the league, shall be voted into the league for a specific purpose, namely, for the purpose of being placed upon one of these classes in the council, then it could be done by the unanimous vote of the council, and by some of the members of the council voting themselves out. That, of course, would be within the realm of possibility. What I have been discussing is the question whether it is possible to add Canada or Australia or New Zealand or any one of these five dominions and make them a part of the council; and I am trying to make that so clear that there can be no question in the mind of any Senator in regard to it.

Mr. WATSON. I understand the Senator's position perfectly, because he and I have argued it a great many times.

His position, as I understand it, is that Canada, because she is a present member of the league, can not be eligible to a position on the council—never at any time in the future—but that if Persia, for instance, shall become a member of the league under proper conditions, Persia might become a member of the council.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. So that the present self-governing colonies of Great Britain that are members of the assembly never can become members of the council, and Persia, practically another colony of Great Britain—at least, Great Britain has control of Persia—may become a member of the council, so that the Senator discriminates between the different colonies of Great Britain.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator certainly does not regard Persia as a colony of Great Britain.

Mr. WATSON. Well, I will not call it a colony, but she has control of Persia.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think she has any more control of Persia than we have of Cuba, and I never have regarded Cuba as a part of the United States.

Mr. WATSON. I disagree entirely with the Senator. I think Great Britain has control of Persia—in fact, I think more control than she exercises over Canada.

Mr. McCUMBER. In any event, Persia is not a part of the British Empire. Nobody has ever claimed that it was a part of the British Empire. Nobody ever will claim that it is a part of the British Empire. We are but playing with wild suppositions in presenting a case of that kind.

Now, Mr. President, I want Senators to read article 4, which declares that the council shall consist of representatives of the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, together with representatives of four other members of the league, to be selected by the assembly from time to time; and until the appointment of the representatives of these other four members is made, Belgium, Brazil, Greece, and Spain shall furnish such representatives to this council.

I want Senators to distinguish, also, between members of the council and members of the league. The league members are not members of the council. The council is made up of the representatives of the members of the league, nine of them, and not the league members themselves.

Now, how can you add to this membership? How can you increase the number of the council? The second paragraph of article 4 answers that question. Let me read it:

With the approval of the majority of the assembly, the council may name—

And I want you to note the words—

The council may name additional members of the league—

Not additional members of the council, but—

Additional members of the league, whose representatives shall always be members of the council.

I want Senators also especially to notice that this second provision does not say that with the approval of the majority of the assembly the council may name members of the league whose representatives shall always be members of the council, but that the council may name additional members of the league. "Additional" means in adddition to the present members of the league. If it had been intended to allow representatives of any member of the league, either present or future, a seat in the council, the words "additional members of the league" would not have been used at all.

The second clause of the second paragraph carries out the same idea. It reads:

The council, with like approval, may increase the number of members of the league.

Not increase the members of the council who are representatives, but "may increase the number of members of the league." Now, you can not increase the number of members of the league by taking a present member and putting him in a position here or there. You have the same number in your league. You can only increase a number of members by taking in new members. I refer to those to be selected by the assembly for representatives of the council. Now, remember again that in this second clause the power is given to increase the number of members of the league. "To increase" means, again, the same as "add to"; and here I want Senators to stop and ask themselves what the purpose of this was. The purpose of providing that only additional members of the league could have a right to representation in the council, as is well known, was that Germany and Russia might in time become members of this league and be given a permanent representation upon the council. That was its purpose, and by the very terms of the provision it excludes the present members of the league from selecting representatives to become either permanent or temporary members of the council; and that, therefore, excludes all these British dominions which are at present members of the league of nations from ever becoming members of the council unless there is an amendment made to the very constitution of the league itself.

Mr. President, it is claimed that officials of other members of the league have written letters giving a different construction. I do not know all that politicians may have said to appease their constituencies, but I do know the way this covenant reads; and I further know that the letter which was quoted to the Senate as signed by Clemenceau, Wilson, and Lloyd-George, and sent to Sir Robert Borden, premier of Canada, does not say at all what it was claimed in the arguments before the Senate it did say. It does not say that Canada, as a separate entity, can become a member of the council, although that is the claim that has been made on the floor of the Senate.

The letter from Mr. Wilson, Mr. Lloyd-George, and M. Clemenceau, dated May 6, to Sir Robert Borden, premier of Canada, reads:

The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view that, upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article, representatives—

Not Canada nor Australia nor New Zealand but—representatives of the self-governing Dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council. We have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view. If there were any doubt it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles are not subject to a narrow or technical construction.

Now, stop and think. There is no statement that Canada could be made a member of the council, but that the British Empire could select a representative from Canada, or she could select her representative from Australia—she could select her representative from anywhere within the confines of the British Empire—she could select Mr. Borden instead of Mr. Balfour. It is the British Empire that is represented as a whole, as an entity, in the council, and her representative can be selected as well from Canada, from Australia, from Scotland, from Wales, or from old England herself. That, Mr. President, is all that is stated in this letter. You can not construe it into anything else.

Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to read the argument that was made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] yesterday. It was my intention to reply to it to-day. I have not been able to reply to it because it has not yet been printed in the RECORD, and I was absent upon other duties during the greater part of that argument. But I think I have made clear and definite the assertion that I started out to make, namely, that in any dispute between any country and any member of the British Empire no representative of either a dominion or of the home country can have a vote. Secondly, that the only thing which either the council or the assembly can decide in any dispute between nations referred to either is the question of the true facts upon which the dispute is based.

As there can be no vote by any party to the dispute, we do not need to increase our vote. As the only question upon which these dominions could vote would be upon an investigation of facts in disputes where neither they or the mother country are parties, such vote could never injure us.

As in legislative session,

Mr. WATSON obtained the floor.

INCREASED PAY OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES (S. DOC. NO. 140).

Mr. TOWNSEND. I submit the conference report on the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making appropriations therefor. I ask that the conference report and statement accompanying it be printed and lie on the table, and that the report be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making appropriations therefor, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That because of the unusual conditions which now exist, the compensation provided for in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920,' approved February 28, 1919, the following classes of employees shall be increased as follows for such fiscal year only:

"(a) Postmasters at offices of the third class; assistant postmasters, and clerks, including clerks at division headquarters of post-office inspectors, special clerks, finance clerks, bookkeepers, printers, mechanics, skilled laborers, watchmen, messengers, laborers, and other employees of offices of the first and second class; letter carriers in the City Delivery Service; employees in Government-owned automobile service; supervisory officials, inspectors, railway postal clerks, including substitutes, superintendents, requisition fillers, packers, and laborers; the agent in charge, clerks and messengers at the United States Stamped Envelope Agency, Dayton, Ohio; and employees of the mail equipment shop who receive compensation at the rate per annum of—

"(1) Not less than $1,000 nor more than $1,200, to be increased $200;

"(2) More than $1,200 and not more than $1,600, to be increased $150;

"(3) More than $1,600 and not more than $2,000, to be increased $125;

"(4) More than $2,000 and not more than $2,500, to be increased $100:

"Provided, That no third-class postmaster shall receive more than $2,000 per annum.

"(b) Carriers in the village delivery service, and other employees paid from lump-sum appropriations, receiving compensation at the rate of less than $1,000 per annum, to be increased 20 per cent of their present compensation.

"(c) Rural letter carriers on daily routes and rural letter carriers on two triweekly routes whose routes are—

"(1) Eleven miles or less in length, to be increased $75;

"(2) Over 11 miles and under 20 miles in length, to be increased $100;

"(3) Twenty miles and under 24 miles in length, to be increased $150;

"(4) Twenty-four miles or over in length, to be increased $200;

"(d) Rural letter carriers on triweekly routes of—

"(1) Eleven miles or less in length, to be increased $37.50;

"(2) Over 11 miles and under 20 miles in length, to be increased $50;

"(3) Twenty miles and under 24 miles in length, to be increased $75;

"(4) Twenty-four miles or over in length, to be increased $100;

"(e) Postmasters at offices of the fourth class to be increased by an amount equal to 15 per cent of their present compensation.

"(f) Substitute, temporary and auxiliary clerks at first and second class post offices, and substitute, temporary and auxiliary letter carriers in the City Delivery Service shall receive after the passage of this act for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, in lieu of their present compensation, a compensation of 60 cents per hour for each hour of service performed.

"SEC. 2. That the above-mentioned increases in compensation shall apply to officers and employees in the Postal Service at the time of the passage of this act, and be effective as of July 1, 1919, or as of such subsequent date when such officers or employees entered the Postal Service: Provided, That as to substitute, temporary and auxiliary employees, and employees paid from lump-sum appropriations, the increases shall be effective from and after the date of the passage of this act: And provided further, That none of the increases provided herein shall be applicable to officers and employees who have received an increase in their compensation of more than $300 per annum during the current fiscal year.

"SEC. 3. That no post office shall be advanced to the next higher class as a result of the increases in compensation of postmasters herein provided.

"SEC. 4. That in order to provide for the increased compensation herein authorized, so much as is necessary is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supplement the amounts appropriated for the various classes of employees herein mentioned, in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920,' approved February 28, 1919."

And the Senate agree to the same.

LEGATION BUILDINGS AT BANGKOK, SIAM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2250) providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam, which was, on page 2, line 5, strike out "made" and insert "conveyed."

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House. It is only the change of a single word.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent out of order to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the bill will be received.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the bill I am about to introduce is the railroad bill presented by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I am directed by that committee to introduce the bill and ask that it be read twice and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. After that is done I have another suggestion or report to make.

The bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Committee on Interstate Commerce has authorized and directed me to report favorably without amendment the bill just referred to the committee, and I ask that it be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. CUMMINS. In connection with the report that I have just made I desire to present a letter written to me by the Director General of Railroads, Mr. Walker D. Hines. The individual letter to me reads as follows:

DEAR SENATOR CUMMINS: I am sending the attached without thought of making it public, although it will be agreeable to me for you to make it public if you think it will be helpful in securing expedition.

The letter to which I refer was written on the 7th of October to Mr. ESCH, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, and to me, as chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate. If it will not unduly delay the remarks of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], I ask that the letter be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, October 7, 1919.

To Hon. JOHN J. ESCH, House of Representatives,
Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I know that you are exceedingly anxious to press the railroad legislation to the earliest possible conclusion. It occurs to me that you may naturally find that there are legislators that have not followed the subject as closely as you have and who may not have an equal appreciation of the reasons why the public interest necessitates the earliest possible solution. I therefore write this letter to point out that delay in legislation will seriously impair the public service by virtually suspending improvements and the acquisition of equipment and by seriously imperiling the morale of the railroad organization.

The difficulties I point out could not be obviated by the Government remaining in control of the railroads from week to week pending adoption of the legislation, because the suspension of the improvement and equipment program and the impairment of morale could not be remedied by such a course.

Pending the passage of railroad legislation uncertainty naturally exists. Such uncertainty makes it impossible for the Government to plan or carry forward necessary additions and betterments and to acquire essential new equipment. And such uncertainty likewise makes it impossible for the railroad companies to make such preparations.

In order to keep abreast of the growth of business in this country it is indispensable that the railroads should continue to spend large sums in the acquisition of new equipment, the enlargement and unification of terminals, and the construction of additional and the enlargement of existing shops, engine houses, turntables, etc., and in the carrying forward of normal programs for the revision of grades, construction of additional main tracks, longer and more numerous passing tracks, etc.

In the year or two prior to the beginning of Federal control this work was largely arrested by the difficulties of securing materials and labor and also by the difficulty of securing new capital. During the year 1918 this work was largely restricted to things which could be promptly done and which would have a relation to winning the war, and also restricted by the scarcity of materials. The result was that comprehensive programs for developing the railroads were largely interrupted. During the calendar year 1919 there has been unavoidably an almost complete stoppage of all these matters because of the prospect of early termination of Federal control and the resulting indisposition on the part of Congress to make appropriations large enough to provide for extensive improvement programs to be carried on with Government funds under the direction of the Railroad Administration.

Hence a vast amount of work now remains to be done which the intervention of the war has necessarily delayed and accumulated, and the result is that during the year 1920 very large capital expenditures ought to be made to make up for the interruptions inevitably due to the war and to prepare the railroads to serve adequately the increased traffic throughout the country. This is particularly true as to equipment, as it seems to be reasonably certain that in the fall of 1920 there will be need for materially more freight cars than will be available if the corporations are not able promptly to make plans for the additional equipment which the Government has been without provision to acquire.

In order to make the necessary preparations for additions and betterments, including equipment, it is obvious that considerable time must be allowed for planning the improvements and for raising the money. Even the physical planning for the improvements can not be successfully made until the legislation shall be determined upon, and the improvements can not be entered upon without knowledge as to how the money can be raised to pay for them; and the raising of the money will, of course, be dependent upon the fact and character of the legislation. Even 30 days' delay in the ability to make plans means a probably much greater delay in carrying the plans into effect; and if legislation should be so delayed as to prevent the definite making of plans until well along in the spring, the probability is that the plans could not be carried out at all in time to meet the railroad traffic requirements in the latter part of the summer and fall of 1920.

What I have said above with regard to capital expenditures, of course, does not affect the situation as to maintenance work on the railroads. The Federal control act and the contracts which the Government has made with the majority of the railroad corporations imposes an obligation to return the railroads to their owners in substantially the same condition as they were in when they were taken over, and the Railroad Administration is carrying on its maintenance work on this basis.

A different and entirely distinct element of great importance is the question of morale of the railroad forces. Undoubtedly uncertainty and suspense can not improve morale, and serious prolongation of uncertainty and suspense would very greatly impair morale. So far I feel both the railroad officials and the railroad employees are withstanding in a splendid way the injurious influences of uncertainty and suspense, but I am sure that it will become more and more difficult for both officials and employees to concentrate upon the present performance of their work rather than dwell upon the future condition of the railroad business and their relation thereto. This is an inevitable manifestation of human nature which is not subject to any criticism. But it is a fact, and the sooner legislation can be completed the sooner can a favorable influence take the place of the unfavorable influence which the uncertainty is bound to breed.

While I believe that you personally are fully alive to the importance of these factors, it has occurred to me that it might be helpful to you to have my views in regard to them.

Sincerely, yours,

WALKER D. HINES.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, on the 9th day of October following the receipt of the letter just read, I replied, and I ask that the Secretary may read my reply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OCTOBER 9, 1919.

Hon. WALKER D. HINES,
Director General of Railroads, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HINES: I have yours of the 7th instant referring to the reasons for the speedy passage of whatever legislation is to be adopted preliminary to the return of the railroad properties to their owners. I think the letter is very timely, and while I shall not make use of it for the next few days, I will make it public at the proper time.

I have realized from the beginning that it is impossible to secure consideration for railroad legislation until the German treaty has been disposed of, but I have been hoping that our committee would be able to present a bill to the Senate not later than the disposition of the treaty, and it is now fairly certain that this will be accomplished. I believe we will be able to make a report about Thursday of next week. It is my intention to do everything in my power to bring the bill forward for consideration by the Senate the moment the Senate is free from the present involving subject, and proceed with it just as rapidly as possible.

There is a movement not yet well defined or very strong for an adjournment about November 1, but I intend to oppose it with all the influence I can command. I think substantially every member of the committee is of like mind. It has seemed to me that two full weeks of steady work ought to secure a final vote on the bill. Your letter will be very helpful in bringing about steady work upon the bill, and it is my present purpose to put it before the Senate at the time we begin consideration.

Yours, cordially,

ALBERT B. CUMMINS.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the reasons stated by Mr. Hines, in the letter which has just been read, for a speedy disposition of this great problem are conclusive. I agree with him entirely that the Congress of the United States ought to give its consideration to it to the exclusion of every other measure that may be before Congress, for there is nothing so vital at this time as a proper, adequate solution of these great questions that are pressing upon us so severely for answer.

Mr. President, I have brought this letter to the attention of the Senate in order that every Member of the Senate may be advised that just so soon as the treaty is disposed of I shall bring forward the railroad bill, and whatever I can do, aided, I am sure, by every member of the committee, and concurred in, I am equally sure, by every Member of the Senate, I shall do to bring about a consideration of the subject until it is concluded.

I thought I ought to make these observations, because there is a feeling, and a very natural one, that we ought to get away early in November. I do not think that is possible. I believe that if the Senate were to adjourn before it has disposed of this question it would be subject to the condemnation of every right-minded man in America, for there is nothing that would be so disastrous to the commerce of America as a long delay in establishing a policy respecting the return of these vast properties to their owners.

I will only add that in addition to the verbal favorable report which I have made upon the bill, in order that it may find its place upon the calendar, I shall within a few days and before we can possibly reach a consideration of the bill, present a written report, reviewing as carefully as I can the provisions of the bill and their application to our affairs as they are now. It is quite likely that there will be a minority report which will be filed at the same time.

SUGAR SHORTAGE.

Mr. WATSON. I promised to yield to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] for a moment.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have been holding hearings on the question of the sugar shortage. I have here a statement from a committee of Louisiana sugar producers, prepared for the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I ask permission that the statement may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT FROM COMMITTEE OF LOUISIANA SUGAR PRODUCERS.

"During the war the Food Administration has prevailed upon all sugar producers supplying the American market to base their price upon cost of production plus a fair profit.

"Each time that the delegates of Louisiana sugar industry have appeared before the Food Commission or the Equalization Board they have been confronted with the statement that the public demands justified no greater price for sugar than was represented by the cost of production plus the fair profit mentioned.

"One year ago, in line with this ruling of the Food Commission, we, representing the sugar producers of the State of Louisiana, appeared before the Food Commission and presented tabulated cost sheets. Working from these cost sheets, the Food Commission settled upon a price of 8.82 delivered New Orleans per hundred pounds as the price of plantation granulated sugars. After the harvest season, which was a most trying one on account of excessive and almost continuous rain, the said price was proven by the balance sheets of many sugar producers in Louisiana to have been entirely inadequate. Nevertheless, the price was set and the majority of Louisiana sugar producers thereunder made a meager profit and many registered a considerable loss.

"We are now asked the question: 'What is a fair price for Louisiana to receive this year for its sugar and what our cost sheets would indicate?' We can answer this question in what we believe will be a perfectly satisfactory manner to your committee and in just a few words.

"The Government authorities have repeatedly and continually made the statement that the Louisiana sugar crop of this year is less than 50 per cent of a normal crop; that is to say, less than 50 per cent of last year's crop. During the course of the year all costs entering into the production of sugar in Louisiana have increased. This being interpreted means that by comparison with last year, when we made a meager profit or loss, we have expended on an acre of sugar land much more than last year, and from the Government reports, with which we entirely agree, we will harvest from the said acre less than half of last year's tonnage. Therefore the natural conclusion is that a fair price for this year's Louisiana crop would be a price far in excess of the present fixed price.

"We only desire, however, such a price as will avoid disaster and one that will encourage the cane producers to continue in the business and not further curtail their output. The Louisiana sugar producer does not desire to be placed in the position of being misunderstood by the sugar consumer in the marketing of this crop. The chairman of the Equalization Board, Mr. Zabriskie, on page 67 of the hearings before the subcommittee of which Senator McNARY is chairman, has made the following statements in answer to questions of Congressman MARTIN:

"Mr. MARTIN. In testifying before the Senate committee that investigated sugar Mr. Hoover made this statement in reference to contracts: 'Supposing that we had made no agreement with him (that is, the producer), during this shortage he would probably have sold his sugar at 25 or 30 cents a pound.' Do you agree with that statement?

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. I think it would bring 25 or 30 cents a pound.

"Mr. MARTIN. Then, by virtue of that contract, the consumers saved that amount and the producers lost that amount?

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. GLASGOW. The producers lost what they might have made.

"Mr. MARTIN. As a matter of fact, you had no trouble entering into the contracts with the producers?

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. They are all voluntary and they all lived up to their agreements.

"Mr. MARTIN. Now, you said something about the Louisiana crop; do you know how short that crop will be this year?

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. Well, our advice would indicate that they would not have more than half of what they raised a year ago.

"Mr. MARTIN. As a matter of fact, there are a great many factories there that will not turn a wheel.

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. Probably.

"Mr. MARTIN. Many will have to use this year's crop for the planting of next year's crop?

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. Yes.

"Mr. MARTIN. That being the case, even if they got 15 cents a pound, many of them will lose money.

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. I think they would, Congressman.

"Mr. MARTIN. It is a question how much they will lose. Is this short crop due to causes beyond their control, or is there any way for them to make a better crop?

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. Why, I think they exerted every effort to make a big crop.

"Mr. MARTIN. And it is due to shortage of labor and bad weather?

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. That is what out reports are.

"Mr. MARTIN. And upon a very material increase, also, in all the articles that go into the production of sugar?

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. Yes; that is true.

"Mr. MARTIN. Over last year?

"Mr. ZABRISKIE. Yes.

"This statement will unquestionably prevent the Louisiana sugar producer from being classed as a profiteer, and we believe no higher authority will be needed to safeguard us from being put in the class of profiteers, as Mr. Zabriskie has so correctly expressed the situation that prevails in Louisiana this year. Nevertheless, we realize fully that the average purchaser of sugar may not be thoroughly acquainted with these facts, and when such consumer is confronted with the situation of a sugar market in New York, say, 9 cents and a Chicago sugar market of 10 or 10½ cents and a Louisiana sugar market of a very much higher price he will be prone to believe that he is being unfairly dealt with by the sugar producer of Louisiana.

"The sugar producers of Louisiana have throughout the period of the war complied with every ruling of the Food Commission and have for patriotic reasons, like other sugar producers, sacrificed profit for the good of the Nation and have accepted a price which has netted them, we believe, for the two past seasons less than the average of a 10-year period, and this too at a time when they might have sold sugar at a price which would have made the industry secure for many decades against a period of lean years.

"Now that the war is over we are unalterably opposed to a continuation of the control of prices and the licensing system, and we believe that the untrammeled operation of the law of supply and demand should no longer be interfered with. Louisiana refuses to be put in the attitude of assuming the responsibility for either the scarcity or the high price of sugar for the approaching year, but we can not agree that the price of sugar be placed at such a figure as will mean ruin and disaster to the sugar producers of our State.

"In a spirit of fairness, and with the view of so adjusting prices and the marketing of the Louisiana crop, we have met and conferred with members of the Sugar Equalization Board, who freely admit that the Louisiana producers must sell their product at a very much increased price over last year in order to avert disaster, but take the position that without additional legislation they do not see their way clear to purchase the Cuban crop. This is a matter of which the Equalization Board is perhaps the best judge. We do not oppose the purchasing of the Cuban crop, but as the Sugar Equalization Board insist that they must have the additional power of license both for the domestic refiners and producers, we do not believe that the necessity of such purchase will justify the enactment of a law continuing for another year the power of licensing and price fixing.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have refrained up to this time from obtruding myself upon the deliberations of the Senate this afternoon to make a personal explanation, because I did not care to interfere with the orderly discussion of the Johnson amendment, and I do so now only because of the fact that it arises out of a question which I have hitherto presented to the Senate.

I had not intended to make any observations whatever respecting this question until the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate had reported upon the resolution, but yesterday the Federal Trade Commission issued a statement, going out under the name of the Federal Trade Commission as such, and therefore official in character. I shall not read all of the statement, but only those portions of it which have reference to me. The first charge—and I call it a charge—is this:

The bona fide of these charges is open to question when it is remembered that Senator WATSON was a lobbyist in 1909, as was shown in the report of the House of Representatives committee December 9, 1913, entitled "Charges against Members of the House and lobby activities," Sixty-second Congress, second session, Report 113.

Mr. President, this is a personal, direct charge against me. It has nothing whatever to do with the question at issue. It is entirely outside of problems legitimately to be discussed in the Senate or involved in the resolution. But, inasmuch as the charge has been made, and inasmuch as it is against me as an individual, now a Member of the Senate, I feel that I owe it to myself to say that this charge is 10 years old; that over and over again the charge was made against me in the State of Indiana, published in every newspaper, discussed by orators and speakers on both sides of the political controversies in my State; that when I ran for Senator it was everywhere debated and everywhere discussed, and the result of it all was a triumphant election to the Senate of the United States. This is old straw thrashed over until it is dust, and I would pay no attention to it here except to throw back into the teeth of the men who made it the answer of my people in the State of Indiana.

Mr. President, two committees were appointed, one in the Senate and one in the House, to discuss and deliberate upon those charges. To those deliberations I shall not refer, save to say that after weeks of hearings by the committee in the Senate they thought so little of the man that made the charges and so little of the charges that he made that the committee never even reported to the Senate. Over on the House side they did report, and they exonerated me, save to say that it was doubtful whether anyone who had had the influence that I had in the House of Representatives should afterwards use that influence for the purpose of obtaining fees even in a good cause; and that was the sum and the substance of their findings against me.

As I have said, this is old in my part of the country; old, in fact, in the country everywhere. Mr. President, these charges were made by Mulhall, who afterwards died in a poorhouse in the city of Chicago, unattended and alone, with none so poor as to do him reverence; Mulhall, who lies to-day buried in the potter's field, unknown, unhonored, and unsung; and while he lay in that hospital, desolate and unattended, a man who had done so much to traduce and vilify me, and all without cause, at that very time the people of Indiana were giving their answer to his charges by electing me to the Senate of the United States. That is my vindication from that charge, and upon that I am content to rest.

The other proposition is this:

His relations—

That is, my relations—with the Chicago packers are shown by certain correspondence which is here quoted.

Then it quotes from a telegram sent to John C. Eversman, 808 Riggs Building, Washington, D. C. I call attention to this telegram:

FEBRUARY 1, 1918.

Test vote before Senate Interstate Commerce Committee 2 o'clock to-day regarding Interstate Commerce Commission retaining jurisdiction over rate matters. It is of the highest importance to see Senator WATSON, who is on this committee, urging retention of such authority by the commission. Please see him before committee meets.

(Signed) E. P. SKIPWORTH.

He represented, as I am told, the Wilson Packing Co.

Senators, Mr. Eversman called to see me in accordance with the instruction here given, and talked to me about the situation before my committee, which I explained to him. He asked me about my position with reference to this, and I told him I was diametrically opposed to the views which the Wilson people took. Subsequently I voted, and if anyone cares enough to investigate the record vote in my committee he will find that I voted to take the rate-making power away from the Interstate Commerce Commission and vest it in the President. Then, afterwards, when I made a speech in this Chamber on the 18th day of February, 1918, I took very advanced ground, in as vigorous language as I could form and in as strong argument as I could fashion, diametrically opposite to what the Wilson people or the other packers wanted, so far as I have information.

And yet the commission says:

His relations with the Chicago packers are shown by certain correspondence which is here quoted.

That is what they say of my relationship to the packers when I voted diametrically opposite to the thing they wanted done and to the very request they had made at the time; and that is the thing the Federal Trade Commission, as an official body, charges establishes my relations with the packers of Chicago.

Senators, I do not believe, after a Senator in honest fashion and in good faith makes charges like those made by me in the Senate of the United States, that he ought to be hounded by anybody for those charges made on his responsibility as a Senator. I did not charge that the Federal Trade Commission was guilty of anything. They say "the charges made against the Federal Trade Commission by Senator WATSON." Senators will bear in mind and will remember that I made no charge against the Federal Trade Commission. They will remember that I stated specifically, if they remember it at all, that the members of the Federal Trade Commission and the great body of their employees were not either anarchists or socialists, and that the terms I applied to those I specifically named applied to them alone of all the men in their employment. I specifically picked out the men whose names I gave, in order that all the employees of the Federal Trade Commission might not rest under this imputation, and yet because I was specific I am to be charged now with something years old and with something that has no relation whatever to the question at issue.

How much better it would have been if the commission had said, "We challenge Senator WATSON to prove his assertions. If his assertions be true, these men are not fit to be employed by the Federal Trade Commission." Why did they not proceed in that fashion instead of trying to obscure the issue by charging me with things that have no foundation in fact and which constitute no basis of argument against the charge I have made or any answer to the protestations I have uttered?

Senators, that is all there is to this proposition. The true vindication of the Federal Trade Commission will be obtained in the trial of these charges. If the charges I have made be true, no amount of mud slinging will override their truthfulness. If the charges I have made be false, then anything they say about me personally can have no possible bearing on the issue involved. Therefore, as a Senator standing on this floor asserting my rights, all I ask is fair treatment and fair dealing by the Federal Trade Commission, which I have the right to demand, and by my fellow Senators, who some day may be placed in the same position in which I have voluntarily placed myself.

I may say that I knew that I would be thus charged. I even said to my secretary before I made the speech last Monday, "Now, listen to them howl about Mulhall." I knew somebody would do it, but that did not deter me. I believed that these people ought to be pointed out; I believed that this evil ought to be eradicated; I believed that if there are socialists and anarchists and "reds" in the public service the people ought to know it, and that we ought to use all the power at our command for the purpose of ousting them from office.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, does the Senator from Indiana recall how many Senators and prominent Members of the other House escaped Mulhall's condemnation in that investigation? My recollection is that the then Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and many other Members of that House and many Members of the Senate were mentioned in certain letters which were put in evidence at that time as being connected with lobbying activities, all of which was disproved.

Mr. WATSON. Yes. He had the habit of writing letters, running into the thousands, in which he gave alleged conversations with Senators and Representatives that had never occurred; and the Senators and Representatives went on the stand and testified that they had never met him, had never seen the man. That was his way of showing his diligence to his employers and of standing in with those who sent him here. I do not care to discuss him; he is dead; he has gone to his reward. It is not for me to say where he has gone, although I have a just suspicion. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think it is generally known that on the floor of this body and when I was a Member of the other House I have on various occasions taken the opportunity of criticizing the industry to which the Senator from Indiana refers, that of the packers.

I now desire to say to the Senator from Indiana and to the other Members of this body that for more than a month during the last session of Congress and for more than a month during the present session the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which I happen to have the honor of being chairman, have examined and considered documents which have been taken from the files of the packers, and nowhere can it be shown and at no time has it been charged that the Senator from Indiana has done anything to favor the packers or which in any way could reflect upon him.

I simply desire to make this statement because I think the statement made as appearing in the newspapers is unfair to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from North Dakota for his very just remark. As I have stated here, I never had any relations with the packers—I do not know them, never met one of them, and, of course, never had anything to do with any of them personally or politically. The only charge I made was that certain employees of the Federal Trade Commission were guilty of socialistic activities; and there is no use to throw mud, there is no use to fill the air with dust on a proposition of that kind. The question is, Is it true? And the only way to determine its truth is to investigate it. If it be true, anything that they may say against me can not injure the case or help those who may be convicted; if it be not true, then there is no use to throw mud, because the result will be the vindication of these men and of the Federal Trade Commission, which has employed them.

Senators, with me the question of socialism has been a lifelong study. I have perhaps made more speeches against socialism than any other man of my age who has not regularly been in the Chautauqua business in this country, and even on the Chautauqua platform over and over again I have inveighed in the most vigorous fashion against socialism and the socialistic tendencies of the time. At this particular juncture, when we are threatened with a coal strike, when, in fact, we are threatened with a universal strike of all labor, when off yonder in the distance, like a great, ominous cloud hovers the threat of a railroad strike, and when there is actually in progress a steel strike, it occurred to me that now is the time to sort out the socialist from the man who believes in American citizenship, in constitutional government, and in dealing with the great problems that confront and perplex us as a people in a sane and sober fashion. My firm belief is that the great body of American labor everywhere, wheresoever employed, is absolutely honest and absolutely patriotic; but there is the walking delegate, there is the socialist, there is the anarchist, there is the Bolshevist, there is the man who would overturn all of these institutions, built up at such great sacrifice, and convert this Government into a Russian soviet. Against that I direct my face, and I intend to continue in that course so long as I remain in this body.

I have no other ambition except to serve as a Senator of and for my people, and while I am a Member here I propose to hit socialism and anarchy whenever and wherever these hydra-headed monsters raise themselves, and no mud slinging can deter me from that course.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, October 24, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 23, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Be graciously near to us, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, as we thus pursue the journey of life through another day. Quicken our perceptions, broaden our views, uphold, sustain and guide us in all the duties Thou hast laid upon us, that we may prove ourselves worthy of such preferment. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HAZING IN THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD the reply made by the Secretary of the Navy and the Superintendent of the Naval Academy to House resolution 326, introduced by my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLY. Inasmuch as this information will be useful to many Members who have made similar inquiries, I make this request. I have consulted with my colleague, Mr. KELLY, and he is satisfied.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD the response of the Secretary of the Navy and the Superintendent of the Naval Academy to House resolution 326, as stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The response is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, October 17, 1919.

Hon. T. S. BUTLER,
Chairman House Naval Affairs Committee,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Replying to your letter inclosing resolution introduced by Representative KELLY of Pennsylvania, H. R. 326, the matter was brought to the attention of Admiral Scales, superintendent of the academy, and I am inclosing you herewith his letter and accompanying documents requested in said resolution.

Sincerely, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
October 8, 1919.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish to the House the following information:

(1) Whether or not published accounts of the recent attempted suicide of two midshipmen in attendance at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis are true, and if true, complete details in connection therewith.

(2) The extent of "hazing" in the Naval Academy, and the practices pursued in such hazing.

(3) The number of midshipmen who have resigned from the Academy during the past year and the reason therefor.

UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY,
Annapolis, Md., October 16, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Replying to your letter of the 10th of October, inclosing one from Representative M. CLYDE KELLY of Pennsylvania, I have to inform you as follows:

1. Midshipman Philip H. Seltzer, of Pennsylvania, attempted to commit suicide on Sunday, the 5th of October. He cut himself with a pocket knife and drank a quantity of ink. The Permanent Medical Examining Board states that he was suffering from phychosis, manic, depressive, and that the underlying neuropathy existed prior to entrance to the Naval Academy. Midshipman Seltzer has stated explicitly that his act was not due in any manner to hazing or running. A copy of his statements is attached hereto.

Midshipman Henry Clay Wetherstine drank a small quantity of iodine on Tuesday, October 7. It is not believed that this was a bona fide attempt upon his life, and there is lack of anything to base the belief that it was due to any ill treatment of any kind. He has made the explicit statement that it was not due to hazing or running. A copy of his statement is also attached. These are the only two reported attempts on the part of midshipmen to attempt suicide.

2. Since the occurrences noted above, every effort possible has been made to ascertain the extent of hazing practices at the academy. Several letters have been received which have alleged that hazing practices existed. Not in one of these cases has anything been advanced in the nature of a clue to assist the superintendent in determining the true state of affairs. No one has given any names, any dates, any facts, or stated any definite form that this alleged hazing has taken. The superintendent has examined closely into every complaint, no matter how indefinite, and has found not one bit of evidence to show that hazing exists at the Naval Academy. He has from the admissions of Midshipmen Seltzer and Wetherstine been led to believe that a mild form of running does exist, but neither Seltzer nor Wetherstine nor anyone else will disclose a single name, date, or definite fact. The superintendent reiterates his absolute disapproval of and aversion to any form of hazing or running, no matter how mild, and again states that he has used and will use every possible means to bring any offender to punishment.

3. The answer as to the number of resignations during the past year and the reasons therefor is appended. The reasons given in the appendix are those stated on the face of the resignation, which are believed to be in no sense exhaustive, but to state the writer's general state of mind. It is believed that the reasons may be summed up as follows: First, the signing of the armistice took away the incentive to remain in the naval service, as the necessity for them to do their part in the war ceased with the armistice; second, after a short trial many midshipmen realize that they are not suited to a naval career and very sensibly wish to resign; third, many find the course of study, the drills, the athletics, and the necessary discipline harder than they expected and not suited to their inclinations; fourth, the fact that the papers have so widely advertised of late the high cost of living and the difficulty a naval officer has to live upon his pay, creates a spirit of unrest among the midshipmen, and leads them to ask why they should undergo a four-year course of strenuous training to gain in the end a position with not enough pay to meet their necessities; fifth, for some unknown reason a rumor has lately persisted among the midshipmen that Congress intended to pass an act which would require them to remain in the service for at least 20 years after graduation; sixth, stories that many naval officers have desired to resign and could not do so have affected some midshipmen with a desire to leave the Naval Academy before graduation; seventh, there is a spirit of unrest at the Naval Academy with no adequate underlying foundation, just as there is in the rest of the country, and the "release fever," which swept over both the Army and Navy immediately after the close of the war, has had a marked effect upon the regiment of midshipmen.

Very respectfully,

A. H. SCALES.

Hon. JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Statement requested.

1. In compliance with verbal orders, I hereby submit the statement requested concerning the act which I committed on the afternoon of October 5, 1919.

2. At about 4.30 p. m. on the afternoon of October 5, 1919, I attempted to end my life while in my room, aided with a jackknife, ink, and a small bottle of iodine.

3. When I came in I did not like the service very much. However, I got along all right in drills until about one week ago, when the upper classmen came back. After that I was pretty far behind in every drill, and I just couldn't keep up with my work. I then began brooding over my grades in class, and this led to discouragement and worry. I was hazed a little.

4. As soon as the academic year begun our rooms were changed. Although my roommate was a pretty nice sort of a chap, whom I liked, I still was troubled, worried, and despondent, for the reason that I feared I would bilge, and did not have the courage to face the criticism of my people back home if I were dismissed.

Subject: Additional statement re attempted suicide.

1. As I said in my former statement, I was behind in everything and was worried and discouraged, and was anxious to get out because I was behind in everything, studies and drills.

2. In regard to hazing, it added a little, but if it had not been for the worry about studies, the little hazing would not have caused me to do it. This hazing was not real hazing but just running. Some upper classmen came into my room and made me stand attention. I always did this before they made me. They asked me questions such as "Where are you from?" "What is your name?" "How old are you?" etc., but none that I didn't want to answer. It wasn't really hazing.

3. I don't know the names of the upper classmen, but I might know some of them by sight.

Subject: Statement in regard to attempted suicide.

1. I drank the iodine hurriedly and without thinking, on the impulse of the moment. I didn't stop to pour it out, but just grabbed the bottle and drank it.

2. I didn't want to come to the Academy, and my mother didn't want me to come, but my father did. I didn't like it from the beginning, but stayed through the summer, not to disappoint my father and to give it a test. When the academic year opened I got behind in studies and didn't like the atmosphere of the whole place.

3. I was not subjected to any hazing. I was run, like the rest and no more than others of my class, such as standing at attention, doing stoop falling, answering questions, etc. It wasn't the running, it was just that I couldn't stand the whole place. I could never get along here, and that made it hard. I asked my father to let me resign, and he didn't want me to. I thought I could never get along here, and that made it hard, and I wanted to get out. I don't blame it on any running or hazing or any particular thing.

4. There was no immediate reason or particular thing which caused me to drink it. Nothing unusual had happened just before it. I had just got back from drill and was discouraged and depressed. I don't know what made me do it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 3143. An act to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2890. An act to provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes; and

S. 3037. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer free of charge certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. UNDERWOOD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

TITLE TO MINERAL LANDS IN UTAH.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, without reading, a joint memorial from the Legislature of the State of Utah, passed at a special session last week, respecting the question of title to mineral lands granted to the State under the enabling act approved July 16, 1894.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Utah. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The memorial referred to is as follows:

STATE OF UTAH, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.

This is to certify that the document hereto attached is a true copy of senate joint memorial No. 1, passed by the Legislature of the State of Utah at a special session convened on the 29th day of September and adjourned on the 6th day of October, 1919, petitioning the Congress of the United States to pass necessary legislation to determine the question of title to mineral lands included in sections of public lands granted to the State under the enabling act, approved July 16, 1894, and for other purposes, as the same now appears of record in said office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah at Salt Lake City, in said State, this 17th day of October, 1919.

[SEAL.]

HARDEN BENNION,
Secretary of State.
By JERROLD R. LETCHER,
Deputy.

Senate joint memorial 1.

Petitioning the Congress of the United States to pass necessary legislation to determine the question of title to mineral lands included in sections of public lands granted to the State under the enabling act, approved July 16, 1894, and entitled "An act to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that:

Whereas the United States, by section 6 of an act approved July 16, 1894, entitled "An act to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," granted to the State of Utah for the support of common schools certain sections of every township in said State, to wit, sections 2, 16, 32, and 36, and provided for lands in lieu thereof where said named sections or any part thereof in any township were unavailable; and

Whereas in said same act it was provided that certain public lands were to be granted to the State upon its admission into the Union for the purpose of constructing public buildings and for the university and agricultural college, and for the purpose of building permanent water reservoirs for irrigating purposes, and for the establishment and maintenance of an insane asylum, and for the establishment and maintenance of a school of mines, and for the establishment and maintenance of a deaf and dumb asylum, and for the establishment and maintenance of a reform school, and for the establishment of a State normal school, and for the establishment and maintenance of an institution for the blind, and for a miners' hospital for disabled miners; and

Whereas the State of Utah has sold and disposed of large parts of said lands so granted by the United States under the impression and with the understanding that it had full title thereto regardless of whether said lands were mineral or otherwise; and

Whereas said grantees purchased said lands under the impression and understanding that the title in said lands was in the State; and

Whereas it was the understanding and impression of the executive officers dealing with said lands, and of the State of Utah, that said lands were granted by said enabling act to the State of Utah with all mineral rights included; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the United States against Sweet, administrator of Sweet, has held that the school section granted, contained in the enabling act and known as section 6 of said act, was not intended to embrace the land known to be valuable for coal, and has further held that lands known to be mineral at the time of the taking effect of said grant were reserved to the United States; and

Whereas said decision has worked a hardship on those purchasers who purchased school lands under the impression and with the understanding that they obtained full title from the State; and

Whereas the State of Utah is unable to determine in any case just what lands were known to be mineral at the time of the taking effect of said grant, and is thus unable to determine just what lands the State of Utah has title to and what it has not title to, and is unable to assure purchasers or prospective purchasers as to the title to such lands; and

Whereas lands which are now found to contain minerals or thought to be mineral lands upon investigation by the Department of the Interior, and which were included in the sections conveyed by the United States to the State of Utah and sold by the State of Utah to purchasers for the purposes designated in the enabling act, are being disposed of or attempted to be disposed of by the Department of the Interior as property of the United States; and

Whereas in each case where said attempted disposition is made by the United States a contest between the State and the United States, or between a purchaser of the United States and the State, or between a purchaser of the State and the United States, is entailed; and

Whereas there have been a great many of such contests, and under the present state of affairs a likelihood of many more contests of like nature will take place, leading to the unsettlement of titles and supposed rights, and will tend to confusion; and

Whereas the State of Utah is unable to determine in many cases just exactly what land it owns, and therefore what it may sell, to the great detriment of the common-school funds and the purposes for which said lands were granted; and

Whereas it is deemed that said state of affairs should be remedied by proper legislation of Congress: Now, therefore

The governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully petition that necessary legislation be enacted by the Congress of the United States whereby it may be determined what sections granted by the enabling act to the State of Utah for the purposes therein mentioned belong to the State of Utah, and that some certain and workable method be instituted for determining without contest in each particular case what lands sold by the State to purchasers really belong to the said purchasers or belong to the United States.

Passed October 4, 1919.
Approved October 8, 1919.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—TAGUE AGAINST FITZGERALD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODALL].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter, involving some of the highest privileges of the House, and I think there ought to be a larger attendance here to hear the discussion. Therefore I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 2, I call up the contested-election case of Tague versus Fitzgerald, and pending that I desire to make an arrangement upon time for debate. I ask unanimous consent that debate be confined in time to four hours and a half, that the chairman of the committee have control of 1 hour and 45 minutes of that time, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] have control of 2 hours, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] have control of 45 minutes; that at the conclusion of debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution of the committee and two substitutes, one to be offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] and one by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]; and that the chairman of the committee be permitted to yield time to the contestant.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine, chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 2, calls up the contested-election case of Tague versus Fitzgerald, and asks unanimous consent that there be four hours and a half of debate, one hour and three-quarters of that time to be controlled by himself, 2 hours by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET], 45 minutes by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]; that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution of the committee and on one substitute to be offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] and one to be offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]; and further, that the chairman of the committee shall be permitted to yield time to the contestant. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, your committee has held many meetings and carefully studied the voluminous testimony taken in Boston before notaries public given by sworn witnesses in the contested-election case of Tague against Fitzgerald. This testimony gave overwhelming evidence of the illegal registration of voters in ward 5 in Boston, particularly in precincts 4, 8, and 9. The contestee introduced no evidence to refute these charges. It is the opinion of seven out of nine of the committee that in order to punish the perpetrators of this fraud that the contestee, Mr. Fitzgerald, should be unseated. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] agrees with the majority of your committee as to the fact that there was a wholesale illegal registration in that ward, but does not agree as to the proper remedy. The other six of your committee are of the opinion that on acccount of this illegal registration in these precincts the entire vote of precincts 4, 8, and 9 of ward 5 should be thrown out, for which action there are innumerable precedents in the reports of contested congressional election cases. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] favors a new election. This, in the opinion of the majority of your committee, would be very unfair and unjust to the contestant, inasmuch as the principal fraud and illegal registration claimed existed primarily in these three precincts, and so far as the evidence shows, the vote of the remainder of the congressional district remained apparently pure. Provided, however, that there should be a new election, it is but fair to presume that Mr. Martin Lomasney, the so-called political boss of ward 5 in Boston, would pursue his usual illegal practices, which have admittedly been in vogue for 20 or more years; in fact, he has been at this game for so long that it has practically become a habit. "A leopard can not change his spots." The minority views claim that the contestant, Mr. Tague, does not come into court with clean hands, inasmuch as he was formerly elected to Congress under these illegal practices, and so received the benefit of them. I contend that he did not receive any benefit from these illegal practices in his prior election, for if all of the ballots in ward 5 had been thrown out, he would still have had a plurality of about 2,000. In the present case the ballots cast in ward 5, on the face of the returns, showed that the contestee, Mr. Fitzgerald, was elected by a plurality of less than the ballots of these three precincts, and consequently he benefited by this illegal registration. Therefore the two cases are not parallel.

It is the opinion of the majority of your committee that the contestee, Mr. Fitzgerald, be unseated, and that the contestant, Mr. Tague, be seated, thus teaching Mr. Lomasney and his willing tools, while they have been able to put this fraud over the people of Boston for a good many years, that they can not ride Congress in the same manner. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GALLIVAN. May I ask how much time the gentleman used?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for two hours.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. A moment ago when I was discussing this matter as to its disposal with the chairman of the committee I understood that Mr. LEHLBACH was to follow.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman has not the floor.

Mr. GALLIVAN. He is making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GALLIVAN. That is for the Chair to decide.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wanted the House to understand there was some misunderstanding. And I think the gentleman from New Jersey should be courteous enough to this side of the House to permit my statement to be made in all honor.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, in an ejectment suit at common law the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title and not upon the weakness of defendant's title. The contestant, Mr. Peter F. Tague, has attacked the title to the office now held by the contestee, Mr. Fitzgerald, and the law of the land and the precedents adopted by Congress cast upon Mr. Tague the burden of proving the charges he has made in order for you to unseat the contestee.

Mr. Speaker, I confess I went into the investigation of this case with my mind inclined toward the side of the genial and affable gentleman, the contestant. We are all human beings, and none of us are perfect. I had heard the story from one Member and another of how the contestant had been defrauded in the election, and unconsciously my mind had become inclined toward contestant's side of the case before I had ever read the record or given it any study. I repeat that when I undertook to investigate the merits of this controversy I was just a little bit prejudiced against the contestee, because no one had spoken to me about his side of the question, and unconsciously I found myself leaning against him. Possibly some of you gentlemen can appreciate my position. You have served with Mr. Tague in this House for the past four years. You have learned to like him, as he has a cordial handshake and a pleasant smile for everyone, and I know you must have been impressed with the story you heard concerning the wrongs he suffered at the hands of Mr. Fitzgerald and Martin Lomasney, the alleged political boss of ward 5 in the city of Boston. I shall ask you to lay aside any bias or prejudice that may be resting on your minds either for or against the parties so deeply interested in the result of this contest, and follow me while I undertake to show you how I reached the conclusions set forth in the minority views filed by myself and Mr. JOHNSTON of New York. When you are called upon to pass on the title of the office of one of your fellow Members you are asked to discharge a very sacred and solemn duty. You should approach the trial of this case with the same feeling of responsibility that an impartial jury entertains when it is empaneled to decide questions submitted to it for its consideration.

I have no personal interest in the case. I am a member of the Committee on Elections to which the contest was referred, and I am simply trying to discharge my duty as a member by giving to you the reasons that impelled me to dissent from the majority report.

A number of charges are made by contestant, but the committee found no evidence to sustain the charges of bribery, coercion, and intimidation. The majority of the committee, however, were of the opinion that fraud existed to such an extent in ward 5 that they were authorized to throw out the three election precincts in that ward, which would give the election to Mr. Tague. I dissented from this view, and before I shall conclude my argument I shall endeavor to convince you that my position is correct.

Mr. Tague stated before the committee and also in his brief that there were several hundred ballots cast for him with stickers thereon without a cross, and if these ballots were counted for him there would be more than enough of such ballots to overcome contestee's plurality. Under the laws of the State of Massachusetts a vote for a candidate can not be counted unless the voter makes a cross mark on the ballot opposite the name of the person he intends to vote for. The contestant was defeated in the Democratic primary and ran as an independent candidate. He demanded a recount of the ballots in the primary election, and contends that owing to the delay incident to the recount he was unable to have his name printed on the regular ballot and was forced to use stickers or pasters, on which his name was printed. These stickers were mailed by Mr. Tague and his friends to the voters of the district, with instructions how to use them; but when the election was over it was discovered that a number of these ballots, with the name of Peter F. Tague on them, were without a cross, as required by law, and were not counted by the election officials. Mr. Tague laid great stress on the fact that if these ballots which I have described were counted in his favor he would be elected. The committee unanimously agreed that these contested ballots should be brought before us, and accordingly we sent for them. One by one we carefully examined these ballots, and every ballot with the name of Peter F. Tague, John F. Tague, William H. Tague, or simply Tague, although it had no cross, as required by the Massachusetts law, was counted for Mr. Tague.

The committee decided that if the voter went to the trouble to paste a sticker on the ballot with Mr. Tague's name on it, even though the ballot did not have the cross, it clearly showed that the intention of the voter was to vote for Mr. Tague, and, as I have stated, every one of such ballots was counted for Mr. Tague, and Mr. Fitzgerald is still ahead by several votes. The committee even went further than that. There were among the contested ballots 10 blank ballots that were not counted by the election officials for anyone. These ballots had on them the name of Mr. Fitzgerald and the name of the Republican candidate for Congress, but there was no cross opposite either of these names, and as it was impossible to ascertain for whom the voters intended to vote, these ballots were not counted for anyone, but, as I have stated, the committee counted these 10 blank ballots for Mr. Tague, for the reason the majority of the committee contended there was a cross below the names on the ballot opposite a blank space, and the presumption was that at one time stickers had been pasted on them and had dropped off, but there was no evidence before the committee to this effect, and no stickers were found among the ballots. As the case stood after an examination of the ballots, when the committee gave Mr. Tague everything he claimed, contestee had a plurality of 10 votes. To overcome these 10 votes so that contestant could win it was only necessary to prove 11 cases of illegal registration.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there? Will the distinguished gentleman from Georgia yield for a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. If I understand the gentleman, Mr. Tague ran against Mr. Fitzgerald in the Democratic primary and was defeated?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. And that he did not abide by the decision of the primary, and he then, after being defeated in the Democratic primary, ran as an independent candidate and was again defeated.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman from Texas is correct, and now he brings his contest to this House. He comes before the House and says he is defrauded out of the election, and I would like to ask you gentlemen of the House if it is not usually the case in a close election that charges of fraud and corruption are made?

Mr. SHERWOOD. How many votes was Mr. Tague defeated by in the primary?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Fifty votes. I shall be glad to answer any questions, because I have carefully studied this case with a view to ascertaining the truth.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia what was the result of the primary contest in which Mr. Tague failed to win? In other words, what was the verdict of his party in the matter of votes? What was the difference?

Mr. OVERSTREET. As I stated a few minutes ago, Mr. Tague was defeated by 50 votes in the Democratic primary.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman answer me further?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will try to do so.

Mr. JUUL. Did Mr. Tague allege fraud in the primary election?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; he alleged fraud in the primary, but this committee did not undertake to find out whether there was fraud in the primary or not. We went thoroughly into all the questions of fraud in the election. The contestant charged that there was bribery, coercion, intimidation, bossism, and fraud, but this committee found that none of these charges were sustained, except that a majority decided there was sufficient evidence of colonization in ward 5 as to authorize them to throw out the three election precincts in that ward.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I have understood there were some voters that did not spell Mr. Tague's name correctly. Were those votes counted for Mr. Tague?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; every one of such votes as you mention was counted for Mr. Tague, whether his name was correctly or incorrectly spelled.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And still he did not have enough?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; Mr. Tague still lacked a sufficient number of votes to elect him after all these ballots were counted for him, as I have just explained.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. I understand the committee gave him the benefit of these votes. But you gave it to him because you felt it was the intention of the voter to vote for him?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly.

Mr. RICKETTS. You did not give him any favor, but simply tried to carry out the intention of the voter?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly so. We knew that we were disregarding the election laws of the State of Massachusetts, but we thought we had a right to see that the voters' intention was carried out if that intention could be ascertained.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. VENABLE. I have read the report. I have not had an opportunity to read the hearings. It seems that both the majority and minority of the entire committee agreed on the proposition that the gentleman has been discussing.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. VENABLE. After taking all the votes that were cast, and resolving every doubt in favor of Mr. Tague, Mr. Fitzgerald is still elected?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir.

Mr. VENABLE. The majority report, however, proceeds on the theory—and that is the only basis of the majority report—that there was certain illegal registration and voting in certain precincts, and a majority of the committee takes the view that the law requires that these precincts shall be disregarded altogether?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly.

Mr. VENABLE. And reached the conclusion that Mr. Tague is elected by casting out these precincts?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir.

Mr. VENABLE. So that it seems to me that the only material questions in this case before the House are these: First, what is the proof developed at the hearings, if any, that there was illegal registration and voting? And second, if that is established, what is the proper law to apply?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the gentleman is stating the proposition correctly.

Mr. VENABLE. I would like to ask another question for my own benefit, because I think that is the thing that my own decision will turn upon. What is the proof that there was illegal registration and voting?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am going to get to that directly.

Mr. VENABLE. That is the only question at issue, in my opinion.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I did not intend to explain this matter until I got further on in my statement, but I will answer it right here if the gentleman desires.

Mr. VENABLE. I do not want to interfere with the order of the gentleman's speech, but that is the only question in my mind.

Mr. OVERSTREET. You are exactly right. The charges of intimidation, vote buying, and coercion were not sustained.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. How about registration?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am going to answer that question now. There were in ward 5 of the city of Boston, over 22,000 male citizens on the 1st of April, 1918, six months before the election, yet but only 4,800 of these 22,000 possible voters were registered on election day in November. Could any stronger answer be made to Mr. Tague's charge of colonization? All of the witnesses stated that they were listed and registered in ward 5 where they live, and nowhere else. Now, if these men lived there, intending that it was their domicile, they can not be listed elsewhere, and without listing them they would not be entitled to vote elsewhere. Every man must have a domicile. It is undisputed that he has a right to choose his domicile. In the case of a man having more than one home, he has the right to select either place as his domicile. In the case of men moving from place to place, it is clearly their right to choose their domicile, and the question of "domicile" is a question of intent. Contestant attacks the right of many persons to vote where listed and registered in ward 5, claiming that they have no legal domicile there. There is not one case of illegal registration conclusively proven. There was no proof that a single illegal vote was cast for Fitzgerald. The evidence shows that there are in ward 5 a great many places where men live only for a short while, and who move from place to place. There are many unfortunate men who are compelled by force of circumstances to live in cheap places and to move about continually, but such men undoubtedly have the right to a domicile and the right to vote. These men can not be disfranchised because they happen to live in a different house or on a different street on election day than they did at the time they were listed by the police. In Boston, in order to vote, men must be listed where they reside the 1st day of April. If they are so listed, they have a right to vote from such residence if qualified and registered. All of the witnesses state that they were listed and registered in ward 5 and nowhere else, as I have previously stated.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir.

Mr. VENABLE. I understand from the gentleman's report that this district lies in the business part of the city of Boston?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir.

Mr. VENABLE. The gentleman says in his report that there are a good many men in the city of Boston who resided at one time in this district whose work carries them into different places?

Mr. OVERSTREET. One minute, please. Mr. Speaker, do these interruptions come out of my time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair ought to state to the gentleman that if he yields any time, he yields his own time.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I want to answer all questions, but I desire to conserve my time as much as possible. Will the gentleman please make his questions short?

Mr. VENABLE. The gentleman contends that these men, because of the registration laws of Boston, because their work carries them around to different parts of the city or the surrounding country, must locate some place as their domicile in order to have their names turned in and in order to qualify to vote under the Massachusetts statute?

Mr. OVERSTREET. You are correct.

Mr. VENABLE. Is there any proof as to these men who have their names given out as voting in those places for fraudulent purposes? Is the proof there? I am assuming that it may be necessary under the statutes of Massachusetts for a man to have had a place as his permanent domicile for voting purposes, although his business necessitated his being elsewhere. Is there any proof that any of these men had their names given out as being domiciled at these various boarding houses and hotels with the fraudulent purpose to vote in that district, when, as a matter of fact, they were domiciled for voting purposes elsewhere, and entitled to vote somewhere else, and hence not entitled to vote in this particular precinct?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will answer the gentleman's question. I want to say this, however, that I will be glad to answer all questions if I can, provided it does not take up too much time, but I have got to hurry along, as all my time has nearly expired. I will state to the gentleman that the majority of the committee is of the opinion that a number of the voters in this election were fraudulently registered, and that they were not bona fide residents of the district in which they voted. I desire to state, however, that I differ with the majority of the committee on this point, because I do not think that the allegations of fraudulent registration, as made by Mr. Tague, have been proven.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the evidence show that the name of each one of these men registered from these precincts was given to the police officer who came around for that purpose?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I was going to refer to that. Here is what the record shows. Under the Massachusetts law, when you have registered one time, you are registered for all time, provided you keep your taxes paid, and are properly listed on the 1st day of April each year. The record shows that these men had given their names to the listing officers, as was required by the Massachusetts law, and their names were on the registration list. Some of these men have been voting for several years from the same place. When Mr. Tague was first elected to Congress some of these same men whom he is endeavoring to disfranchise supported him.

Mr. Lomasney, referred to as "Boss Lomasney," was Mr. Tague's strongest supporter at that time, but afterwards he saw fit to support Mr. Fitzgerald, and Mr. Tague now charges that he is a corrupt politician. I take the position that all these men whom Mr. Tague is endeavoring to disfranchise had the right to vote under the evidence before our committee. They were citizens of Boston. They were regularly registered, as required by law. They had not voted at any other election precinct, and proof before the committee utterly failed, in my opinion, to show that there was fraudulent registration.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not think I can, as I have not the time.

Mr. JUUL. I will make it very brief. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Just for a minute.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that I am going to talk for a half hour, and he can ask me and I will answer his question.

Mr. JUUL. All right.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Was it shown that any of these gentlemen were not qualified voters or American citizens?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, sir. On the other hand——

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. What does the evidence show as to the residence of the contestant and contestee? Do they both live in the district?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The evidence is that the contestee lives in an adjoining district.

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. He does not live in that district?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, sir; I believe that is conceded.

Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen on the floor of the House have asked me concerning the two years' salary that Mr. Fitzgerald offered Mr. Tague if he would retire from the contest. The only evidence there is in the record concerning this matter is the statement of Mr. Tague himself, who said that Martin Lomasney told him that probably Mr. Fitzgerald would be willing to yield to him the salary for two years if he would withdraw his contest. Mr. Lomasney himself denied the statement, and Mr. Fitzgerald testified that he made no such statement to Mr. Tague nor authorized Lomasney or anyone else to make such a proposition to Mr. Tague. Mr. Tague contends that this man Lomasney told him some time during the year 1917, soon after he voted for conscription, that he intended to defeat him for Congress at the next election. Mr. Tague says that from the time he cast that vote in the House, Mr. Lomasney began to fight him and continued the fight until the date of the election, and yet, in March, 1918, judging from a letter written by Mr. Tague to Lomasney, one would conclude that their relations were the most friendly, and in writing the letter to Mr. Lomasney, Mr. Tague addressed him very familiarly as "Dear Martin," and signed himself as "Yours, Pete."

In order to declare him elected, the contestant would have you throw out three election precincts, which would be a very dangerous precedent for this Congress to adopt, and especially in view of the fact the records show that the only evidence pointing to fraudulent registration was given by Mr. Tague himself, who got his information from investigators hired by him to ascertain whether certain voters resided in the district, and Mr. Tague himself testified to what these men told him. This testimony was hearsay, and would have been inadmissible in any court in this country.

I respectfully submit that contestant has not carried the burden successfully, and has not made out his case. This is not a case in which partisan bias or prejudice can take any part, because both gentlemen are Democrats. You are not bound to be governed by the majority report. While it is true that only two members of the committee signed the minority views, I, nevertheless, feel that these views are correct. Being in the minority is no reason why we are wrong. I ask you gentlemen to consider this case carefully. I have no interest in it, except that right shall prevail. I have not covered the ground as I would have liked to do, because my time was limited.

I thank you for your attention, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has consumed 43 minutes.

Mr. GOODALL. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES].

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, before beginning what I shall have to say in regard to the merits of this case, I want to call your attention to a few things that have been mentioned by the distinguished gentleman who has just preceded me. Immediately after the convening of the present session of Congress, and after the commencement of the contest, I was informed that there was an election-contest case between Peter F. Tague as contestant and Mr. John F. Fitzgerald as contestee from the tenth congressional district of Massachusetts. I want to say that from that day until Elections Committee No. 2, of which I have the honor to be a member, convened on the 29th day of August of this year, I never heard the case mentioned.

I am a little surprised that my friend who has just spoken had found out so much about the merits of this case that he had even been constrained to make up his mind before the case was considered as to whom was entitled to the seat. I want to say, gentlemen of the House, that I approach the consideration of this case without any personal knowledge of the facts, without a personal acquaintance with either the contestant or the contestee. I maintained that position, gentlemen, from the time the hearings began until this good hour. I want to assure you, and I assure both contestant and the contestee, that I endeavored to qualify as a juror would qualify in the trial of an important case. I have no personal interest in the result of this controversy.

One of the surprising things that attracted my attention was that this is a contest between two Democrats. Mr. Fitzgerald, the sitting Member, and Mr. Tague, the contestant in this case, were Democratic candidates before the Democratic primary in the city of Boston. Mr. Tague, according to the testimony, was defeated by a few votes. The testimony shows, gentlemen of the House, that Mr. Tague complained of the result of the treatment he received in the primary, that he took the case into the court, and before the matter was decided it was too late for him to get his name on the official ballot.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. I can not.

Mr. GALLIVAN. The gentleman is making a misstatement.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman will have an opportunity to correct it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I will correct it.

Mr. RHODES. I have only 20 minutes, and I feel that I can not yield. I was about to say, when interrupted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the only means by which Mr. Tague had to get his name on the official ballot was to have it placed there by the voters on election day, which they did in surprisingly large numbers.

And I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that a man whose name was not printed upon the official ballot, a man who could, through his friends upon election day, by means of attaching stickers on the ballots and by means of writing his name thereon, make the race that Peter Tague did certainly accomplished a remarkable feat.

The testimony in this case shows that on the face of the returns Mr. Fitzgerald received a plurality of 238 votes. The further testimony in the case shows that 1,304 votes were challenged. The further proof is that out of 1,304 votes there were 14 challenged votes, and there were 6 soldier votes. The facts in the case further show that the committee asked an order on the part of this House directing the election commissioners to bring these contested ballots before the committee. In due time these votes came, and they were laid before the committee, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] has stated. The committee went through these ballots one by one, and whenever it occurred that the name of Peter Tague was there written in pencil, in ink, or appeared in the form of a sticker your committee decided that that was the highest evidence of the intention of the voters, and therefore counted the vote for Mr. Tague.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a short question there?

Mr. RHODES. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. The question I want to ask is this: On the face of the returns what did they show Mr. Fitzgerald was elected by?

Mr. RHODES. By 238 plurality. Enough of these ballots bearing the stickers on which the name of Peter Tague appeared and on which the name of Peter Tague had been written were found to reduce the plurality to a bare margin of 10 votes, and I want to say to the gentlemen of the House that in this view the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] concurred with the majority of this committee, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], who has filed a separate dissenting opinion, also concurred.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. RHODES. If it is short.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does that include the six votes given to me by the soldiers, which came in late?

Mr. RHODES. That did not include the six votes, five of which had been counted for Mr. Fitzgerald, to which he refers. Neither did it include the 14 ballots which had been challenged and which had been challenged as fraudulent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Twelve of those votes were for me, and were not counted.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I have requested the gentleman to please not interrupt me further, because I have only 20 minutes of time. I wish to reinforce what I said a moment ago, that I approach this case without any bias, without any prejudice, without any personal or partisan feeling, and without any interest in the result. I am just endeavoring to give you a fair, square statement of the facts in the case, as they revealed themselves to the committee during the investigation. I might say at this time that this is a remarkable case, not only because it comes from the great city of Boston but it is remarkable because it presents itself to this body in three separate reports—a majority report, acquiesced in by six members of the committee, a separate dissenting opinion by Mr. LUCE, from the State of Massachusetts, and a second separate dissenting opinion supported by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. OVERSTREET, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. JOHNSTON. I wish to say that the committee was in accord until we reached the point of the consideration of the fraudulent votes in ward 5 of that city. My friend Mr. OVERSTREET did not answer a very pertinent question, which I think the facts warrant. The question was asked Mr. OVERSTREET by the gentleman from Mississippi if the committee had evidence of fraud having been committed in ward 5 of the city of Boston. I say that the record is teeming with evidence of fraud. It is of that peculiar quality and kind that it strikes at the very foundation of this Republic, if permitted to continue in force. The gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman mention the fraud?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Just mention the fraud.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. I decline to yield, and I hope the gentleman understands this to be my declination. I was about to say, and perhaps the gentleman does not like to hear it, that the fraud that was laid bare in this case is of that peculiar and far-reaching character that it strikes at the very foundations of this Republic. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] deplores the situation from a personal standpoint. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that the Congress of the United States has an interest in the result of the election in every congressional district of the United States, and I say that if the conditions prevail in the city of Boston that are contained in the testimony in this case, then there is no question but that the majority of this committee did the right thing in returning this report.

Answering the gentleman's question specifically, there is abundant proof showing that men were maintaining a sort of dual residence in the city of Boston, such as I have never heard of anywhere else in the United States. Men by the score were maintaining temporary residences in precincts 4, 8, and 9, of ward 5, whose families resided without the corporate limits of the city. Will any gentleman contend that the law of his State or that the law of my State contemplates such a condition of residence for the purpose of exercising the right of suffrage? Further answering the gentleman's question, the record shows that there were 187 cases where men had been charged with fraudulent registration, for whom subpœnas had been issued by the court and placed in the hands of officers of the court, and according to the returns upon the process these men could not be found. I want to say in conclusion upon this point that the admission of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], a gentleman for whom I have the highest personal regard, a gentleman who has done himself everlasting credit in the preparation of his splendid report, admits fraud in ward 5, and says this House should declare the seat vacant. With all due regard to the opinion of the distinguished gentleman, Mr. LUCE has announced a very curious doctrine. His report is fearfully and wonderfully made. He invokes the ancient and honored rule of equity, which says that he who seeks equity must come into court with clean hands. I agree with the gentleman as to the correctness of the rule, but he has made a misapplication of it in this case. I would answer both Mr. OVERSTREET and Mr. LUCE at the same time upon this proposition. These gentlemen forget when they charge that the contestant was a beneficiary under the fraudulent operations of Martin Lomasney on prior occasions that under the Constitution of the United States this Congress is a law unto itself. They forget that the Sixty-sixth Congress is a distinct entity when taken into consideration in connection with any preceding Congress. In other words, each Congress is, as it were, a tub standing on its own bottom, and it is immaterial for the purposes of this case whether Peter F. Tague was the recipient of favors at the hands of this marvelous man, Martin Lomasney, on former occasions or not.

The fact remains that what took place at the election preceding the Sixty-fifth Congress and at which Mr. Tague was a candidate, and what may have taken place in the election preceding the Sixty-fourth Congress, can not be charged against him in this case. I want to say, gentlemen, as a disinterested Member, except to the extent I stand in the performance of an official duty, I want Mr. Tague to understand that as far as I am concerned I am not only willing to vote that he be seated, but I am willing that my vote be understood to be a vote of confidence in him as a man being able to resist the influence of such a man as Martin Lomasney. Reference has been made to Martin Lomasney as a sort of a powerful political tyrant and autocrat. You gentlemen talk about fighting in the recent war to make the world safe for democracy. I want to remind you gentlemen that if what Mr. LUCE admits is true, if what the record proves is true in this case, you have a system of political autocracy in the city of Boston, of which I have no personal knowledge, you would do well to get rid of at the earliest possible opportunity. [Applause.] And my humble judgment is that this House will do well to purge that city of the influence of this remarkable man, Mr. Lomasney. As a new Member of Congress and a new member of the committee I remember asking counsel in this case, when the argument came before the committee and reference was first made to Martin Lomasney, how it was that he withdrew his influence from Mr. Tague and gave it to Mr. Fitzgerald. The evidence in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, indicated that this man Lomasney is a man of great wealth and great political influence, and that he is a man without visible occupation. I asked the question myself during the course of the hearing, "In what business is Mr. Lomasney engaged?" The answer was that he has no visible occupation, which justifies the conclusion that the business in which he is engaged does not meet the approval of the best citizens of Boston. Summing the matter up, this House has abundant precedents to support the position taken by the majority of the committee. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, for a hundred years cases have been brought before this body grounded upon fraud, and in a large number of cases ousted the sitting Member and seated the contestant where fraud was charged and proven. I say not only are there ancient decisions supporting the position of this committee, but I say there are recent decisions, numbers of them, on which the committee relies. I want to say, gentlemen of the House, that another very remarkable condition exists in the tenth district in the city of Boston. The testimony shows that Mr. Tague——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RHODES. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. GOODALL. I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. RHODES. I was about to say that another very remarkable thing developed during the course of this hearing, which was that this extraordinary man, Martin Lomasney, was so situated upon his political throne and surrounded by his political followers that he was not only able to control the destinies of the politicians of his own ward but in this case he saw fit to stretch forth his strong hand and invade another part of the city of Boston by bringing from another district, into the tenth district, John F. Fitzgerald and run him for Congress. I say, gentlemen of the House, without knowing the facts, I was surprised when I found out that Mr. Fitzgerald was not even a resident of the tenth district which he professes to represent in this body, and my further guess is that while the Constitution of the United States does not expressly prohibit a man representing a district in which he does not reside that Mr. Fitzgerald is the only Member residing out of his district. This is certainly a very curious and unusual thing. And in conclusion my opinion is that John F. Fitzgerald is the only man sitting in this House who is not a bona fide resident of the district which he professes to represent——

Mr. GALLIVAN. There are a half dozen.

Mr. RHODES. Then, gentlemen, I am mistaken——

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must not interrupt a speaker without asking leave.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, then I am mistaken when I said there was not one. The gentleman from Massachusetts says there are six. I say out of a total membership of 435 that constitutes a very small per cent of the membership, and is a remarkable exception to the rule. I ask the gentleman to name them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RHODES. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, we have taken, I understand, 43 minutes, and I ask the courtesy from the other side that they present another speaker now.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON]. [Applause.]

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, the chairman has given me very little time, because I have not prepared to make any extended statement. I believe to Mr. LEHLBACH, of New Jersey, has been delegated the presentation of the main argument for the majority of the committee. With the exception of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET], all members of the committee came substantially to the same conclusion. In general the testimony showed that the lodging house, saloon, and tenement district of Boston was under the control of a boss, and that boss was Martin Lomasney. Martin Lomasney controlled the machinery of the elections; and ward 5, which constitutes the backbone of the congressional district, and located, as I have said, in this thickly settled part of the business district of Boston, was under his absolute control. The testimony showed that he could swing it almost as a unit either one way or the other. Sometimes he would swing it to a Republican and sometimes he would swing it to a Democrat. All the evidence showed that it was his own little pocket borough. The evidence shows further that for reasons of his own, Mr. Lomasney broke with Mr. Tague and concluded that he would no longer support him, and one reason assigned was that Mr. Tague's course in the war Congress did not satisfy him, the complaint being that Mr. Tague did not get up on the floor of the House and make certain inquiries of the President of the United States of a nature which would be disparaging to a certain extent to America's cause in the war. Suffice it to say that Mr. Lomasney concluded finally that he would import from another district of the city another candidate, and he selected Mr. Fitzgerald. Mr. Fitzgerald was brought into the district and put into the race. And then every bit of Mr. Lomasney's force, all of his influence, all of the power that he had of manipulation of that district politically, were put behind Mr. Fitzgerald. Mr. Tague had not the privilege of running as a regular candidate on the ticket. He was compelled at the election to go in as an independent. He had no place on the ticket.

There was only a blank space left on which his friends could place stickers, or in which they could write his name. Sufficient of his friends either put on those stickers, involving labor and attention, or wrote in his name, so that the final result showed by the canvass of the election commissioners that Mr. Fitzgerald gained a majority of only two hundred and some odd out of a total vote of about 15,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know nothing of the facts in this case except what I have heard to-day, but if there was supposed to be a large immigration into ward 5, how does the gentleman account for the fact that there were only 15,000 votes cast in that district altogether, while in the district represented by Mr. GALLIVAN more than 25,000 votes were cast?

Mr. ELSTON. I do not believe the evidence shows there were any importations or that the charge of colonization included the ordinary importation of outside floaters into the district for the purpose of voting. I have not very much time, but I will come to that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It seems to me it was a remarkably small vote in a district of that sort.

Mr. ELSTON. I think that question will be reached. The charge of colonization——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOODALL. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ELSTON. A number of the ballots that had been disputed on either side were certified to the committee. They numbered something like 1,300. The committee went over those ballots and found that something over 200 of them were unmistakably voted for Mr. Tague, and the committee so found. Now, those ballots, aggregating over 200, had either stickers upon them labeled "Peter F. Tague for Congress" or they had Peter F. Tague's name written in. At any rate, the committee found upon evidence on the face of the ballots sufficient in every particular that Mr. Tague had some two hundred and odd ballots more that should have been counted for him and were not counted for him by the canvassing officers, so that the disparity between the two contestants, after we counted those 1,300 ballots, was under 20 votes.

Now, having finished that part of their work, the committee addressed itself to six or seven specifications—fraud, duress, intimidation, and so forth—as applying to the whole district, and in that particular the committee finally centered its findings down to the charges of colonization.

With regard to colonization, the committee found there was unmistakable evidence that at least a third of the voters in three precincts of ward 5 were fraudulent voters, and fraudulent in this respect, that they did not dwell or have their homes in those particular precincts. And as to that finding of the committee, that these voters, approximating one-third of the voters in these three precincts, were fraudulent, the committee was unanimous in their finding except for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET]. Even the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] not only agreed with the committee as to its findings but agreed with the committee as to its application of the law on the facts, and the gentleman from Massachusetts concluded with us that the law of Massachusetts was such that on the facts disclosed in the record these voters were fraudulent, inasmuch as their registration was not a legal registration, that they had their dwelling places and homes at other places, and that they were registered for the fraudulent purpose of voting in this ward or to serve the political ends of Martin Lomasney.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Do I understand the gentleman that the finding of the committee, with one exception, was unanimous as to the fraudulent character of these votes?

Mr. ELSTON. It was. I do not have to go on presumption or deduction as to that with respect to the attitude of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], because the gentleman from Massachusetts agrees as to the facts found by the committee as to illegal registration and agrees with us that the vote in these three precincts should be disregarded, but he applies a different rule of law as to what should be done. He wishes to throw the vote out and declare the seat vacant rather than to seat Mr. Tague. This would contravene the law as established by the precedents for 50 years.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman state what evidence there was, if any, that Mr. Fitzgerald benefited by these alleged frauds?

Mr. ELSTON. The evidence was of a character showing that the Hendricks Club and Mr. Lomasney operated in these three precincts politically; that the registration was largely under their control; that the politicians and saloon keepers and bartenders, and municipal workers who had registered there were political associates of Mr. Lomasney; that all these political elements, to a large extent, were under the control of Mr. Lomasney; that Mr. Fitzgerald was Mr. Lomasney's choice; and it was a proper presumption for the committee to make that any political manipulation down there in the way of colonization was under the direction of Mr. Lomasney and for the benefit of Mr. Fitzgerald. The decisions, however, do not require any proof as to how the illegal registrants voted. It is only necessary to show extensive fraud sufficient to throw doubt as to the result, whereupon the decisions hold that the precincts tainted with fraud shall be eliminated from the count.

Mr. HUSTED. Were any of these illegal registrants identified as political followers of this boss?

Mr. ELSTON. They were. A number of them came up in a procession before the election commissioners, with Mr. Lomasney at their head. I have already said, however, that it is not necessary to prove for whom the illegal registrants voted.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman claimed that there were stickers without any glue on them provided by this board. Is there any evidence to show that in the ballot boxes there were any of these unattached stickers in the box?

Mr. ELSTON. There was very slight evidence as to that; and the committee in its findings disregards the charge that these phony stickers were used or introduced into the election by Mr. Fitzgerald or Mr. Lomasney. That was not a material factor in the decision of the committee. The committee in its deliberations brought the issue down to within 10 votes between the two contestants, and then, addressing its attention to the colonization feature and applying the rules of law to that, it found that fraud interpenetrated those three precincts to the extent that you could not tell what the result would have been. There was evidence to indicate that a large part of the colonized votes were cast for Mr. Fitzgerald, because they were cast under the direction of Mr. Lomasney and under his control; and it was obviously a proper presumption that Mr. Fitzgerald got the benefit of them.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. What does the evidence show with regard to the vote in the precincts? Who received a majority in those precincts? Was not the majority very large?

Mr. ELSTON. It was quite preponderant.

Mr. LEHLBACH. One hundred and twenty.

Mr. ELSTON. It was preponderantly in favor of Mr. Fitzgerald in those precincts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be advised when I have used 20 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, so many misstatements have been made that it has been hard for me to hold my seat. I never knew before that there was so much ignorance in Congress. I never knew that the committee which has apparently sat on this case several weeks knows so little about it. [Laughter.]

I want to open my statement by saying that in the primary my heart and my hope were with Peter Tague. It is true that Mr. Fitzgerald does not live in his district. He is a constituent of mine. [Laughter.] And I was up against the same kind of a fight that Tague was up against; a man who did not live in my district, my predecessor in this Hall, was running against me, with a mountain of money. But I beat his head off. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not want to be interrupted for 15 minutes. Then I will answer whatever questions I am able to, and in order to let this audience know what thought I have given to this case I have prepared my opening, and I am going to read it, and I want you to believe that every word I say to you is the truth, nothing but the truth, so help me God. [Applause.] The truth is sometimes heard in these Halls.

It is no easy task for a Member of Congress who has friendships, deep and long lasting, with both contestant and contestee, to rise in this discussion and take an open stand on one side as against the other. My position is my own, uninfluenced by either side and unawed by threat or promise. While this contest has been pending my lips have been sealed. I have refused to discuss it with Members of both political parties here in this House, and I have fervently hoped that when the committee reported its report would be a unanimous one. Long weeks ago I advised the contestant that if the committee was unanimously against him, he would be foolish to fight its report. At about the same time I told the sitting Member the same story. I said to each of them that with a unanimous report from the committee I would stand with the committee. In those days I believed that the committee was preparing to sit as a judicial and not a political body, ready and willing to go after the evidence, and unready and unwilling to be influenced by political leaders or heelers, high or low, in Washington or in Massachusetts.

Gentlemen of the House, I was mistaken. The House knows now, from a committee split three ways, that politics has entered into the result from this committee, and that the good of the State and the good of the citizen has been lost sight of. I had intended, even when the committee made its report, to take no part in the discussion until I read the report of a majority of the membership, which recommends the unseating of Mr. Fitzgerald and the seating of Mr. Tague, and even then I had not decided to open my mouth until I read so many false, misleading, absurd, and far-fetched statements, winding up with the recommendation that 1,000 of my fellow citizens in Boston be disfranchised, no matter who or what they might be.

I have given the matter long and serious consideration, and I have decided, Mr. Speaker, that if I sat in this Chamber under such conditions, with my voiced hushed and my tongue tied, I would be ashamed of the great city which sent me here as one of its Representatives, and worthy to be disowned by the good people from whom I sprung.

There is neither method nor madness in my attitude to-day. I have known Mr. Fitzgerald from childhood. He and I went to school together. I have supported him in some of his political contests in my city, and I have been his bitter opponent—probably his most bitter opponent—in others. Twenty-one years ago I fought him at the polls as an independent candidate for Congress. He beat me badly. For years I did not speak to him for doing it. [Laughter.]

I have served in the Massachusetts Legislature with Peter Tague, and I have had a lifelong friendship with him and a personal fondness for him second to that of no other man in Massachusetts politics. You will understand, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that my position is absolutely impartial and is in accord with what I believe to be solely the square deal in Congress.

Now, for some interesting history. Months ago, after the contest for this seat had been filed and the evidence taken, and when all Boston was watching for the creation of the various election committees, it was an open boast—an open boast—from one of the political camps that it would be all one way just as soon as Congress got down to business. The committees were selected, and curiosity was keen and active in Boston as to the committee to which this contest would be sent. When it finally reached Election Committee No. 2 betting was lively in Boston, 2 to 1, 3 to 1, "Fitzgerald will be kicked out." Of course I paid no attention to the rumors of the day, because I thought I knew the Congress of the United States, and I still believe I know the Congress of the United States. I have said to you that I intended taking no part in this discussion until I read the majority report, and when I read that, my mind went back to the day when I heard the gamblers talk, and I wondered where they got the early tips.

Now, let it not be forgotten that this is a contest between two Democrats, one of them active in the public life of New England for over 25 years, having been a Member of this House as the sole Democrat from New England 25 years ago, a mere youth. In every big campaign during that quarter of a century up in my country his services have always been solicited, and he might be known in the parlance of the day as a headliner among the Democratic spellbinders of Massachusetts. You will recall, all of you gentlemen, with what interest the country watches the result from the State of Maine, which is the first northern State to hold its elections. They seem to get a guide from the result in Maine as to what is going to happen in the rest of the country. But now that the great West has come into its own that is all over. For 25 years Congressman Fitzgerald has been at the beck and call of the Democratic Party of the State of Maine.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I asked not to be interrupted, but I have such a high regard for my good friend that I will gladly yield.

Mr. HERSEY. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts aware that in the last election the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] went down into Maine and opposed the election of WALLACE H. WHITE, and that WALLACE H. WHITE was reelected by an increased majority?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I was not aware of that, but it shows whence comes the animus I spoke of. [Laughter.] For 25 years Congressman Fitzgerald has been at the beck and call of the Democratic Party of the State of Maine, as every good Republican on this side of the House, if invited to come to Maine by his party gladly comes. My friend [Mr. HERSEY] refers to one speech. I wish to say that Mr. Fitzgerald has probably spoken dozens of times in every congressional district in that State during those years.

Just as soon as we found that the Committee on Elections was headed by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODALL], for whom I have the highest personal regard, again my mind went back to the days when I heard "Fitzy has been framed. He has not got a look-in." But I did not believe it. I have too much and too high regard for the gentleman who occupies that chair as Speaker, and for the gentleman who is the presiding officer of the committee, to believe it. I have read the majority report, however, and I find that the committee have not only given the contestant every possible vote—and I hoped that they would—but then being unable to beat Fitzgerald they indict the citizenship of my city by asking you intelligent Representatives to throw to the winds three entire precincts, 1,000 American voters, in order that if "Fitzy had been framed," Fitzy would be framed.

Thinking it over this week, it has made my blood boil, and I decided that I would be a craven coward under the circumstances if I kept quiet and allowed what looks like a prepared program to slip through this House without the House knowing the inside story.

I want to say this much about the taking of the evidence in Boston before the notaries nominated by each of the parties to this contest. To me it was the most farcical proceeding that has ever happened in the political history of this country. None of it is worth reading and none of it has made the slightest impression on me. Each notary was a politician, one a Fitzgerald partisan, the other a Tague partisan, and to me their decisions were uproariously funny. Yet the majority report refers to the evidence more or less frequently, when, in my judgment, it should be passed by in its entirety. People in Boston believed in but one witness who appeared at that hearing, and that is the man whose name you have heard here so often to-day, Martin M. Lomasney.

Gentlemen, we have just recently adjourned a constitutional convention in Massachusetts, its membership having been made up of the biggest and brainiest men in our beloved Commonwealth. It has sat all summer for three summers. At its adjournment a former leader in this House, a former beloved governor of Massachusetts, Samuel W. McCall, was interviewed by the Boston press, and he was asked, "Mr. McCall, who was the outstanding figure of our constitutional convention?" You remember Sam McCall when he was here. Without hesitation he said, "Martin Lomasney was head and shoulders above all of us in constructive suggestions." That is the terrible boss, the awful man whom one or two of these strangers to our city have tried to depict here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. YATES). The gentleman from Massachusetts asked to be notified when he had used 20 minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used that much time.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I ask to be notified at the end of five minutes more.

Martin M. Lomasney never took a drink of liquor in his life. He never smoked a cigar in his life. He encourages total abstinence among the young men of his neighborhood. Instead of being the friend of the liquor dealer—and I served in both branches of the legislature with him—he has been unalterably opposed to liquor dealers sticking their fingers in Boston politics, and is the one leader, Democrat or Republican, in Massachusetts who has pushed the liquor dealer away from his door.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman if it is not a well-known fact among those who have served in the Legislature of Massachusetts, both Republicans and Democrats, that everyone who has any business with Mr. Lomasney, either political or otherwise, knows that his word will be carried out to the very letter, and that his word is taken instead of his bond?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Absolutely so. My excellent colleague was president of the Senate of Massachusetts, and he knows Mr. Lomasney as well as I know him. God knows I owe the distinguished leader of ward 5 little. I would have been mayor of Boston if he had been with me. [Laughter.] But he selected another former Member of Congress, more able than I, more distinguished than I, the former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew J. Peters. [Applause.] And he gave him his support, and Mr. Peters is now mayor of Boston. Mr. Lomasney was trying to get rid of a bad man who was mayor, and he did not think that I was quite strong enough to do the job, and he thought Andrew J. Peters was strong enough to do the job, and he threw the great strength of his wonderful presence into Mr. Peters's fight, and saved the good name of Boston by electing my opponent, who is at least a clean man. [Applause.] So, gentlemen, take no stock in that liquor-dealer stuff. Mr. Lomasney has never taken orders from them. I repeat that he is the one leader, Democrat or Republican, who does not allow them to dictate for the shadow of a moment, and he makes no attempt to dictate to them, because, between you and me, he has no use for them. Somebody wanted to know, what does he do? He does good 18 working hours of the day. He does not have to do anything now. He has made his money. Why is he a power? Because every child, every man, every woman in his district who has ever seen want, who has needed help, has had to make but one appeal to Martin Lomasney. When one word of the story is told to Martin Lomasney, it is all over. [Applause.] And when Peter Tague appealed to him four years ago or five years ago and said he wanted to come to Congress, Martin listened to his story. Martin at the time wanted to lick the man who was running against Peter Tague, and he listened to Peter's story and he said, "Peter, I will send you there." The men who have come from that district, not only Mr. Fitzgerald, who has been paraded here to-day, but Mr. Tague and Mr. Tague's predecessor, and his predecessor, and, to use a favorite expression of former Speaker CLARK, until the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, every one of those men who has come from that district has come from there because Martin Lomasney sent him here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used 25 minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I wish I had somebody in my district like Martin M. Lomasney. I reserve the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCGLENNON].

Mr. MCGLENNON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, it is most embarrassing for a new Member at any time to rise and make his maiden speech, but I think this particular moment, when the Speaker has to rap his gavel at great length, has made my introduction more embarrassing.

However, the question of the committee's report I feel is one of great importance, and being the only Democrat who has signed the majority report, I feel, in extenuation of the remarks of the previous speaker, the most genial and affable Democrat from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], that I can still say without contradiction that there was no politics in making up the committee's decision. To my knowledge and to my mind the committee, after careful study and discussion of every detail of the case, in the hope that in the end justice would be done either to the contestant or to the contestee, made this report.

The committee, as I said, gave careful consideration to all the details, and we hoped that we might have concluded this election case by the counting of the votes. After giving both the contestee and the contestant due credit on these ballots, as seen in the light of the intention of the voter, we found that we were unable to reach a decision as to the charges presented.

Then the committee had to enter a wider field, that of fraud, which this report so clearly distinguishes. As a Democrat, I want to say that I have given very careful consideration in this particular case to the advantages that would necessarily accrue to a Democratic Member. I feel that as between Mr. Tague and Mr. Fitzgerald the Democratic Party would be safe in the selection of either. I feel that the committee has been careful and painstaking in its investigation, and I have every reason to believe that the committee's action will be sustained. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask how much time has been used by the respective sides?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] has 52 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODALL] has 62 minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] 45 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to have the other side use some of their time.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, I have only one more speech, and I think it would be in order for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] to use some of his time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I see that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] is here, and I yield five minutes to him.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, for some reason, before I came actually face to face with this case, I admit of considerable embarrassment. That was because, in part at least, I am of the same party as both contesting parties in this case and I have been on terms of the warmest personal friendship with each gentleman and have had affection for both. As we came face to face with the case I found that I was embarrassed, as men so often are by little things, but had overlooked temporarily the big things. To-day and yesterday and the day before, in spite of the fact that no man likes to vote against his friend, there is still only one embarrassment which I have been suffering, and that is the embarrassment of a judge sitting to pass upon not only the rights of individual men seeking a seat in this honorable body, but passing upon what is more important, the rights of the people who cast their votes in this district.

I say, in thinking about my embarrassment as to friends, I forgot that friendship does not enter into the case; it is simply and solely the rights of the people of the congressional district in Boston to have the Representative here whom they chose.

Like my colleague, Mr. GALLIVAN, it was my intention to abide by the determination of this committee. I certainly did not intend to speak, but because of two things I felt, as a representative of the good people of Massachusetts, to say a few words here on this election case, regretting I have not the time and opportunity to go into the details of the case which are all important.

I want to say right here that I am not in any way a representative of the city of Boston. The district I have the honor to represent covers no part of the city of Boston. I am entirely outside of Boston. The two things to which I refer are these: There has been so much said about corruption and dishonest elections and dishonest procedure and all that sort of thing that I feel that I ought to say one word in justice to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Massachusetts has as good election laws as any State in the United States and, I believe, with all due respect to other Commonwealths, better than many. In justice to the men who have been attacked, I feel that I ought to say a word in explanation—I do not want to use the word "defense," but in explanation. As to the board of elections which has been attacked by one of the parties in this case, I want to say that I do not know a member of the present board of elections, but I have known members in the past, and I was a legal colleague of one man who served for many years on that board.

I have always believed and have always had every reason to believe that that board is composed of honorable, upright, and just men. The law has taken every means possible to provide that they shall be that kind and that they shall not be partisan in their determination, because the law requires that the mayor of Boston, in appointing those men, shall apportion the four members among the two parties dominant in Massachusetts—the Republican and the Democratic Parties. I can not speak personally of those men, because I do not know them.

The ballot commission of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been charged with not giving one of these parties a square deal. I want to say that I know two members of that commission. The third member I do not know, and I know in a fairly intimate way particularly the chairman of the board, Mr. Henry V. Cunningham. There is not a man, not alone in Massachusetts but there is not a man in the whole United States, who has a regard for his public duty than has Henry Cunningham, chairman of that board. He is an honest, decent, upright, respected citizen of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

To get down now to one other individual who has been attacked in this case, I want first to say that I found in talking to Members about this case—and the Members, particularly on my side of the House, will know that I have not tried to influence a single Member, have not given an opinion to a single Member until this very morning, as to how I felt in this case—that I have found from the talk going around that they think this whole case is surrounded by the worst kind——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman grant me five minutes more?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. PHELAN. They think that this case is surrounded by the very worst kind of trickery and everything that is bad, and one man in particular has been singled out as the arch criminal of all this wrongdoing in the city of Boston, namely, Mr. Martin M. Lomasney. I am not an intimate of Mr. Lomasney. To the best of my knowledge I have never asked nor received from him a favor in all my life, but I served in the legislature with him. I was there when he came back after an absence of 10 years in 1905.

I know that when he came into that legislature Republicans—and I am not partisan in this—looked upon him as the kind of man that many Members of this House now think he is. I give you my solemn word that some of the best members in that legislature, not alone on the Democratic side but on the Republican side, came to know Martin Lomasney and came to respect him, came to believe before they left in that one single term that he was a man who deserved respect, a man who could be trusted; that he was a man of powerful intellect and a valuable legislator. Just let me read something which is aside from my own testimony. I have in my hand a newspaper clipping. Rev. Herbert S. Johnson is pastor of one of the largest of the Baptist churches in the city of Boston—the Warren Street Church. He formerly lived in my city, and lived within a stone's throw of my house. I know him to be an upright man, a man interested in civic matters, being especially interested in good government, as everybody in the city of Boston knows. Here is a statement that the Rev. Mr. Johnson made about this man, about whom a whole case here is tried to be built. I quote from the newspaper clipping:

In reviewing the work of Mr. Lomasney, Dr. Johnson said:
"Martin Lomasney is the one man I never understood until now. When I came to this city 19 years ago I heard of him as the boss of ward 8—'a rotten boss.' But soon after that I began to change my opinion, and I now believe he is a bold, fearless, and honest type of politician. I wonder if he isn't a second Moses who has come to lead the people of Boston to the promised land of affairs."

Again, I want to quote from an article from the Boston Traveler, a Republican newspaper—and I say that with no partisan intent, but I mention it because it would not naturally be favorably inclined toward Mr. Lomasney. This is from an editorial from the Boston Traveler of October 26, 1917. Speaking about the mayoralty contest in Boston this paper says:

This newspaper suggested some time ago that Martin Lomasney, a plain and practical politician, could and would make a splendid mayor. That suggestion has been echoed by other newspapers. Mr. Lomasney, if he would consent to be a candidate, could be elected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I have not the time to yield, I am sorry to say. I simply have brought that in for this purpose: Every place in this Chamber I find it brought up that this so-called boss has controlled the situation, and I know from the way that Members have talked with me that they have been influenced by a misconceived prejudice against Mr. Lomasney, when the whole question is not what Mr. Lomasney is or what he is not but whom the people of this district have elected.

I come down now to that question. Let me call this to your attention. The reason I am going to vote for Mr. Fitzgerald and not for Mr. Tague is this: I sat on election committees for four years and cases were brought before me. I remember particularly the Gaylord case, from Milwaukee, where charges of bribery were made. I am frank to say in this House that there was enough evidence there so that we could draw our own conclusions and surmise as to the kind of elections they were holding in the city of Milwaukee at that time, but there was nothing proven, and there was not one substantive fact on which we could base our conclusions, and no matter what our suspicions might be we were obliged to come in and say that the sitting Member had a right to his seat.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman grant me three minutes more?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. PHELAN. I sat in other cases, and one of the first principles I learned on that committee was that you have got to prove your case or this House can not stand back of the committee. I submit on all of the evidence that this committee has not brought in a proven case, to put it at its best, and I believe they have not the material with which to prove a case. Here is the whole point involved. They acknowledge that they have counted every single vote for the contestant, Mr. Tague, that could possibly be voted. They have given him the benefit of every doubt, and still Mr. Fitzgerald leads by 10 votes. There is only one way in which Mr. Tague can be seated, and that is through the method taken by this committee of finding that there has been illegal registration and throwing out those votes, and in throwing out those votes they have thrown out the votes of almost a thousand citizens of the city of Boston, many of whom are honest, admittedly so, many of whom admittedly had the right to vote, and as to the others there has been nothing proven, and I doubt if anything can be proven in this case. On the evidence submitted I can not vote to disfranchise 1,000 voters. In Massachusetts we have a law which allows the intent of the voter to determine where his residence is. That is the all-determining factor—the intent. All that is necessary to prove that intent is some evidence, some extraneous evidence, that there was that intent.

It is simply and solely a matter of intention. The committee rests their case entirely on this. They say because certain men, in many cases single men, or the testimony indicated certain single men, were found living some place else, that therefore they were not entitled to residence in ward 5. They have said the same thing about married men, and rested their case largely on the fact that when subpœnaes were sent out men registering in certain places on the 1st of April did not respond. I told a colleague in the cloak room to-day that I could find men in my city, or any other city, 25 men who registered in April, honestly and legally, who could not be found at a later date; that they were shoe workers who, when business got dull in the State of Massachusetts, went away to Cincinnati, or St. Louis, or Auburn, N. Y., to engage in the same business. A man has a right to change his residence, has a right to go outside of the State if he wants to do so, and his residence in Massachusetts is determined by his domicile on the 1st of April. Now, this committee has no evidence to show that these men were not properly under the Massachusetts law domiciled within the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Were there any floaters?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not believe there has been a single man proved to be a floater. My friends, let us not forget in determining this case they are not charging wholesale repeating; they are not charging that the men registering in ward 5 were registered elsewhere; they are not charging that the men undertook to vote elsewhere; they are simply saying that because these men stopped at hotels, perhaps only a night or a week, that thereby they are deprived of having an opportunity to vote in the places they wanted to vote, which is ward 5 in the city of Boston. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to find out how the time stands again, if the Speaker pleases.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has 29 minutes, and the gentleman from Maine has 63 minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] has 45 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time has the gentleman from Georgia?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-nine minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think more than that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Thirty-nine minutes; the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] has 10.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As we have only got 29 minutes left on this side, it is up to the other side to do some talking.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, there is only one more speech on the side of the majority report, and we think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] should come in at this time with his speech.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker [applause], if time permits at the close of my remarks I shall welcome questions. First, let me present the motion I desire to have put at the close of the debate according to the agreement.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LUCE, of Massachusetts, moves to amend the resolution recommended to the House by the Committee on Elections No. 2 in the contested-election case of Peter F. Tague v. John F. Fitzgerald, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and substitute therefor the following: "That neither Peter F. Tague nor John F. Fitzgerald was duly elected a Member of this House from the tenth congressional district of Massachusetts on the 5th day of November, 1918, and that the seat now occupied by the said John F. Fitzgerald be declared vacant.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will yield before he begins his argument, will the gentleman state what the vote was in the primary? I do not find it.

Mr. LUCE. The vote at the primary was Fitzgerald, 5,022; Tague, 4,972; Fitzgerald winning by 50 votes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw that. I desire to explain to the Members that my only purpose was to get a good attendance; that is all.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Elections No. 2 has this afternoon its brief period of glory and then will vanish from the stage. It may console itself for the brevity of its grandeur by reflecting that at any rate it is better off than those committees which like the moon never shine except by reflected light.

> The rose that lives its little hour
> Is prized beyond the sculptured flower.

We living our little hour crave your attention to this our only opportunity to impress you with our importance.

Sir, speaking more seriously, it may be well understood that the unkind fate which made me a member of this committee brought to me much embarrassment. Not alone have I been on amicable terms with the two gentlemen whose fortunes are involved, but also with counsel on either side my relations in legislative service have been intimate. Under these conditions there was nothing for a man attempting to do his duty but to remember that justice wears a bandage, and if I could but persuade you for these few minutes to bandage your eyes and not look upon the personality of either man involved, then I might have some hope that you would follow me in my conclusions.

Let me, if I can, lift this discussion out of the realm of personal politics and bring it to that plane where alone a contested-election case may engage the attention of the House with propriety. I must indeed for a moment and but briefly, for the matter has already been touched upon, make personal reference, for in part my case is based upon the contention that Mr. Tague ought to come into this court of equity with clean hands. I feel justified in calling to your attention the fact that twice he received the bounty of Martin Lomasney, and that it was when on a third occasion he sought for this bounty and failing to receive it he protested against the authority of the leader and his methods. It has been intimated that he did not largely profit by this bounty. I recall to you, sir, that when he first ran for Congress in the primaries he was opposed by Mr. Kelliher, and he defeated Mr. Kelliher by help from the very ward which he now denounces and the very leader whom he now denounces.

So dismissing these personal affairs, let me ask you to consider matters more important, to consider higher things as they have to do with political science and the welfare of the Nation. Let me ask you to look with me at a problem that has vexed the politics of this land now for more than half a century. When it began to be serious it was far from new. Go back to the year 1792 and you will find that John Jay was deprived of the governorship of the State of New York because his friends followed the advice of a capable lawyer, Mr. King, who said that when a sheriff had recently retired from office and none other had been appointed to succeed him, he nevertheless might properly, as the de facto official, convey to the capitol the 400 votes of a certain county. Aaron Burr, with characteristic shrewdness, said that would vitiate the votes. They were thrown out, the county was disfranchised, and the election went to George Clinton, Jay refusing to contest.

At the same time, in the Second Congress, this question which you must once again face came in the contested-election case of Gen. James Jackson against Gen. Anthony Wayne, the hare-brained hero of the Revolution. Jackson was not far behind Wayne in eccentricity.

It is said when he addressed the House—and Fisher Ames is responsible for this reminiscence—Jackson bellowed so loudly that it was necessary for the Senate to shut the window in order to keep out the din. In the case of the eccentric Wayne against the mercurial Jackson the House was confronted by the very same problem you have before you to-day. In passing I may wish for both these contestants a future equaling that which followed this famous contest, for in the next year Gen. Wayne was made General of the Army of the United States and departed for the memorable campaign against the Indians of the Northwest, and Gen. Jackson became the governor of his State and United States Senator. And so if we treat both these gentlemen as the Congress treated Gen. Jackson and Gen. Wayne, perhaps the same happy future may follow them.

What happened? By unanimous vote they unseated Wayne. A long debate followed in which Jackson urged that the votes of certain counties should be rejected. On the question of seating Jackson the Speaker's vote made a tie, and the seat was declared vacant. I ask you to follow to-day the very first congressional precedent in this regard.

If any of you have done me the honor to read my minority views, you will find there the history of this matter in greater detail than I must now attempt to give it. You will find that in the following year the question arose again, and there, too, it was decided as I now advise you to decide this. Not long afterwards, in McFarland versus Culpepper, almost the same class of irregularities was cited, and again the rejection of entire polls was refused. In the case of Easton versus Scott, although the committee desired a decision by rejecting a poll, the House directed the committee to get evidence out in the Missouri Territory. Traveling was bad and costly in that day, and so the committee balked. In the end the seat was declared vacant. For 70 years, invariably, the House refused such advice as that which the majority of the committee now gives you. Invariably they said they would not decide elections by throwing out single polls.

Before I come to a change in the landscape, permit me to tell you why this is the very nub of the question. It has been settled, accepted by all the authorities, that there is a difference between fraud committed by election officers and fraud otherwise committed. Mr. McCrary, in his Law of Elections, says that—

> There is a difference between a fraud committed by officers or with their knowledge and connivance and a fraud committed by other persons, in this: The former is ordinarily fatal to the return, while the latter is not fatal, unless it appear that it has changed or rendered doubtful the result. If an officer of the election is detected in a willful and deliberate fraud upon the ballot box, the better opinion is that this will destroy the integrity of his official acts, even though the fraud discovered is not of itself sufficient to affect the result. The reason of this rule is that an officer who betrays his trust in one instance is shown to be capable of the infamy of defrauding the electors, and his certificate is therefore good for nothing.

There began about 70 years ago a series of precedents upon which my friends of the majority rely, and which very likely they will comment upon later, in cases very largely consisting of frauds by officers. Let me point out to you that it has generally been held that fraud by officers may justify the exclusion of polls. On the other hand, what is the doctrine in regard to other kinds of fraud? Let me read to you a decision in my own State which has been held a leading authority in the matter, the case of First Parish, and so forth, v. Stearns (21 Pick., 148). Mr. Justice Morton—a name illustrious in our judicial history—said:

> It is no objection to an election that illegal votes were received, unless the illegal votes changed the majority. The mere fact of their existence never voids an election. This is so plain a proposition that it needs no authority to support it. It is the principle adopted and acted upon in all cases of contested elections, whether in the British Parliament, the Congress of the United States, the legislature of this or any other of the United States.

Therefore it is held—and this directly bears on the situation here—the mere fact that illegal votes were received does not warrant changing the majority.

I ask you to take with me the ground that there was some measure of illegal registration and colonization in the Massachusetts district now in question. We need not dispute over its extent. The margin of votes in the election was very small. A very little illegal registration and colonization would suffice to make the result of this election doubtful, and that far I go with the majority of the committee. I concede, I confess, I contend, that there was enough illegal registration and colonization to make the result doubtful. I do not desire to take the time to discuss whether there was so much colonization as to warrant the extreme to which the other party went, for I desire to stop right there before going on to the next——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. One thing that disturbs me about my vote on this question is that, assuming that there was some fraud or colonization or importation, it seems to me rather remarkable that in a district with a population of some 217,000, with an organization so strong as the organization credited to Mr. Lomasney, with fraud, colonization, and the expenditure of a large amount of money, it was found impossible to secure more than seven thousand two hundred and odd votes for the contestee in this case. That seems to me to be a very remarkable fact, if there was fraud or colonization.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, if there was great fraud and colonization it would be truly remarkable, and that is why I do not desire to argue that aspect of it. But it has been commonly known for a generation that in this the heart of the business center of Boston there have been two classes of voters whose right to vote might be contested and ought to be contested; one made up of well-to-do residents of the suburbs, who, for the sake of business, social, or political considerations, pretend to have a residence in certain Boston hotels; and, secondly, a considerable number of men who sleep in lodging houses and who disappear very quickly after registration.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it not a fact that the total vote at this election was smaller than usual in this district?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I have not examined that phase of the case.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have attempted to go back in the directories, but I find it is impossible to be accurate, because the district has not been exactly the same. But two years before a larger total vote was cast in that district than in the last election, and if this was a district in which there was a large amount of money spent and colonization and fraud, it seems to me a remarkable circumstance.

Mr. LUCE. The fact is, in my judgment, that there was no greater amount of fraudulent voting and registration and colonization in this ward than there had been for many years. Sixteen years ago it so happened that I, as house chairman of the Massachusetts committee on election laws, was compelled to lead a fight in the legislature to attempt a remedy for precisely the same situation, and I could read to you from the Massachusetts case of Splaine against McGahey, which took place nearly 20 years earlier, evidence showing that this same state of affairs existed even then. The situation has been notorious for more than a generation.

Now, if I may pursue the tenuous thread of my remarks—for I fear it is but a gossamer thread and may easily be broken off completely——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I am interested in the legal aspects of this question, and I wish the gentleman to inform me, as well as the House, upon what facts the gentlemen of the committee threw out the three election precincts of Boston and thus deprived approximately 1,000 voters of an opportunity to exercise their right of suffrage at the election?

Mr. LUCE. It was the allegation that the greater part of the men who were charged with illegal registration were registered in those three precincts, to which the committee gave particular consideration. As a matter of fact the contestant had alleged that the same state of affairs existed in another ward, but he brought in no scintilla of evidence in proof of that. He abandoned the contention and confined his evidence to these three precincts, summoning from them witnesses who in large numbers could not be found or else who evaded the summons and refused to assist the Congress of the United States in reaching an honest and a wise conclusion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for information?

Mr. LUCE. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman mean to tell the House that this committee decided this important question upon allegations, not upon evidence? Does he contend that it was merely the allegations of the contestant, and not evidence that he produced in support of his allegations, upon which they brought in this majority report?

Mr. LUCE. If I did not supplement the word "allegation," as applied to the three precincts in question, with the words "and the evidence relating thereto," I ought to have so done. I am justified in using the word by itself in relation to the other ward, because he produced no evidence from that other ward to back up the charge in his brief.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The majority report says that in this ward 5 the result of investigation showed that 316 persons had voted, and there was prima facie evidence that these votes were fraudulent. Of course, that would indicate that they found evidence upon which at least 316 votes had been rejected. What has the gentleman to say as to that evidence?

Mr. LUCE. I will say this, Mr. Speaker, that I have some ground for averring it is not my business to support the majority report.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I did not ask the gentleman that question. I asked him if there was any evidence to sustain the action of the committee as to these 316 votes, according to the gentleman's opinion of it.

Mr. LUCE. I would prefer that the gentleman ask the question of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], who in behalf of the committee will follow me. I want to use my own time in supporting my own contentions and not his.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. What are your contentions?

Mr. LUCE. My contentions, sir, are that there was some fraud in this district; that the margin is very narrow; that a reasonable man is warranted from a study of the testimony in reaching the conclusion that it is impossible to say which man was elected.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Of course, the whole thing hinges upon these votes.

Mr. LUCE. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman will discuss the matter with the gentleman from New Jersey, with whom he may have a quarrel, and not with me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has control of his own time. He is not obliged to yield.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. I want to ask how many votes are shown by this report to have been polled in those three wards?

Mr. LUCE. About 956.

Mr. CANDLER. About 956?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. There are over 300 in the three precincts?

Mr. LUCE. There are 316 in the three precincts—4, 8, and 9.

Mr. CANDLER. There are 316 that are attacked as fraudulent registrations?

Mr. LUCE. By the majority.

Mr. CANDLER. Then is there any evidence to show for whom these 316 voted, whether for Mr. Fitzgerald or Mr. Tague?

Mr. LUCE. No. That is the point.

I want to take up my argument again. I have shown you, gentlemen, that, according to all the precedents and authorities, it is necessary to prove, in order to change the result in this fashion, either that there was fraud on the part of officials—and no contention of that is made here—or that other fraud was sufficient to change the majority. The courts have repeatedly held in the course of nearly a century that this ought to be proved before a precinct is rejected.

Let me emphasize, as one of the landmarks of my journey, that this ought to be proved before we reject the vote of these precincts.

Next, if I had the time at my disposal I could give you enough citations to satisfy you of the contention that the poll of a precinct should not be rejected if it is possible to ascertain the number of fraudulent votes. Was it possible in this case to ascertain the number of fraudulent votes? It was not, in my judgment. Since these early rulings were made by the courts the Australian ballot system has been perfected. It is a matter of doubt whether a man can be forced to testify how he voted under the Australian ballot. There are those who contend that if he voted fraudulently he can be compelled to testify, but his testimony in any case would be of no value. Such testimony can not be supported. It is the uncorroborated statement of a man who has the motive to tell an untruth. Therefore testimony by the voter himself does not help. Fifty years ago testimony could be secured aliunde, as the lawyers say, from the surrounding circumstances, from the man's declarations, and other things, but to-day, with our modern system of voting, it is impossible to find out how men vote. Unless these men could have been summoned before our committee and inquiry made of them, even the attempt to ascertain these facts would not have been achieved. But not even the attempt was made. In my judgment it was impracticable under the circumstances of the case. Therefore I contend that it was impracticable to comply with the requirements which the judgments of the courts say are imperative before the poll of a precinct may be rejected because of fraud other than that of officials.

Returning to the historical phase of the problem, let me recall that soon after the middle of the last century there came into the politics of the country an exceedingly pernicious and baneful theory. There is profit sometimes in tracing a judicial or legislative doctrine to its very source. You may find it in some pellucid spring where the water gushes out of the rock amid the mosses and the overhanging boughs with complete purity. You may find it oozing out of some dank and loathsome swamp, unfit to drink, nauseous to the smell, horrible in all its aspects. I will not say that this doctrine originated in such a foul source, but I will point out to you that its origin brings to us no guaranty of purity. It originated in its modern applications by the courts in that most unfortunate of quarrels, a church row. It originated in the case of Juker v. The Commonwealth (20 Pa. State, 484) in 1853, where a church election had been held partly in a school yard and partly in the schoolhouse, and the court threw out the votes cast in the yard.

That was taken advantage of four years later for a dictum by the courts in the case of Mann against Cassidy, when the court said that under certain circumstances they would have been bound to throw out all the votes in certain precincts.

Upon the decision in this church quarrel and the dictum in Mann against Cassidy the courts in Pennsylvania established a long line of decisions in contested-election cases of the next 15 years. There were men strong enough to protest. You will find in the minority report dissenting opinions of various justices of the court. Particularly would I emphasize the words of Chief Justice Thompson, who said:

I maintain that there is nothing which will justify the striking out of entire divisions but an inability to decipher the returns or by showing that not a single vote was polled or that no election was legally held. If anything short of this is to have effect, the right of every elector is at the mercy of the election officers.

Nevertheless this pernicious doctrine prevailed so extensively in Pennsylvania that it was very readily brought into the practice of Congress.

Before the Civil War bitter partisanship had begun to smirch the records of election contests. In 1860 and in subsequent years again and again there was resort to this partisan device of throwing out certain precincts. So it is quite natural when we come to the memorable contest between the two great parties over the election struggle between Hayes and Tilden that we should find there, down at the core of the dispute, this same dubious question. Years have passed. Partisanship no longer flames with such bitterness as then marked political strife. To-day, looking back with some attempt at impartiality, we may say that both sides were guilty of offenses against law and decency, and both sides established records of which in later years they could have been proud only on the assumption that their purpose warranted their method.

For example, in the city of New Orleans one poll was thrown out because the commissioners of election had written the figures "249" so that the figure "9" was doubtful. You could not tell whether it was a "9" or a "7." Because of that they threw out not alone the vote for the presidential elector concerned, but they threw out the vote of the precinct for all the electors.

There were more than 20 parishes in Louisiana which were thrown out on one pretext or another. The same sort of thing took place in Florida. I feel warranted in saying that in the contest of 1876 this doctrine showed its dangers, its pernicious possibilities, to a degree that ought to make it forever reprehensible in the consideration of election cases.

It was resorted to repeatedly thereafter, and my friend who is to follow me can truly tell you there is much precedent for his contention that it is proper, in view of the decisions he will doubtless name, to throw out isolated precincts. Yet such are the dangers of the practice, such are its inequities, such are its iniquities, that I take this opportunity to protest against it and to implore the House of Representatives to eliminate from the public life of our land, so far as it can be done by the precedent established to-day, the theory that in order to make one side or the other prevail, in order to advance the interest whether of a political party or of an individual, you may disfranchise by the wholesale American citizens who have honestly cast their votes. [Applause.]

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I have but 10 minutes more. I do not know whether I shall have time to yield or not. I desire to round out my argument, if I may. What are the further objections to this practice? In the first place, that it puts the electorate at the mercy of rogues and rascals, who by vitiating the conduct of an election may accomplish purposes which are often venal in their origin and never unselfish and patriotic. Secondly, you punish innocent candidates who may have had no share whatever in the corruption and the irregularities that are charged. Thirdly, you punish innocent voters of the whole district, not alone those of the precincts that you reject but the voters of the rest of the district, whose will would have prevailed except for this exclusion. Then, fourthly, you punish the people, because the purpose of an election is to ascertain the will of the majority. What primarily concerns you here is not the seating of Mr. Fitzgerald or Mr. Tague, but what primarily concerns you here is the right of more than 300,000 human beings in a congressional district to have such representation in Congress as a majority of them desire.

I will tax the patience of the House but a few minutes longer. I would not have talked at this length had it not seemed to me that a question of principle is underneath the proposition before you which is greater by far than any question of personality. It is not alone a question that may on some future occasion affect your political future or my own. It is a question that may affect the destinies of the whole land. For our American civilization is founded on the belief that the majority shall rule. You may say that this is a conventional doctrine, you may assail it from the viewpoint of the political philosopher, and argue that it has no sanction or authority in itself. Nevertheless it is the very corner stone of democracy. Ever since Anglo-Saxon civilization rose out of the murk of the Middle Ages, to gain power throughout all the world, its political achievements have been based upon the acceptance of the doctrine that the majority shall prevail. Nothing can be more important than to maintain and protect this doctrine. Nothing is more vitally necessary to the safety of the people in these serious times, or will be in those even more serious that are soon to follow, than to let every man know that he is the equal politically of every other man, and that his vote shall count equally with that of every other man. He should be assured that whether rich or poor, learned or ignorant, whether schooled in colleges or only in the study of mankind itself, every man in this country shall be on a level of equality with every other man to express his belief as to what shall be the course of government. That it is which has made suffrage the most important of all the questions that ever perplexed a legislative body.

As a member of a legislative committee dealing with this subject for many years I found there were those who thought it was of small importance, and desired to pass on to what they conceived to be greater things. And yet I firmly believe that this is of all political topics the greatest. It is the one thing that underlies everything else.

The proudest fact, the kingliest act
Of freedom, is the freeman's vote.

If to-day you declare that by reason of the charges of corruption made in a small part of a congressional district the will of that district ought to be thwarted, if you say the corruption perpetrated by any one man or group of men shall discredit the suffrage of a thousand men qualified to vote, you will by so much increase the fear on the part of the masses of our people that their rights shall be taken away from them, their object interfered with by a legislative body or by some other power profiting by its example.

So I have tried to bring this question out of its atmosphere of personal complication. I have tried to lay before you my conclusion, reached after the most patient study of this case, that there has been enough fraud to make it impossible to say who was elected. I have tried to make it clear to you that under these circumstances we should say to these men, "A plague o' both your houses." Let us send this controversy back to the people, that they may tell us clearly what they want. Thus we may incite the Legislature of Massachusetts to remedy such defects as there may be in their election laws. Thus we may incite the people of this district to higher standards of political morality than have there prevailed. Thus we may advance the welfare of the people themselves by telling them that the Congress of the United States will not undertake to decide election contests on personal considerations; that it will not undertake to follow precedents that have proven to be inimical to the welfare of the people, but that from now on it will by establishing this precedent to-day declare that whenever it is impossible to ascertain the will of the people in the customary fashion the election shall be held once more; that there may be every opportunity for the majority to rule.

Mr. YATES. Does the gentleman say that there is no evidence of fraud?

Mr. LUCE. Not at all. There was evidence of fraud. There was enough evidence of fraud to make it impossible to determine which man received the plurality of votes duly and legally cast.

Mr. CONNALLY Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I believe the gentleman said there was no more evidence that there was fraud in this precinct than there had been in elections for a number of years in the past. Did not the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. LUCE. To the best of my belief I am justified in that statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. What assurance has the gentleman that if they have another election that practice which has been going on for a number of years would not occur again?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, at the time to which I refer, in 1903, we were able in the Legislature of Massachusetts, in the controversy of which I have spoken, to improve some of the laws governing these matters. Since then students of the subject have discovered other means by which it may be possible to make more certain the expression of the electors' will, and I am in hopes that if we thus teach this district the importance of enacting that legislation it will cooperate with the legislature in perfecting the laws.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Do they have official challengers at the polls on election day?

Mr. LUCE. We do not.

Mr. KINKAID. Does the gentleman not think that system would improve the administration of elections very much?

Mr. LUCE. I am not acquainted with the system, and so I could not answer.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, in view of the gentleman's position that in this case it is impossible to fairly determine which candidate was the choice of the people, I would be very much interested in getting the gentleman's reason for rejecting what has been generally considered a rule in these cases, that where the result is in doubt, the sitting Member is entitled to the benefit of the doubt, or, in other words, that the burden of proof is upon the contestant to show his right to the seat.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, it was proved to the satisfaction of a majority of the committee that there has been enough irregularity and fraud in this district to make it impossible to ascertain who was elected. There were within the committee itself some differences as to the extent to which that might be carried, but, for my own part, I was quite certain that in view of the closeness of the vote there has been at least enough fraud proved to make it impossible to determine who was elected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman state what that fraud was?

Mr. LUCE. The fraud was of two classes——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. LUCE. Summarily it may be described as illegal registration.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and in order to do so I yield him one minute of my time. Does the gentleman say that there was a single illegal vote cast for Mr. Fitzgerald? Can the gentleman point to the record and show that there was a single illegal vote cast for Mr. Fitzgerald in that ward?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I do not dare answer that question. Although I spent many, many hours reading the evidence, I should not want to be specific as the gentleman asked me to be. If there was any evidence, there was very little of it, and there was no evidence that a single one of these voters whose right to vote is now challenged did vote for either of the two candidates here concerned.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, there is not a statement of fact incorporated in the report of the majority of this committee, there is not a finding of fact that is not based upon the evidence taken in this case and based upon the uncontradicted evidence in the case, because throughout the defense there has been no testimony introduced to rebut a single allegation upon which your committee has based its findings. The committee has approached the question with an open mind and with great painstaking in the examination of the voluminous testimony that was taken in the case. There are many allegations of fraud and irregularities which the committee has found some evidence to sustain, but the committee has not incorporated such findings in its report, because it rested its case solely on the unquestioned fraudulent and illegal registration which was prevalent in the three precincts named in this report—the fourth, eighth, and ninth precincts of ward 5. The evidence in the case, which everybody who desires to read the testimony can find for himself, is that there were investigations made and it was found by inquiry at the residences given of voters who were registered and who had voted in this election that these particular voters did not in fact live in the places from which they registered and voted. There are in this testimony at least 300 or more specific instances of names and addresses of voters given who, the testimony shows, did not live where they voted from, and they had no right to vote in the election in the precincts in which they did vote.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Was there any evidence before the committee as to how those three hundred or more gentlemen voted in this election?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Not directly; but in view of the fact that your committee finds that over three hundred fraudulent votes were cast in these precincts, and in view of the fact that one hundred and twenty votes only were cast for Peter Tague in all those precincts, we know that at least the difference between three hundred and more and one hundred and twenty were illegal votes cast for the contestee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman restate those figures?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I say that this committee finds as a fact upon the evidence in the case, on the sworn testimony and not upon hearsay or rumors, but upon the facts proved in the case, that considerably over 300 illegal votes were cast in these three precincts, and that the total vote cast for Peter Tague in those precincts was only 120.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How many votes were cast in ward 5 altogether?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I have not the figures for ward 5; but the total votes cast for Congress in those precincts was 906, of which Mr. Tague received 120, and at least one-third, your committee found, were fraudulent votes cast by people who did not live in that district.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I find that two years ago the total votes cast in that district were 16,834.

Now, last year there were 15,293. In other words, considerably more than half the votes cast two years ago more than this year, although——

Mr. LEHLBACH. Those fifteen thousand two hundred and odd votes were cast for Members of Congress. The total number of votes in the congressional district was over 16,000, approximately the same as in the election of two years ago. In that election, the gentleman will remember, it was a presidential election, in which from 15 to 20 per cent greater vote is cast in every congressional district where the vote is free and they can come to the polls, and the small number of votes cast is due to the fact that there is a great unnaturalized foreign population in this ward.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the reason I asked the gentleman what was the total vote in ward 5—what the respective candidates received in ward 5. Has the gentleman those figures?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I have not where I can handily refer to them. They are in the report and my compilation which I have made for the sake of argument refers to the three precincts over which the controversy is brought.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman advise the House as to whether there is any evidence adduced tending to show at whose instance, if it be anybody, or any manager or any boss, that the supposed illegal votes were cast?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will answer that. Both at the primary evidence of gross illegal registration of fraudulent votes existed, and in view of the fact that the same condition obtained in the election based on the election returns, your committee did not report the findings on the primary in its report. But in the primaries there was an appeal to the Boston election commission and appeal to the ballot-law commission of Massachusetts, and subpœnaes were issued in due course to those men who were alleged to be illegal voters. Some were found and refused to obey the subpœna, and others could not be found to obey the subpœna in this primary contest——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I want to answer this question first. It was suggested at the hearing before the ballot-law commission that the case of the contestee would be prejudiced by the persistent refusal to obey the subpœna on the part of these voters, and Mr. Martin Lomasney, the head of the organization which had charge of the contestee's election in this ward, marched into the place where the ballot-law commission was sitting at the head of 45 of these men who were alleged to be the men upon whose names votes had been cast. He admitted he brought them in. He admitted the organization brought them in, because he thought there was some misapprehension, and at the congressional hearing they asked him to bring in a list of the Hendricks Club, which was the organization through which he worked, of these men whose right to vote was challenged, and who it was admitted were under his control, and yet he said, "I will not do it."

Mr. RAKER. Now, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. In ward 5, precincts 4, 8, and 9, how many votes were cast for Mr. Fitzgerald? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Six hundred and some odd votes.

Mr. RAKER. Just in those three precincts?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Six hundred and seventy-four were cast for Mr. Fitzgerald.

Mr. RAKER. How much for the contestant?

Mr. LEHLBACH. One hundred and twenty for Tague.

Mr. RAKER. Now, one further question: I understand the committee found there were 316 voters illegally registered and of that number 188 failed to appear when subpœnaed?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. One hundred and eighty-eight could not be found, or practically refused to appear. Were any of those who did appear examined as to who they voted for?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They were. I have here a compilation of the names of the witnesses who appeared and whose right to vote was challenged, and with the exception of a few every one of those by the testimony out of their own mouths were shown to have no right to vote where they did in this election.

Mr. RAKER. Just one question. I would like to develop further——

Mr. LEHLBACH. One more question, and then I must decline to yield further.

Mr. RAKER. Were the witnesses examined as for whom they voted? For instance, if they were legal voters, you could compel them to state how they voted. Were they asked for whom they voted?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; they were not.

Mr. RAKER. On neither side?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They were not.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. For a question.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I understand when the committee counted these votes that there was a difference of 10?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. In those three precincts, ward 5, there were 906 votes cast?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. And a majority of the committee says that 316 were fraudulent?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I want to know on what kind of evidence the committee based that statement that 316 of them were fraudulent votes?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Why, by the testimony of witnesses who had made personal investigation at the places where these men alleged they lived and found they did not reside there, and that supplemented by subpœnas of witnesses from places where they alleged they lived and where in truth they did live. It was proved in a large majority of cases they did not live where they claimed to live and vote, and the others could not be found in the district at all.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If you had taken the 316 votes as being fraudulent and made a proportionate calculation, what would have been the result?

Mr. LEHLBACH. These 316 votes were taken to be the sum total of the fraudulent votes in these three precincts, and if they had been distributed over the 677 that Mr. Fitzgerald had and those that Mr. Tague had, Mr. Tague would have had a plurality of the votes. That ought to settle the question. Your committee did not feel justified in bringing in a finding that Mr. Fitzgerald was not elected and Mr. Tague was elected on that basis and rest there, because the committee believes from all the evidence that 316 votes were not by any means the sum total of the fraudulent votes. And in the second place——

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. As to the 316 fraudulent votes which the committee found, were those made up of the total of the men concerning whose residences witnesses testified did not live within the precinct, plus those men whom you could not find by subpœna?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No, sir. Every one of these 316 is based on testimony that they did not reside in the district, and is supplemented either by the absence of those who did not appear and could not be found, and whom it was shown by women and relatives who testified that they lived in some place entirely different, and of those who were known and were in the district and could be found, but refused to obey the subpœnas, knowing that their votes were challenged in the place where they did vote, yet who did not come in, though being in Boston, and served by the United States marshal, to testify as to the votes they cast.

Mr. REAVIS. As I understand the gentleman, there was testimony that 316 of these voters did not live where the registration represented them to have lived?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is correct.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, was that testimony disputed?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That testimony was not disputed by a single bit of evidence.

Mr. REAVIS. It is in this record without dispute that 316 of these voters did not live in that district?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The record does not dispute the evidence in that respect.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield a moment? Some question has been made here as to whether it is shown by the record how these illegal registrants voted, whether for Fitzgerald or Tague, the presumption being, on that account, that it must be shown they voted for Fitzgerald. Will the gentleman discuss the law of the proposition as to the right to throw out precincts where fraud is alleged, and it is not shown how the parties voted, whether for contestee or contestant?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will a little later.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] has stated here on the floor in a casual way that there exists a law in Massachusetts which allows a man to live with his family in one place and for the purpose of voting maintain a residence somewhere else. There is no law like that in Massachusetts at all. The law as to the right to vote is embedded in the constitution of the State of Massachusetts, and this is what the constitution of the State of Massachusetts, as originally drawn and adopted by that Commonwealth, and as it still exists to-day, says:

Chapter II, section 2: And to remove all doubt concerning the meaning of the word "inhabitant" in this constitution, every person shall be considered an inhabitant for the purpose of electing and being elected into any office or place within this State in that town, district, or plantation where he dwelleth and hath his home.

That is what a voting residence means under the law of the State of Massachusetts; and your committee has not got such long ears that it will sit around a table and listen to such testimony as this, that a man lives with his wife and three or four little children in the town of Dorchester, that he goes to church there, that he entertains his friends there, that he sends his children to school in Dorchester, but that on the 1st of April he goes to some lodging house in the fifth ward to sleep overnight for the purpose of voting, that that man lives and dwells and has his home in the fifth ward of Boston. That is the testimony in hundreds of cases. We show in these three precincts that the registration is padded to the extent of at least one-third of the total number of votes there, and presumably to a greater extent than that.

Mr. REAVIS. Did the contestee, Mr. Fitzgerald, testify in this case?

Mr. LEHLBACH. He did not.

Mr. REAVIS. Was he invited to testify?

Mr. LEHLBACH. He was, repeatedly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by whom?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not. It is in the record that before the conclusion of your case, on several occasions, it was suggested that you testify. That can be read in the record.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may have been suggested; but I was never invited and never testified, and I was around the courthouse all the time. There was no reason why I should prove the contestant's case.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are two classes of these illegal voters. One class is the "mattress" voter. That term was injected in this case by Martin M. Lomasney. It means a man who lives somewhere else and goes to a lodging house in order to be registered on the 1st day of April, and who votes from there. He so informed the committee in his testimony. That was one class of illegal voters that existed. These men were bartenders, porters, lodging-house keepers, and so forth. There is another large class that was registered from lodging houses. Thirty-two votes were registered from one room in a place in Causeway Street, which Mr. GALLIVAN and other gentlemen from Boston call the "louse" house. These men can not be found at all, and, in fact, were probably never there.

When these people were summoned to appear and bring their hotel registers, with one exception, it was found that every single one of the 13 had destroyed their registers before Congress could examine them. That is evidence of the way the thing was worked.

Now, as to this class of voters, let me read at random from the testimony of one witness who did appear—Mr. Abraham Finkelstein. I read:

Q. What is your name, Mr. Finkelstein?—A. Abraham Finkelstein.
Q. How old are you, Mr. Finkelstein?—A. Thirty-six.
Q. Where do you live?—A. 77 Savin Street, Roxbury.
Q. That's in ward 16?—A. I couldn't tell you what ward it is in.
Q. But it is in Roxbury?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And 3 or 4 miles away from ward 5?—A. Oh, I believe so.
Q. And where do you vote from?—A. Down at a lodging house, 75 Causeway Street.

That is down in this territory.

Q. And why do you vote from a lodging house, 75 Causeway Street?—A. I have always voted in the West End all my life. I don't suppose that's any hindrance.

Q. How did you happen to do it that way?—A. The people ask me to vote there, and put your name on the list; something like that.
Q. By "people" you mean whom?—A. Well, half a dozen in particular. When it comes certain times, they ask you if you are still going to vote; they simply take care of you.
Q. Who are they?—A. I don't believe I know any of them by name, to call them by name.
Q. Members of the Hendricks Club?—A. I suppose they are.
Q. They took care of you that way?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. As a matter of fact, you have lived out there with your mother 10 years?—A. Ten years.
Q. And this is the practice; you have continued your name in this place all this time?—A. Yes. I go down there and they tell me where they will put me. I don't go disputing about it or bothering about it.

That is the practice. Then, on cross-examination:

Q. What I am trying to get at, you sleep when you go home in Roxbury; where do you consider your voting residence to be, Mr. Finkelstein?—A. 75 Causeway Street.
Q. And you ask people there to preserve that as your voting residence?—A. I don't believe I ever asked them; I don't believe I did ask them. They simply say they will put you here or put you there, and that's all there is to it.

All he has got to do is to vote. And there are hundreds of such cases in these three precincts. [Applause.] These three precincts are just saturated with that kind of thing.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. So much weight has been placed upon the illegal registering of voters that I wish to ask the gentleman if these men had not voted in the places where they did vote, would they not still have voted in the same congressional district?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Are you sure about that?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes. This congressional district comprises the first six wards of the city of Boston, and the places where the mattress voters come from are the suburban towns.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. That is only a part of the district?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes. If we confine our findings to the 316 cases and deduct them pro rata, Peter Tague is elected. But why should we deduct pro rata these crooked votes when we know that the registration lists were padded under the direction of the boss, who was supporting contestee? When you inquire into those districts you find that they are 33⅓ per cent crooked. We say we can not consider them in canvassing the result of the election; but that is no reason why 16,000 voters in this congressional district should be deprived of their right to vote for whom they want. And, setting aside these three crooked precincts which were overwhelmingly for Fitzgerald, and where any considerable number of crooked votes could not possibly have been cast for Peter Tague, we say that Mr. Tague was duly elected from the district by a handsome plurality, either when considered on the original returns or on the corrected returns.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BENSON. Were not these names on the registration books for years? Were they not there when you voted for governor?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Well, we have shown conclusively, I believe, that this was not an innovation, but had existed for a number of years.

Mr. BENSON. These men had been on the books for years?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They had.

Mr. BENSON. And they had attempted to vote elsewhere in Massachusetts, where they had a regular residence?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not know. There is no evidence that any of these votes were cast by men who voted elsewhere. That is simply an assertion made on behalf of the contestee.

Mr. BENSON. There is no evidence that these men voted in two places in Massachusetts?

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is no evidence that they voted in two places in Massachusetts, and there is no evidence to show that some of them voted at all, because 188 of them can not be found at all.

Mr. BABKA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BABKA. Did the committee make any investigation to ascertain whether or not these 316 men were on the poll books two years ago?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They did not.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood the gentleman to say that the committee did not believe in disfranchising 16,000 legal voters in the district because there was corruption in three precincts. Is that correct?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. On what ground does the gentleman justify the disfranchising of these other precincts, where he admits there was no illegal voting?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Because there can be no reasonable result arrived at by any other human device in those cases than by throwing out such precincts as are permeated by fraud. From the case of Wayne against Jackson up to the present time that doctrine has obtained. It was not applied to that particular case because three counties were involved that composed a substantial proportion of the entire district, so that the remainder could not fairly be considered to have held a determining election for the whole district, and in one or two cases where an entire city or county was involved, or where the majority of an entire district was involved, Congress has not applied the doctrine. But in every other instance where the case was proved Congress has applied the doctrine to throw out those districts that are so permeated with fraud that no honest return can be predicated upon the result and so satisfactorily decide the election.

Mr. TREADWAY. Why does the gentleman limit it to the precinct? Why not carry it to the ward or to the district, if his argument is logical?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Because precincts 4 and 8 and 9 are the places where this fraud occurred, with the exception of a very few cases. That is where it was entirely confined. There is no evidence of any illegal registration in any ward except ward 5, and there is evidence in the case showing that there are only 18 cases in ward 5, outside of these three precincts, so that they are all confined to those three precincts which form a compact territory in the heart of the city of Boston.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman does say that the committee thereby disfranchises two-thirds of the legal voters in those precincts. That is the conclusion, is it not?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The committee do not say that, because, as men judging evidence on the reasonableness of the case, they do not admit that the fraudulent voting was confined to the actual number of cases specifically proven.

Mr. EAGAN. Can the gentleman say whether there is personal registration in Massachusetts every year?

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is not.

Mr. EAGAN. What is the method?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The police come around on the 1st day of April.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. GOODALL. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman ask me that question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I can not yield.

Concerning the remedy to be applied, the Second Congress and the Fourteenth Congress discussed this doctrine, not with any question of disavowing it but as to whether it was to be applied in those particular cases. This is the doctrine that has been applied throughout the entire history of contested congressional election cases. It is the only doctrine which after mature consideration has been found to work substantial justice. To throw this case back and allow a new election to be held would do an injustice to the great majority of the voters of the district, depriving them of representation for possibly a year or more and depriving the contestant of his undoubted right to the seat, because under the evidence there is no question that he received a clear plurality of the honest votes that were cast. If you allow a new election after the proof in this case, it will be like saying that after you catch a man cheating there shall be a new deal and that we will commence all over again. The rule that common sense dictates is that when you catch a man cheating you deprive him of that for which he cheated and let the result be as it will after the cheater has been deprived of that which he wrongfully gained. That is the theory that underlies this doctrine and that has the precedents of the House behind it.

But even if you should only throw out the votes actually proved fraudulent and deduct them pro rata, then Peter Tague is elected, anyhow. Whichever view you want to take of the case theoretically, if you follow the evidence as found by your committee, you have got to seat Peter Tague and unseat John F. Fitzgerald.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I will use the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I would not bother the House with any further word, but for the wild expressions of the last speaker. You have heard now from two members of the committee, the excitable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] and the calm, judicial, fair-minded Republican from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

I said a moment ago that the record of the testimony in this case is not worth the paper on which it is printed. It was taken before two notaries, both of them rotten partisans. Counsel on each side might enter objection after objection, only to be overruled, and the stuff in that book of testimony was the laughingstock of Boston. Yet the gentleman who preceded me [Mr. LEHLBACH] quoted from that book. He calls it evidence. We in Massachusetts know it to be junk, and while those hearings were on we stopped reading the funny papers. [Laughter.] If you want to read a story of the twentieth century Ananiases, bother yourself with that book and then burn it up. [Laughter.]

I do not like to say anything personal about anybody. I tried to get the last speaker [Mr. LEHLBACH] to yield to me. I find on looking up his election that he was elected to this House by only 587 votes, and on looking over the files I find that there were certain allegations made by his opponent the day after election. I find also that a Democrat from New Jersey, who signed the majority report, was elected by only 299 votes, and they both come from the same city, and I have been told for months that the two votes from that city would be against Fitzgerald. If you read the evidence before the committee, you will find that the counsel who appeared for the contestee never had a fair show from the gentleman who has just taken his seat. His statements were challenged, sometimes ridiculed, and partisanship was shown by the previous speaker in every question he asked. I hate to say that.

They say that it was too late for Mr. Tague, after appealing from the various boards, to file papers. Why, they do not know what they are talking about. Under the law in my State, if you want to be an independent candidate you have to give notice before the primary. Does any one dispute that fact?

They talk about a liquor dealer having to live in the neighborhood of his liquor store. That is mere junk. There is not the shadow of truth in it. My friend from New Jersey wanted to know if we had an annual registration in Massachusetts. We do not have such a thing, but we have an annual visitation from the police in our city on the 1st of April, and we respect the police in Boston [laughter]—when we have a police force. They go from door to door, and they ask, "Who of voting age is living here?" And the good housewife has to answer the man in blue and brass every year. If the same names appear as appeared on the voting list of the year before, the election commission, under the law of the State, carry the names along from year to year.

The gentleman from New Jersey got very, very much excited. I think to any fair-minded man he showed bias. You heard what the Republican member of this committee from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] had to say in a calm, decent, argumentative way. I am going to vote for the Luce proposition, which will declare the seat vacant and give the people of the city another chance. I am going to do that because you have convinced me that there is some doubt as to who won. [Laughter.] I do not know why the gentleman laughs. He knows more than I do about crooked political methods, and perhaps that is why he laughs.

My friend referred to something that he said Mr. GALLIVAN knew about as the "louse house" in Boston. I never heard of it until it came from his lips. I have heard that in Newark they have many "scratch houses," and I presume he is familiar with them. There are none such in my district. Thank God I represent a residential, law-abiding people, where we never have contests of this kind. But that does not close my mouth to the fact that there is an attempt to take the ballot away from a thousand of my fellow citizens, and, as I said in my opening words, I would be ashamed of myself if I kept quiet when that attempt is being made in this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the Republican Members of the House to this point: If conditions in this ward were so wrong, a few years ago DAVID I. WALSH was elected governor of Massachusetts over Samuel W. McCall by a margin of 11,815, in a total vote of over 450,000. The Republicans were in full control at the statehouse. They had all the power and prestige that went with the governorship of Massachusetts. This ward rolled up a bigger vote for DAVID I. WALSH against Samuel W. McCall than it did for John F. Fitzgerald against Peter F. Tague.

When Gov. WALSH was inaugurated the Republican power and prestige to which I have referred went out of doors at the statehouse without a whisper from the great Republican leaders of my State, who know how to take a licking. Do you intelligent gentlemen believe that if what has been said on this floor to-day about Martin Lomasney and this ward is true that the Republican leaders in my State would have quietly assented to the inauguration of Gov. WALSH and his continuation in office without a contest? Of course not. They knew conditions up home, and they know that the vote of this ward when polled is honestly polled. Gov. WALSH served his term without the slightest objection from these Republican leaders and made such an excellent record that he was reelected governor. A year ago this distinguished Democrat was a candidate for the United States Senate against one of the Republican leaders in that body, a most lovable man, Hon. John W. Weeks. His margin was apparently limited, and Mr. Lomasney's ward gave him a tremendous margin over Senator Weeks. Did Senator Weeks squeal? Not he. He took his licking like a man, although it was a great disappointment to him, and Senator WALSH to-day is the junior Senator from my State, and is making the excellent record for himself and for the Commonwealth that we all knew he would make. These brief references tell the story, and that ought to be convincing to you gentlemen that what has been said about this particular contest by those who favor the unseating of Mr. Fitzgerald are either false or grossly overstated.

I said a moment ago that I had no intention to inject myself into this discussion until I learned that it was the intention of the committee to disfranchise 1,000 of my fellow citizens. When the vote is taken to-night, no matter what the result, I shall be proud and happy that I have said in the House of Representatives what I have said, and I will not change a word or blot out a sentence.

Mr. OVERSTREET and Mr. PHELAN were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, how does the time now stand?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has 31 minutes and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] has 28 minutes.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the contestant, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Tague.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I realize that I am here because the membership of this House has given me permission to present my case and because you seem to think that I have a case. I do not intend to deal in personalities of any kind. No matter what situation may arise, I am going to keep myself within bounds in this case, and I will address myself to the case just as it is set forth in the evidence which the preceding speaker [Mr. GALLIVAN] has recklessly declared is not worth the paper it is printed on. Let us bear in mind that this evidence produced by me was given under oath by every witness that came into court, and not one syllable of that evidence has ever been denied by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Fitzgerald]. Not one word of the evidence has been denied in any way, shape, or manner. Yet they come in here and ask you to disregard it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], responding to the lash of his boss, Mr. Lomasney, comes in here and speaks and acts as he has to-day because the leader orders that he must do it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] urges the passage of his amendment; but let me remind you that if you pass this resolution you will be doing just what Mr. Lomasney wishes and playing right into his hands.

I want my friends to realize that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] spoke the truth when he said that the contestee, Mr. Fitzgerald, does not live in this district that he wishes to represent. The evidence in this case given by Martin M. Lomasney states that he went out of the district to get Mr. Fitzgerald, because he could not find a man in the district who could defeat me. He went out to Mr. GALLIVAN's district and brought in this man whom he said was the most powerful factor in Boston politics. He brought him into the district to defeat me. Why? Because, as your colleague for four years, as a representative of my people for four years, I refused to answer the beck and call of Martin M. Lomasney. [Applause.]

It is only a short time ago when every Member of this House was called upon to act upon the question of war. There was not a man in this House who wanted to vote for war. There was not a man in the Nation who wanted to see war, but we all had to take our position on that question. The testimony shows that Mr. Lomasney demanded that when the President stood delivering his message to Congress, that I, as the representative of the people of Massachusetts, should insult the President of the United States, insult the people of Massachusetts, by interrupting the President and ask, "Mr. President, with all due respect to your exalted position, what is going to be the attitude of England toward Ireland?" This I refused to do. That is why I am being punished to-day by this man Lomasney, although I yield to no man in my desire to see Ireland a free independent nation. I was compelled to run on stickers; I was obliged to do this because of the manner in which the primary election was conducted. The report shows that with 14 votes still in question the gentleman from Massachusetts defeated me by 10 votes. Without my name on the ballot, when every man voting for me had to go in, take the ballot, wet the sticker, put it on the ballot at a particular place in order to vote for me; with the machine of Boston threatening every employee of the city and their friends, attempting to deny them the right to come in and cast their ballot, I was elected, my friends, by the people of that district by a greater vote than ever was given to a man in that district. And in the ward of this great Lomasney, this man who said, "Don't you dare to vote for war; don't you dare to vote for conscription; don't you dare in any way, shape, or manner to cast a vote that will help England to win," because he was so entangled with his pro-German proposition—that is all in the evidence. Every word of it is in the evidence, and everything I say to you is from evidence under oath.

Congress lays down the manner in which the evidence shall be taken. It says that there shall be 90 days to take the evidence and it regulates how it shall be taken before the notaries or a judge of the district. In 90 days we took the evidence, but we never could get the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Fitzgerald] to come into court and give evidence. Notwithstanding that, Mr. Feeny, his lawyer, and Mr. Callahan, his other lawyer, promised us on several occasions that Mr. Fitzgerald would come into court. When the case started we tried to find the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Fitzgerald], but he had gone to Palm Beach, and he never came back until our case was closed.

Mr. Fitzgerald is not a resident of the district, and when he talks of disfranchising people I want to know if it is not a greater disfranchisement of the rights of the people for one man to come into a district, where he has no moral right to go, and against the desires of the people, and claim the right to represent that district. I want to say to you that he had his opportunity to present his case in court. I stood for seven long days on the witness stand, with both of his lawyers hurling questions at me, and they never for one moment found one single bit of evidence that could be contradicted or show that I had been guilty of any wrongdoing in any way, shape, or manner.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] in his report says that I benefited by Lomasney. Let me give you what Lomasney himself said as to whether or not I was benefited by his support. Four years ago we had a bitter contest for Congress and there were seven candidates. One of them was a former Member of this House, Hon. John A. Keliher. The contest narrowed down to two or three men. Lomasney had put a candidate named Brennan in my ward, and tried to defeat me in that district, but the people of the district showed that I was their choice. The Sunday afternoon before Tuesday, election day, Lomasney decided to support me because, as he says in his testimony:

> Not that I wanted Tague, but that I wanted to lick Keliher; I wanted to kill Keliher—not that I wanted Tague.

Did I benefit by it? Let us see. The present ward 5 in those days was wards 6, 7, and 8 of the city. The vote in 1914 in ward 5 as now constituted was—Tague, 1,618; Keliher, 1,572 votes. I carried that ward by 46 votes. Let us see what the vote was a year ago when this contest was on. Fitzgerald, 2,570; Tague, 572. Is there any evidence of colonization there? Was there any control of the ward there? Was anything there that would lead you to believe that this entire district of ward 5 was in the hands of this political boss and leader? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] asks a question why so few votes were cast. The answer is plain. This is the greatest cosmopolitan district of the eastern part of this country. Almost every foreigner who lands in Boston takes up his residence in this district. There are over 200,000 people in the district, and yet there are only 26,000 who vote, because the great population are not naturalized. In this election we cast 21,000 of those votes, which is a big proportion when you figure that many thousand were absent engaged in the war.

The gentleman says that we have proven no fraud. I do not know how you are going to prove fraud if we have not proven it. Let me go into the case briefly, for my time is limited. At the closing hours of the last session many of you Members will remember that I came before the House and said that I was trying to take evidence in the contest which would come before this Congress, but that I was being defeated in my every effort, because the witnesses refused to come into the court, because the leader, Mr. Fitzgerald, had refused to go into the court, and the boss had undoubtedly said to them, "You must not go there." Now, let us see what took place in Boston last fall. I went home from here, as you all did, right previous to your primaries. Mr. Lomasney testifies that he had not seen me but once since April, when I went into his office in August. I asked Lomasney what his ward was going to do in the contest, and he said to me: "I want you to get out; the people don't want you any more; the people don't believe you have represented them by your votes on war and other things." I said, "Who have you got?" and he said, "I am going to run Fitzgerald, the ex-mayor of Boston, against you, and I want you to get out." I said, "What for?" He said, "We need a big man in Congress; we need a big man in Congress," and I said, "Can't you get one in the district?" He said, "No; I want a big man down there; I want him to go down there and come back and be mayor of Boston again." Then I said to him that I did not think I ought to retire, and he said, "Fitzgerald is a wealthy man; he will give you the two years' salary if you will retire, and we will have you appointed fire commissioner of the city of Boston for four years." I refused it. Then I met Mr. Fitzgerald in his hotel, the Quincy House. It was the first time that I had talked with him since he sat there in this House in July and told me that I was not going to have any contest.

I asked Mr. Fitzgerald why he was in the contest. He had sent for me and wanted to talk with me, and in company with Judge Sullivan, of my district, I went to see him. I asked him why he was a candidate, and he said, "Because Martin Lomasney wants me to be a candidate"; and then he, too, told me that the salary was nothing to him, that I could have the salary, and they would take care of me with a good job. I refused him, and I told him that I would go out and fight him, and I did. [Applause.]

The fight took place, and when the returns were coming in on election night—and the newspapers had said that I had been elected over Lomasney and Fitzgerald—Lomasney had cunningly kept out four of his precincts, right around the city hall, within a stone's throw of the building. Those precincts were held out, and while the papers were declaring that I had been elected by 92 votes, the returns showed that Lomasney had changed the tide by holding out the four precincts, and I was defeated by 100 votes. The next day I petitioned for a recount, and on the recount I asked that all of the ballots be seen, both the used and unused ballots, because I knew that the ballots had been tampered with. I asked, further, that the ballots be put on one table, so that I could see them; and six days after my petition the election commissioners called a recount, but instead of letting me see the ballots they spread them out over the room on tables where I could not see what was going on, and with all that against me they then declared that I had been defeated by 50 votes. But let us see. When counting up this ward 5, precinct 5, when the clerks counted the ballots they discovered 50 ballots missing. Where did they go to and who took them? We asked the commissioners to let us know, and to this minute those 50 ballots that would have elected me have never put in their appearance. In precinct 4, of ward 5—the same notorious precinct 4—the election commissioners sent down two ballot boxes, a registering box and an emergency box to be used in case of accident. The men counting the votes in that precinct took this emergency box, which is nothing but a slide box, where a man can put his hand into it, and from 6 o'clock in the morning until 10 o'clock that day, when the police officers went into the voting booth, they had been using that box, and at 10 o'clock the police officers stopped them from using it. They said they could not find the key to the box.

The police officer went out and telephoned headquarters, and in less than 10 minutes, when they returned, over 250 ballots had been taken out of the small box and rammed in the canceling machine box. The night of the close of the recount we asked the election commissioners if they would show us those 50 votes. They told us they would do so in the morning. They said we could see them in the morning. We went there in the morning and they adjourned and said we could see them in the afternoon. Tuesday afternoon we went again, and Wednesday morning and Wednesday afternoon we went again, and Thursday morning we went again, and they refused to let us see the ballots. Then, with my counsel, I went to the mayor and asked him to remove the election commissioners for malfeasance in office. The mayor sent for them and for the corporation counsel, and he advised them I was within my rights in asking to see the votes, and instructed him to let me see them. The next morning we were sent for, and we went there at 10 o'clock, and immediately upon entering the room the election commissioners were in executive session, and stayed there until 1 o'clock and refused to come out, and at 1 o'clock we went to the chief justice of the municipal court and asked for an inquest for ward 5. I went, together with my attorneys, and Chief Justice Bolster told us that on account of the condition of the public health, with the influenza raging, he had had to adjourn the courts, but that he would take it up for action after the court had come into session again. The case was not called up and I appealed. But these gentlemen love to stand up here and tell you what great men some of these men are. The election commission chairman was appointed by the gentleman when he was mayor of the city of Boston. Election Commissioner Murphy traveled around in Fitzgerald's automobile before the primary betting a lot of money that Fitzgerald would be elected. I then petitioned the ballot law commission for a hearing, and the hearing was granted. I summoned over 100 men, and I paid the sergeant at arms for summoning them, and those men refused to come into court.

They refused to come into court until Mr. Cunningham said he was not pleased with the situation, and then Boss Lomasney marched at the head of 40 men into court. They came into court and we were not permitted to ask a single question, notwithstanding the fact that I had summoned them and paid them the summons fee. Let me illustrate to you the questions which were put to these men. Nobody knew who the man was. "Is your name Mr. John Jones?" "Yes." "Do you live at Hotel Lucern?" "Yes." "Did you vote on the 24th of September?" "Yes." Those are the questions they asked of men who were on trial to say whether they had the right to vote or not. When one man was called my attorney said: "I know this man is Joseph C. Walsh, an inspector in the city of Boston, and he lives at 5 Rockdale Park with his wife and five children, and still he is permitted to say that he lives down at the Merrill House, Cambridge Street." In that hearing 22 men testified that their names had been voted on and they never voted. I brought into court testimony from the War and Navy Department to show that the names of 17 boys serving their country under the colors were voted on, and that one of the boys whose name was voted had died in France even before the primaries, and yet his name was voted on. I would not stain my name or my reputation by taking a nomination that was won with the blood of boys who were fighting for their country. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Fitzgerald said Tague is talking about my boys; that I insulted his sons who served their country's cause. Do not believe it, my friends. I have never done so, and I have denied this charge on so many occasions I wonder his object in repeating it. But his reason for repeating it is this: They want to hide the sin they committed by voting on dead soldiers' names even as they voted on election day on another dead soldier's name.

You ask, my friends, how I know for whom they voted. Let me tell you. This Hendricks Club is presided over by Lomasney, who has control of that ward, not only the Democratic politics but the Republican politics. He controls the Republican committee as well as the Democratic committee. He names the precinct officers on the Republican side just as he does the Democratic officers, and the gentleman [Mr. LUCE] who wants this election thrown out was the recipient of the Republican votes of that ward when he ran for lieutenant-governor. Mr. Lomasney has a club, as I have said, called the Hendricks Club. The president of that club is James Friel, or he was up to the time of this contest, when they changed officers. The financial secretary then was, and is now, James Graham. Mr. Graham and Mr. Friel were in charge of this precinct 4 of ward 5 on primary day, and on that day the name of James Friel, jr., and James Graham, sons of the president and secretary of the Hendricks Club, were voted on in the precincts where their fathers had control. Whom did they vote for? You know. No man can go in there with a blackjack and gun and vote unless they say so.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Where were the boys?

Mr. TAGUE. They were in France. The ballot law commissioners made us close our case on Friday. We presented to the ballot law commission 20 more witnesses that we pleaded with them to summon, and the commissioners told us they had lost the summonses. On Friday they closed the hearings, and we never got a decision from the ballot law commission until Tuesday afternoon before election at half past 2.

If that decision had come on Saturday, I could have gone to the courts of my State and I would have had the name of that man, Mr. Fitzgerald, thrown off the voting list. But it was then too late, and I was obliged to run on stickers, and I did run on stickers. I had to have stickers printed, and I had to have sample ballots printed. I had to go to considerable expense in order to win the cause for which I was fighting. Here is the sample ballot [exhibiting]. I had this printed and sent through my district, and here are the stickers. On election day we found that with cunning and astuteness they had caused to be printed a sticker without any mucilage on it [laughter], and those stickers were distributed around the district by his lieutenant in Boston, Representative O'Hern, who, by the way, was defeated for election because this charge was put against him.

We had our contest and the return said I was defeated by 350 votes. We had our recount, and in the recount I gained over 100 votes. But after the recount it was plain that I could not get a square show from the election commissioners, who were subservient to the will of Fitzgerald and Lomasney. One of these commissioners who testified before the ballot commission said to Lomasney after he had testified, "Did my testimony satisfy you, Mr. Lomasney?" [Laughter.]

I love to hear them tell about their great man. He is great to those who are great to him, but cross him and you are gone.

We had our election and our recount, and I had sufficient votes, notwithstanding they will tell you I had not, to be elected. It was not until 11 o'clock on the day of the recount that we found these irregularities, and then we challenged the votes that were being counted, but previous to that time over 500 votes had been passed on, and if these 500 ballots had been brought down here with the rest of the ballots and counted by your committee I would have won this election by over 200 votes.

We had our hearing before the notaries. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], my former colleague, says it was a joke. Yes; it was a joke. It was a joke because we summoned 500 witnesses in that district; it was a joke because the summonses were served by the United States marshal, and I paid the United States marshal for serving the summonses; it was a joke because the witnesses were told not to come into court, and they ignored the law of Congress and said they would not come, and they did not come. But we went out and got the evidence. One gentleman says, "What evidence have you to prove that these 316 votes were illegal?" Let me tell you. The gentleman's—Mr. Fitzgerald's—own brother, a police officer in the city of Boston, was summoned to appear in court, and he did not come. We proved that he lived in the town of Winthrop, outside of Boston, with his wife and five children. We took Lomasney's lieutenant, Patrick J. McNulty, and we proved he lived outside the district, in Revere. We took the evidence of 400 of them, and that evidence is undenied; not a single case was denied, not one of them denied the evidence; and that is what you want to settle this case by—the evidence that has been presented under oath and undenied. We proved conclusively that over 500 men were illegal voters in those three precincts that they plead with you not to throw out. Who made them so? Who disfranchised them? The man whose name is challenged and who refuses to come into court when summoned surrenders his right before the court. These men surrendered theirs, and if there is any disfranchisement they are the ones who disfranchised themselves. During the hearings we had our witnesses. I wish I had time to go into all their testimony. Mr. Lomasney appeared. He came into the United States court, pulled off his coat and vest, and put on an old gray sweater and said, "Now, come on." And he defied everybody.

He abused everybody. He even abused the great leader of this House, JAMES R. MANN [applause], who had nothing to do with this contest. He even abused that good old champion of the people, our good Uncle JOE CANNON [applause], who had nothing to do with the contest. He abused former Congressman O'Connell, my attorney, and everybody whose name was mentioned, including the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Fitzgerald], whom he said was "a slimy eel." [Laughter.]

That is the evidence Mr. Lomasney put into court. That is in the evidence, and to-day he pleads with you, this same Martin M. Lomasney pleads with you, to send the case back to the people, so that he can have one more fling at the people of the district. Are you going to debauch the people of that district by doing it? Are you going to say to the people of Boston that Mr. Lomasney is bigger than the Congress of the United States?

Oh, they tell us I received his support two years. I did not. There was not anybody a candidate against me. I never received his support until he had to give it to me. [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time is left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has 28 minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I yield my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Fitzgerald.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if any part of what the gentleman who has just taken his seat, Mr. Tague, has said is true, of course I ought not to be a Member of this House, and I would not attempt for a moment to take up the time of this House to argue my claim. But what he has said upon the floor of this House is what he has said during the past year in Boston, in Washington, and everywhere, and it is not true. He has abused and vilified everybody who has had any connection with this case—the election commission officials of Boston, the State ballot law commissioners of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the secretary of state, the governor of the Commonwealth, and the supervisors that were appointed by the governor to supervise the election. The crowning act, which will, of course, amuse the Members from Massachusetts, is that he now charges that Martin M. Lomasney delivered ward 5 for ROBERT LUCE for lieutenant governor.

It seems incredible that a man could repeat these lying charges when they are so well contradicted in the reports, and I am not going to attempt to follow him in all the mendacious statements he has uttered here, because time does not permit. If he mentioned the election commissioners once in his speech he mentioned them half a dozen times, and yet this is what a majority of the committee who report for his seating find:

It is but just to state that in its review of these ballots the committee found the work of the board of election commissioners of the city of Boston to be fair, impartial, and accurate, the difference in its determination and those of the committee being substantially due to the fact that the Boston commission was guided by an opinion of the Attorney General rendered 20 years ago.

And yet upon this floor within the past 20 minutes he has accused them of every conceivable crime in election annals. Yet you have just heard the evidence of the committee which favors his election. Mr. PHELAN, who has been an honored Member of this House for a good many years, a close friend of Mr. Tague, has told you that Mr. Cunningham, chairman of the ballot law commission, who has been appointed by Republican and Democratic governors for 20 years, is a man of spotless integrity and of the highest honor, and yet this man stands upon the floor and calls him a "crook" and wants you to believe it.

This so-called evidence, Mr. Speaker and friends, is Mr. Tague's own statements; that is all. There is not any evidence to substantiate any of the things that he has said on the floor of the House or in his brief. In his argument he made these same charges, all of which have been proved untrue, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] and everyone admitting it. He says that if the said election board had counted these hundreds of votes which are available in the exhibits and which have been marked, and which should have been counted for the contestant, that your contestant would have a majority of over 300 votes. He speaks of the flagrant refusal by election commission and ballot commission to comply with the law in determining questions arising from such fraud, and the fraud of ballot commission in withholding their decision. He says the election officials did not credit him with several hundred votes that were cast for him, and that illegal practices were indulged in throughout ward 5 in Boston, consisting of fraudulent registration, voting for the contestee, coercion, intimidation, bribery, and other irregularities. He says that fraud and intimidation were perpetrated upon the voter in distribution of pseudo pasters, whereby many voters were deprived of their right to register their proper choice for Congressman. And in no single instance, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, is any one of these charges sustained by any of the committee, either the majority or the minority.

Mr. Speaker, you heard him talk about pasteless stickers. The committee say they did not find evidence of one pasteless sticker. Though they looked at the ballots with a microscope, not one pasteless sticker was found. Not in one case was there an illegal vote found that was cast for me. Not in one case was there an arrest made in that district that day, and they have not proven one case of illegal registration. If the chairman of the committee will say that they have, I will cease now and move that Mr. Tague be admitted unanimously to this House. There is not a single case, not a bit of evidence except his own testimony read from notes submitted to him by people whose evidence was merely hearsay.

Whatever the result of this contest shall be, I hope that the situation with reference to the taking of testimony will be corrected. The evidence was heard before notaries, and, as Mr. GALLIVAN says, Mr. Tague selected his notary and I selected my notary, and Mr. Tague's notary, having the first 40 days, shut out everything that could be used in my favor, and when my notary was appointed he did the same thing, and that is the evidence, and that is all the evidence.

There was not an arrest made; there was not a single case of illegal voting. There was not a man who has been found guilty of illegal registration; and, as Mr. LUCE has said, those names which are to be thrown off were on the list all the time that Mr. Tague was a Member of this body. I do not know where he gets the figures that he read here a moment ago about the vote in ward 5 when he was nominated for Congress, but I ask him in all seriousness if he means to say that he was nominated against Mr. Kelliher without the vote of ward 5? Is the gentleman here? Does he mean to say that he could have been nominated without the ward 5 vote? Where is he? I can not believe his figures. Here are the official figures: He was defeated by Mr. Kelliher by more than 100 votes until he came into ward 5, and it was the overwhelming vote given him in ward 5 that made his nomination over Mr. Kelliher possible.

Mr. TAGUE. I will answer the gentleman's question and say that in the primary contest the name of Martin M. Lomasney got into the contest; and if it had not been for that, I would have beaten Mr. Kelliher by a bigger vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I asked you, yes or no, whether you did not win your nomination by the vote of old ward 8, which is now part of ward 5?

Mr. TAGUE. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You were not nominated by old ward 8, now ward 5?

Mr. TAGUE. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I stop here. If the gentleman was not nominated by old ward 8, now ward 5, I will ask that he be admitted unanimously as a Member of the House. Mr. LUCE has just used these figures. They are the official figures of the election commission of Boston. What do you think of a man who will deny the official election figures of the State of Massachusetts? I will not use the ugly word, but I brand him as misrepresenting the vote in this ward and shows himself unfit to sit in this House. Mr. Tague, these figures are from the official election returns in Boston, and you know they are correct. You received 1,108 votes in ward 5 and Mr. Kelliher received 406 votes in ward 5, and without ward 5 you had 5,092 and Mr. Kelliher 5,168; and if it was not for the votes that were given by Mr. Lomasney to Mr. Tague he would never be in this House. He says my statements are false. I can not prove them other than give you my guaranty that the figures quoted above are official, but whether I am a Member of this House or not, I will see that the official figures of this contest are inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Members will have the chance to see for themselves who is telling the truth.

The gentleman speaks about the illegal registration of voters. He talks about disfranchising a thousand legal voters in ward 5 because they are illegally registered; and what do you think of this situation which was shown to exist in his own home. He has fathered the system he condemns on this floor right in his own home. Here is the official record. Here is Mr. Tague's testimony, on page 447, in regard to Capt. Goggin, of the Boston fire department, in which he admitted that Goggin registered from his house. Asked whether Goggin was married or not, he said he did not know, although he had registered from there for five years. Then the question goes on: "Did he use the right of voting from your house?" He answered, "Never." Then he was asked, "Then, in the last four years he has not voted at all?" "No, sir." "Are you sure?" "Positively."

He states that Capt. Goggin never voted from his house, and yet the record of the Boston election commissioners shows that Goggin voted in 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917 from 21 Monument Square, where no other family but Tague's lived, although at the same time Goggin had a family in Somerville—a wife and four children—with his wife's name in the telephone book. I ask the gentleman whether that statement is true or not?

Mr. TAGUE. Will the gentleman let me answer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. TAGUE. Goggin appeared and testified under oath. He made this statement: "I did not take any part in either the primary or the election, and did not vote. I did not vote in 1917 or 1918." And the election commissioners' record shows that Goggin did not vote in either the primary election in this contest, or for two years. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not say that Goggin voted in 1918; but I repeat that Mr. Tague appeared and gave testimony—and, gentlemen, do not let him camouflage——

A MEMBER. Read it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am going to read it. He was asked in his testimony:

Did he use the right to vote from your house?
No.
So, in the last four years he had not voted at all?
No, sir.
Are you sure?
Positively.

And yet this man Goggin admits that he voted from Tague's house in 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917. I did not say he voted in 1918. Tague would not let him, with this row on, but he did vote in these other years, though Mr. Tague denies it.

Martin Turnbull votes from his mother's house. Martin Turnbull lived in Somerville. His wife lived in Somerville, and his child lived in Somerville, yet he voted from Tague's mother's house. There, my friends, are two concrete instances in Tague's own household of illegal registration, yet he has the audacity to stand up here and charge fraud for the same thing done in ward 5. His counsel, Mr. O'Connell, admitted that while he lived in Brookline he was elected from Dorchester, and yet they have the effrontery to come before this House without any evidence excepting hearsay evidence and ask that a thousand men be thrown out of the list.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the majority of the committee say I was elected but by 10 votes. They say that on prima facie evidence there are 316 illegal residents. Why disfranchise a thousand men of their birthright if I was elected by but 10 votes and you have prima facie evidence of 316 illegal registrations? Why not throw 11 of these illegal registrants off and I am defeated? Why, because there is no evidence but hearsay of 316 illegally registered votes. We are in a very serious contest in Massachusetts now, and I appeal to the Republican side of this House to give consideration to this thought, and I ask the Democratic side of the House as well. Mr. Long, the Democratic candidate, came within a few thousand votes last year of defeating the Republican candidate.

Senator WALSH, a Democrat, won last year and occupies a seat in the Senate with Senator LODGE. The State is as close as that. What is the condition of ward 5 voting list this year? Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, with this fierce contest on, with the house and senate in Massachusetts dominated by the Republican Party, the ward 5 voting list, according to the official count a week ago, shows 280 votes more than were on the list last year.

Is it possible that the Republican Party is so stupid that though it has full charge of the election machinery in Massachusetts, with the State practically 50-50, that it allows hundreds of fraudulent Democratic voters to remain on the list? Is Mr. DALLINGER, who is the chairman of one of the election committees of the House; is Mr. TREADWAY, is Mr. TINKHAM, is Mr. WALSH, of New Bedford, all these bright, brainy Republicans of Massachusetts, are they cognizant of the fact that there are hundreds of illegal Democratic votes on the list in ward 5, and they have not taken a single bit of interest to see that those votes are removed from the voting list this year? Why should this House disfranchise 1,000 men in Massachusetts when the committee did not go outside of its own door to consider the evidence? Do you think we are so bereft of fairness, do you think we are so careless of the rights of citizenship that in Massachusetts conditions such as have been described on this floor can get no proper relief under our laws? Shame on Boston and Massachusetts if that could be true. These names never were contested in Massachusetts from the hour that I received the nomination until the present hour.

He says he was cheated in the primaries. The primaries antedated the election by seven weeks. Mr. LUCE knows, Mr. TINKHAM knows, that the Boston board of election commissioners is open eight hours a day to receive complaints about illegal registrants. This man, though a year has elapsed, has never darkened the door of the election commission to present a bit of the evidence that he has presented here to-day, for if he did those men would be sent for. The law requires that they be sent for and appear, and if they do not prove that their names are entitled to go upon that list they are dropped off. This question rises away above the personality of Mr. Tague and myself. For the United States House of Representatives, out of a clear sky, without any evidence that a single illegal vote was cast for me, without any evidence that there was an illegal registrant, to deny to me an election is the greatest outrage that has been perpetrated upon the people of Massachusetts. It is an insult to their intelligence and an indictment of their institutions. He speaks about the soldier boys. Gentlemen, imagine it. My own boy in France at that hour, my three girls in the Red Cross, and he is dastardly enough to stand upon this floor and intimate that myself or my friends are responsible for voting on soldiers' names. There is not a single bit of evidence that the name of one absent soldier was voted on at this election, and he knows it; yet he stands before this House and uses falsely dead soldiers to win his fight. Shame upon such methods.

It is a fact that Mr. Tague, when he was defeated for the nomination, set on by big financial interests that were behind the Fish Trust which I fought, was told by them to go for this job, and they said, "Tague, we will seat you down at Washington," and Tague went after the job in that way. As I said before, he never has appealed to the election commissioners of Massachusetts, he has never appealed to the courts. Read the papers now about the Newberry contest with Mr. Ford, and you will find that out in Michigan the fraud is being investigated by the grand jury, and that is where this contest should be first fought out, but up to the present hour nobody in Massachusetts has been asked to investigate a single charge that has been made by this man. He says that I offered him the two years' salary. It is his own lying statement. He accused Lomasney of saying so. His own lying statement. As Mr. LUCE said to me the other day, there were not 20 pages in this whole testimony that would be admitted in any court. Ninety per cent is allegation by Mr. Tague without proof.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. What does the gentleman say about that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Say about what?

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman says that Mr. Tague gave his word that you offered him the salary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, of course, I say it is a pure invention, and on my honor I say that I never said it. There is not a single bit of evidence to prove this any more than the rest of his charges and you know it, Mr. RHODES.

Mr. RHODES. Why did not you go on the stand and deny it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why was I under the necessity of going and proving Mr. Tague's case? I challenge you, Mr. RHODES, to name one statement made by Mr. Tague that has been proved.

If I were to attempt to follow him, as his statements here to-day show, in mendacity, I would be kept at it all of the time. It seems impossible for him to talk two minutes without falsifying. Was not the gentleman himself present with other members of the committee when Mr. Tague, in the final summing up, asked that the committee settle this matter quickly, and turned to his counsel, Mr. Harrington, and said, "This counsel of mine has been down here at big expense to myself for the last six weeks, and I think the case ought to be settled"? Was not the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] there at that time? I knew that Harrington was working for the Government, and when I got through with the hearing I called up the Treasury Department and asked them if Arthur Harrington was on the pay roll, and they said, yes; that he was on the pay roll down in the Internal Revenue Office at $1,800 a year with $240 bonus. Yet this man, in the presence of six members of the committee, turned to them and said, "This man is down here at big expense to myself." This is but another of the lies that he has told from the very hour he started after this seat.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, to indicate the character of this man, listen to this: He was a candidate for the mayoralty of Boston in December, 1917. Get his character from this incident. He was a Member of this House in December, 1917. His term did not expire until March 4, 1919. The sworn returns of his campaign expenditure when he ran for mayor of Boston show that he accepted, or his agent did for him—the treasurer of his campaign committee—$500 from the treasurer of the Pneumatic Tube Co., $500 from Mr. Buckley, the counsel for the Pneumatic Tube Co., and $200 from the vice president of the Pneumatic Tube Co., which in that very Congress, of which he was a Member, sought a franchise from this body.

Mr. GALLIVAN. How many votes did he get?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Can you imagine it? One thousand six hundred in all. In that campaign, when Mr. Gallivan, Mr. Curley, and Mr. Peters ran, Mr. Curley and Mr. Gallivan and Mr. Peters received from 25,000 to 45,000 votes, and this man in all Boston received but 1,600 votes. There is on file in the evidence copy of a letter which he does not deny, in which he expresses a wish to get in with some contractor on war work. Here is the letter to Mr. Lomasney, then his friend but who now gets his execration. And in passing let me say that I agree with Gov. McCall's estimate of the man, that he was the biggest man in brains in the Massachusetts constitutional convention.

(Peter F. Tague, tenth district, Massachusetts, Joseph F. Kane, secretary.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 28, 1918.

Hon. MARTIN M. LOMASNEY,
11-A Green Street, Boston, Mass.

DEAR MARTIN: Last week I wrote you a note asking you to give me at once the name of the contractor who I could use on this building, which is about to begin. When I was in Boston, you told me that you would get the same and send it to me at once, and as the building of all the cantonments and housing propositions are under way, and I have an opportunity of getting in on them, I would be pleased if you would give me this at once.

With best wishes, I am,
Very sincerely, yours,
"PETER."

Why, either one of these incidents brands him unfit to associate with the Members of this House, and if they were probed to the bottom he would never be given the privileges of this floor.

I appeal to you gentlemen, in conclusion, that you consider the fundamental rights of American citizens. It was in this very district that you intend to disfranchise that were born and cradled the liberties held dear by every American. Sam Adams was born in this district, John Hancock was born and lived in this district, Benjamin Franklin was born and lived in this district. Faneuil Hall is there. The old statehouse is there, and the old South Church, and its whole atmosphere for more than 100 years has spelled sacrifice for the very principles you are asked now to subvert. Do not do it. I was told more than once that the Republicans were going to frame me. I never believed it. I always felt with ROBERT LUCE as a member of that committee I would get justice, and I believe I will get justice. And I say to you, Mr. Tague, the question now at stake is the honor of that district. The honor of that district can not be properly protected by taking away a thousand of its voters, and I appeal to you as a man to protect the honor of the district which sent you to Congress for four years, to back up the Luce report and both of us appeal to the district, so then no injustice may be done.

Are you man enough to do it? I await your answer. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. Under the rule of the House by unanimous consent it is agreed that the previous question should be considered as ordered on the resolution to be offered by the gentleman from Maine and substitutes by the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. The Clerk will first report the resolution offered by the chairman of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John F. Fitzgerald was not elected a Member of the House of Representatives from the tenth congressional district of the State of Massachusetts in this Congress and is not entitled to retain a seat herein.

2. That Peter F. Tague was duly elected a Member of the House of Representatives from the tenth congressional district of the State of Massachusetts in this Congress and is entitled to a seat herein.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia present a substitute?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw the substitute with the permission of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That neither Peter F. Tague nor John F. Fitzgerald was duly elected a Member of this House from the tenth congressional district of Massachusetts on the 5th day of November, 1918, and that the seat now occupied by the said John F. Fitzgerald be declared vacant.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. May I ask whose motion that is?

The SPEAKER. It is a motion by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the indulgence of the House to ask that the resolution be read again?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] is not to present the resolution declaring me to be entitled to a seat, I intend to support the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not debate. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER proceeded to count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Does not the gentleman wish to wait until the count is completed?

Mr. BLANTON. Since the Speaker has started. [Laughter.]

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 46, nays 167.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a verification of the vote by a call of the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks for the yeas and nays. Nineteen gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas seemed to have it——

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the question. [Cries of "Too late!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. I was on the floor addressing the Speaker at the time the vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman. The gentleman demands a division of the question. Of course, it clearly raises two separate questions, and the question is first on the first half of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John F. Fitzgerald was not elected a Member of the House of Representatives from the tenth congressional district of the State of Massachusetts in this Congress and is not entitled to retain a seat herein.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the second section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Peter F. Tague was duly elected a Member of the House of Representatives from the tenth congressional district of the State of Massachusetts in this Congress and is entitled to a seat herein.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no other side.

So the resolution was agreed to.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TAGUE, wish to be sworn?

Mr. TAGUE appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office administered by the Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWNING, for 10 days, on account of business.

To Mr. HUTCHINSON, for 10 days, on account of business.

To Mr. CULLEN (at the request of Mr. O'CONNELL), for 10 days, on account of illness.

PASSPORT REGULATIONS.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9782, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9782, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, I understand from the title that this is the passport extension bill for the extension of the war passport provisions. The House the other day by an almost unanimous vote—I believe there was only one vote in opposition—passed the legislation. The other body has made it permanent rather than a one-year extension, and I sincerely hope that the conferees on the part of the House, if they are selected, will give due regard to the vote by which the bill was passed in the House, and that before we decide to make it permanent legislation the House will have a chance to vote on the matter.

Mr. RAKER. Further reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request?

Mr. RAKER. I would like to reserve the right to object for the purpose of asking a question. I think we would save time.

Mr. BLANTON. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Texas insists on the regular order——

Mr. RAKER. Under the present circumstances, if I can not get opportunity to ask the gentleman a question to-night, I will object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker, to permit the gentleman to ask one question.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to know whether or not if we would send it to the committee that would expedite it, or had we better disagree to the amendment and let it go to the conference?

Mr. ROGERS. I think it would be better to let the bill go to conference. I will say to the House it is my own impression that we ought not to make the law permanent until the House has an opportunity to express its will and indicate what is its pleasure. And rather than to be bound by instructions at this time, I expect to bring this back to the House before I acquiesce in an amendment making it permanent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. ROGERS, Mr. TEMPLE, and Mr. FLOOD.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill H. R. 8954, the amendment to the pure-food act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill which he has cited. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five days to file minority views on the bill S. 2775.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for five days in which to file minority views on the bill to which he has referred. Is there objection?

Mr. SINNOTT. Reserving the right to object, could not the gentleman get his report in to-night?

Mr. RAKER. I will state to the gentleman that if this matter comes up any time on Monday or Tuesday, I will be on hand.

Mr. SINNOTT. It will possibly come up sooner than that.

Mr. RAKER. If it does, the time granted to me will not affect in any way the bringing up of the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Not in any way jeopardize the consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no. My views on some amendments is all that I desire to present to the House.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, it is late in the evening, and not many Members present, and a good many members of this committee are not present, so for the time being I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 446. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to transfer fractional block 6, of Naylor's addition, Forest Grove, Oreg., to the United States of America for the use of the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture;

H. R. 2452. An act for the relief of Charles A. Carey;

H. R. 753. An act for the relief of Susie Currier; and

H. R. 333. An act providing for the disinterment and removal of the remains of the infant child, Norman Lee Molzahn, from the temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to a permanent burial place.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, October 24, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of a bill for the relief of Lieut. D. A. Neumann, Pay Corps, United States Naval Reserve Force (H. Doc. No. 270), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GREENE of Vermont, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3706) amending the Articles of War, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 406), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 354) for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 2775, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 407), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 408), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HULINGS (by request): A bill (H. R. 10130) to provide for the establishment of the Bureau of Production and Distribution in the Department of Agriculture to aid in the production of cattle, sheep, hogs, milk cows, and chickens, and for the preparation for market of same and the distribution of these products, together with all other food and food products; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10131) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Sharon, county of Mercer, State of Pennsylvania, three German cannon or fieldpieces, to be placed in the public park and Grand Army of the Republic Cemetery as a soldiers' memorial; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. THOMPSON: Petition of sundry citizens of Ohio, asking consideration of the Cummins bill now before Congress, which takes away individual initiative, and asking that fair and wise treatment be given the railroad security holders in order to promote the development and prosperity of the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, October 24, 1919.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, October 22, 1919.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have a number of telegrams printed in the RECORD. I should like to have the one I send to the desk read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., October 22.

Senator HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.:

Resolved, That the National Council of Congregational Churches, now in session at Grand Rapids, Mich., voices its gratitude to Almighty God for the triumph of right over might and the return of peace. The council favors the ratification and adoption of the peace treaty and the covenant of the league of nations without amendments and with only such reservations as shall strengthen the moral influence of the United States. While not indifferent to imperfections, and anticipating adjustments under the test of actual operation, the council regards the league as substituting reliance on moral principles effectively organized for dependence on military policy subject to the balance of power. The council supports the covenant as the only political instrument now available by which the spirit of Jesus Christ may find wider scope in practical application to the affairs of nations. Through this covenant the conscience of mankind registers its determination to renounce aggressive warfare, and the United States assumes responsibility in promoting freedom and justice among the peoples of the earth.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent by telegraph to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate.

By order of the council. W. E. LOUGEE, Secretary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, resolutions unanimously adopted after full discussion in Chicago by the Baptist Ministers' Conference of Chicago and vicinity, in support of the league of nations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BAPTIST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE OF CHICAGO, ILL.,
Chicago, Ill., October 14, 1919.

The Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith and forward to you a resolution which was presented at and, after full discussion, unanimously adopted by the Baptist Ministers' Conference of Chicago and vicinity, in regular session, Monday, October 13, 1919.

Very respectfully, yours, C. T. HOLMAN,
Secretary.

Whereas the loss of millions of lives and the wastage of billions of treasure in the World War most impressively admonish us to provide against another such war; and

Whereas America's part in the late war has given our Nation a commanding position in world affairs and this influence should be used to help organize the nations against war; and

Whereas the covenant for a league of nations is part of the peace treaty, and if agreed to by the nations of the earth will make another great war almost an impossibility; and

Whereas this covenant for a league of nations is not a legal, but a high moral bond and is made in the spirit so native to Baptists, being a spiritual organization that will hold the nations together for common ends; and

Whereas the Northern Baptist Convention, under date of June 2, 1919, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we express our gratitude to God for the return of peace; that we recognize in the Paris covenant for the league of nations a great step in the advance of Christian civilization; and that we urge our people to use their utmost influence to secure its ratification"; and

Whereas the following religious bodies have expressed themselves in much the same manner in favor of the proposed league of nations:

The Methodist Episcopal, July 4, 1919;

General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, May 15, 1919;

The Board of Bishops of the United Brethren Church;

Sections of the Congregational body;

Many bishops and other religious leaders for their groups;

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in the following plea at Cleveland, Ohio, May 6, 7, 8, 1919:

"That we express our gratitude for the establishment of the league of nations as agreed upon by the Paris peace conference, and pledge our support in securing its ratification by the Senate of the United States, and our devotion to make it a success": Therefore be it

Resolved by the Baptist Ministers' Conference of Chicago and vicinity in regular meeting this Monday morning, October 13, 1919, First. That we express our great joy in the thought of the world being leagued together against war and for peace in international relations.

Second. That the covenant for a league of nations as part of the peace treaty is the beginning of a new and powerful fellowship of the nations, which will bind the earth together for peace and mutual good will.

Third. That we urgently request the Senators from Illinois and their fellow Members of the United States Senate to agree to this new covenant as part of the peace treaty and to do so without amendment or reservation, which would make it necessary to resubmit the treaty of peace to the peace conference, and thus dangerously delay the making of peace among the nations.

Fourth. That we are not opposed to such interpretations of the various provisions of the treaty and the covenant as shall make clear our own understanding of the obligations we thus assume, and that these interpretations become a part of the record of ratification.

Fifth. That we urge our Baptist people to use every proper effort to bring our Senate to an early vote on ratification of the peace treaty and the consequent creation of the league of nations. We believe that the ratification of peace awaits only the vote of our National Senate.

Sixth. That copies of this resolution be given our Baptist newspapers, furnished to the daily press, sent to the United Senators from Illinois, filed as a petition to the Senate, and spread upon our own records.

(Signed) CARL D. CASE, President,
C. T. HOLMAN, Secretary,
Baptist Ministers' Conference of Chicago and Vicinity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Also resolutions unanimously adopted by the Second District California Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations, representing 5,000 mothers in northern California, in favor of the league of nations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CALIFORNIA CONGRESS OF MOTHERS AND PARENT-TEACHER ASSOCIATIONS,
Los Angeles, October 11, 1919.

Senator HITCHCOCK,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HITCHCOCK: The Second District, California Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations, representative of 5,000 mothers in northern California unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

"Whereas the late war was fought by the allied peoples to end war, as the great statesmen have testified, not once but many times; and

"Whereas the peace conference at Paris has drawn up a constitution of the league of nations designed to achieve peace; and

"Whereas we, the members of the Second District, California Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations, representing 5,000 women in seven northern counties in California, desire an end of wars, and believe that the league of nations will make for peace: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we heartily indorse the league of nations; that we urge our fellow-citizens to support it; that we call upon our representatives in the Senate to ratify it; that we send copies of these resolutions to President Wilson, Secretary Lansing, Senators JAMES D. PHELAN and HIRAM JOHNSON, and to our Representatives; and that we give copies of the same to the press."

We, as a Nation, must think constructively—not destructively. "America's participation in the war was to make the world safe for democracy," and we believe the league of nations, without reservation or amendment, is a step of progress.

The opportunity has come to finish the task undertaken for the benefit of mankind. Let us accept the responsibility, realizing the magnitude of power for good America has, and let us show the generations to come that true democracy never dies.

Cordially,

Mrs. L. P. BOYCE,
Secretary, Women's League for the Peace Treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Also a letter from Mr. Hamilton Holt, editor of the Independent, giving the result of a postal-card vote among returned soldiers and sailors from France, representing 554 for the league of nations as against 12 who were opposed and 5 who wanted reservations.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE INDEPENDENT,
New York, October 20, 1919.

Senator G. M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HITCHCOCK: I wrote to Mr. Frank Andrews, who is the chairman of the League to Enforce Peace, in Fall River, and who was presiding officer when I had my debate there, for the information concerning which I spoke to you, and I have received the inclosed letter. He told me that they originally sent out 2,500 questionnaires to returned soldiers in their neighborhood, and these are the replies that he got. I think it will be very interesting when some one says the soldiers are against the league of nations.

Very truly, yours, HAMILTON HOLT,
Editor.

FALL RIVER, MASS., October 16, 1919.

Mr. HAMILTON HOLT,
Independent Corporation, 119 West Fortieth Street, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. HOLT: Yours of the 14th instant at hand. The result of the poll among the returned soldiers and sailors was 554 for the league of nations, 5 wanted reservations, and 12 were opposed.

Very truly, yours,
FRANK L. ANDREWS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Also a number of communications from California, representing protests against the attitude of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 21, 1919.

Hon. GILBERT HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

On October 5 the Los Angeles branch of the League to Enforce Peace conveyed to the United States Senate through you certain facts to convince them that the people of the State of California were not in harmony with the views and stand expressed and taken by Senator JOHNSON on the peace treaty and the covenant.

We are now conveying to you additional facts which conclusively prove that our former stand was correct, and that the people of this State, if given an opportunity at the polls, would overwhelmingly repudiate the Senator and his stand upon the covenant.

During the last few weeks there has been a tremendous wave of sentiment in favor of the ratification of the covenant of the league, which has no parallel in the history of this State.

In a very recent letter written by former Senator Prescott F. Cogswell, now supervisor of the first district in Los Angeles County, concerning Senator JOHNSON'S attitude, he said:

"During the six years that Senator JOHNSON was governor of California as a member of the California Senate I gave him undivided support, but I regret to say that in his present attitude upon this question he does not represent either the people of California or the Republican Party of this State. At a meeting recently at which was present a man who was candidate for governor of this State on the Republican ticket six years ago; a man who was a candidate for United States Senator on the Republican ticket eight years ago, and who is being seriously considered as a candidate a year hence; the chairman of the county Republican central committee; and a number of the most prominent members of the Republican State central committee, it appeared to be the unanimous opinion of all that if the ratification of the peace treaty and league of nations were left to a vote of the Republicans of the State of California entirely eliminating the Democratic Party it would be ratified by a majority of ten to one."

The sentiment of California is clearly expressed in a resolution passed at San Bernardino by the conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, as follows:

"Whereas there has been much confusion in the minds of some of our citizens with reference to the league of nations, which confusion has been encouraged and increased by certain petty politicians and radical newspapers, some of which had doubtful tendencies with regard to their patriotism: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Los Angeles annual conference of the Methodist Church South, meeting in San Bernardino on October 16, 1919:

"First, That any man who endeavors to inject a spirit of bitterness and controversy into the present international situation is not only a traitor to his country but a traitor to the world.

"Second, That we favor the adoption of the league of nations without amendments or reservations.

"Third, That we request our Senators from Arizona and California to support and vote for the same."

Our organization has received since our last report resolutions from organizations and groups of people from all southern California asking for the immediate ratification of the covenant without amendment, including the Los Angeles High School Teachers' Association, representing eleven hundred teachers; the faculty of the University of Southern California; the Glendale Union High School; Pomona College; and innumerable other educational institutions. Many women's clubs have adopted similar resolutions. Orange County League to Enforce Peace, composed of former supporters of Senator JOHNSON, has sent communications demanding the Senator's support of the covenant of the league. The California Teachers' Association in Oakland last week, twenty-three hundred in attendance, indorsed the covenant without amendment. In addition to the general church federation, different denominational church unions and individual churches throughout southern California have indorsed the league. In fact, the churches and educational institutions of our State stand almost unanimously in favor of the adoption of the league covenant without amendment. Nearly every county in southern California has sent petitions to our headquarters signed by superior court judges, business men, city officials, and private citizens, indorsing and urging the approval of the league. An actual vote taken in southern California from many commercial, financial, and industrial concerns, churches, and lodges shows a vote of 16,710 for adoption of the covenant, as against 1,692 against adoption.

The following communication received by the league speaks for itself:

"We, the undersigned, former supporters of Senator JOHNSON, have considered the pleas which he made in this State in opposition to the league of nations. He advanced no new arguments, and, in fact, in his speech at Shrine Auditorium he did not quote a single line of the covenant. He placed a wrong interpretation on the provisions of the covenant and made corresponding statements concerning its effect. He based his appeal upon national hatred and racial prejudice. We especially deplore his attack upon the motives of the countries who are our allies and hundreds of thousands of whose sons lie dead beneath the fields of Belgium and France. His speeches reveal his hostility to the entire treaty and any league of nations with the United States as a party. He preached a false Americanism that can only properly be characterized by the word "jingoism." In this great crisis we had a right to expect the Senator to state his cause from a standpoint of reason and intelligence and not from passion and prejudice. We express our deep disappointment because of his failure to meet this great issue from a standpoint worthy of the great office in which the people of this State had confidence to place him in.

"Harlan G. Palmer, president Young Men's Johnson-for-Senator Club; Clyde C. Johnson, secretary Young Men's Johnson-for-Senator Club; Arthur W. Eckman, secretary southern division Republican State central committee, Johnson campaign; Thomas Hughes, executive committee of Republican State central committee, 1918; Charles Farwell Edson; Theo. Martin; George H. Dunlop."

Senator JOHNSON'S trip to California has clearly shown the people of this State that his sole object is to defeat the covenant of the league rather than to amend it. In his Los Angeles speech he said: "I consider that the league of nations at present is entirely useless." Hon. Herbert Hoover says: "If the league is to break down, we must at once prepare to fight. If we believe we can see our neighbors return to a 30 years' war through the breakdown of this treaty and we still maintain our progress it is the egotism of insanity. I am convinced that if we attempt now to revise the treaty we shall tread a road through European chaos." Mr. Hoover voices the belief, sentiment, and conviction of 90 per cent of the people of the State of California, and they will overwhelmingly repudiate the sentiment expressed by Senator JOHNSON at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Also, telegrams indicating the drafting of petitions with hundreds of signatures forwarded to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] against his position in the Senate.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Also a brief article by Chief Justice Frank M. Angellotti, of the Supreme Court of California, on the subject of the vote of the British Empire compared with the vote of other nations.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE "SIX TO ONE VOTE" OBJECTION TO THE TREATY.

[By Frank M. Angellotti, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of California.]

"Much of the opposition to the ratification of the treaty is based on the claim that the British Empire is given by the provisions of the covenant of the league of nations six votes to the one vote of the United States of America. This claim rests on the fact that Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India are all members of the league. It is, of course, impossible to conceive of any effective league without the participation of such self-governing dominions as Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. At the same time all of the five are, in a sense, integral parts of the British Empire, and if it were true that by reason of the vote they are given as separate units, the interests of America may be substantially prejudiced, no real American could approve the proposed compact as it stands.

"Careful consideration of the provisions of the covenant, however, demonstrates that there is no possible prejudice to America therein.

"The functions of the league are to be exercised by the council and the assembly.

"It is only in the assembly, where each member of the league has one vote, that any of these dominions or colonies of the British Empire has a vote, or ever can have a vote without the consent of the United States of America. No one of them is now entitled to a vote in the council, which will consist solely of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers (the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan), and, until other selections by the assembly, the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Spain, and Greece, each nation being entitled to one vote only (art. 4, covenant). In place of any of the last four named nations the assembly may from time to time select other members of the league for representation in the council, but a unanimous vote of the assembly is essential to any such selection. This is so because article 5 of the covenant provides that except where otherwise expressly provided in the covenant or by the terms of the treaty, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting. It is not otherwise provided as to such selections. The United States is a member of and has a vote in the assembly, and consequently there can be no such selection without her consent. Again, with the approval of the majority of the assembly, the council may name additional members of the league whose representatives shall always be members of the council. This must be done by the council by unanimous vote. Obviously America's consent is here essential. Again, the council may increase, with the approval of the majority of the assembly, the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council. Here, too, the selection by the assembly must be by unanimous vote. (See art. 4, covenant.) These are all the provisions as to membership in the council. It is perfectly plain that without the consent of America neither Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, nor India, nor indeed any member of the league other than the nine now specified in article 4, can ever be represented in the council, except as the five just named are represented by the British Empire with its one vote.

"We come, then, to a consideration of how we can be prejudiced by these votes in the assembly. Here, again, it is obvious that in all matters in which a unanimous vote is required we can not be injured, as our one vote therein amounts to an effectual veto of action. What may the assembly do by less than a unanimous vote?

"1. By a two-thirds vote it may admit to membership in the league any fully self-governing state, dominion, or colony giving effective guaranties of its sincere intention to observe its international obligations, and accepting such regulations as may be prescribed by the league in regard to armaments, etc. (art. 1). It is evident that the addition of a new member even against our vote, a most improbable contingency, could not prejudice us, if by the vote of such member, when in, nothing of importance can yet be done, unless we by our own vote consent thereto.

"2. By a majority vote it may regulate all matters of procedure at its meetings, including the appointment of committees to investigate particular matters. (Art. 5.) These matters are manifestly unimportant.

"3. As already noted, it may, by a majority vote, approve the unanimous selection by the council of additional members of the league, whose representatives shall always be members of the council; and by majority vote may approve unanimous action by the council increasing the number of members of the league to be unanimously selected by the assembly for representation on the council. Obviously our vote is required for any action.

"4. By a majority vote it may indicate its necessary approval of the unanimous selection by the council of any successor to the person named in the covenant as the first secretary general of the league, or any subsequent incumbent of that office. The secretaries and staff of the secretariat are appointed by the secretary general with the unanimous approval of the council. (Art. 6.) Here again our vote is required.

"5. By a majority vote it may ratify such proposed amendments to the covenant as are unanimously ratified by the members of the league whose representatives composed the council. (Art. 26.) Again our vote is required.

"If there be anything in any of these matters by which we may be prejudiced by the votes of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India, it certainly is not apparent.

"In only one other instance can the assembly do anything by less than a unanimous vote. In the event of a dispute between members of the league likely to lead to a rupture, which is not settled and as to which the parties do not agree to a submission to arbitration, to a tribunal agreed upon by them, as they undertake to do by the terms of the covenant wherever the dispute is of such a nature as to be suitable for submission to arbitration, and as to which the council, to which the matter may then be submitted for consideration, either on its own motion or at the timely request of either party, makes a reference to the assembly, the assembly may, with the concurrence of the representatives of all the members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, 'exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute,' make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto. (Art. 15.) The same thing is true as to a dispute between a member of the league and a State not a member of the league, and between States not members of the league. As to the immediate question under consideration, it is manifest that where we are not a party to the dispute, being a member of the league represented on the council, our concurrence is essential to any report of the assembly, for it is so expressly provided. And if Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India are parts of the British Empire, as is conceded, wherever one of them or the British Empire itself is a party to the dispute, it would seem that all of them are necessarily parties to the dispute, and that none of them can have a vote in the matter of such report, for the language excludes 'the representatives of the parties to the dispute.' This certainly is a plain, common-sense construction of the provisions of the covenant, and the one all the members of the league will doubtless insist on in any possible dispute with the British Empire or any of its dominions or colonies. So that in any possible dispute between us and the British Empire or any of its integral parts which may finally be referred to the assembly for a report, while our vote is excluded, so likewise are the six votes of the British Empire and its five constituencies. It may safely be assumed, I take it, that as to any dispute between us and some other member than these, which may be so referred for a report, there can be nothing other than advantage to us in the participation as separate voting entities of Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand. In any event it would seem that a complete answer to any objection based on the existence of these so-called extra votes in the assembly in the matter of the report to be made, is to be found in the fact that, regardless of who are the parties to the dispute, the report of the assembly to be effective for any purpose must be concurred in by the representatives of every one of the members of the league represented on the council, exclusive of the parties to the dispute, exactly as in the case of a report of the council.

"Moreover, it is most unlikely that any dispute to which we may be a party will ever be referred to the assembly for a report. The first obligation imposed by the covenant in case of such a dispute is to seek a settlement by arbitration, the agreement of all the members being to submit the subject matter to arbitration by a court of arbitration, agreed on by the parties or stipulated in any convention existing between them. In this connection the establishment of a permanent court of international justice is provided for, and to this court or any other tribunal agreed upon by the parties the matter may be submitted. It is only in the event that a submission to arbitration is not agreed upon that the matter is to be submitted to the council of the league. Such a submission is effected by any party to the dispute giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the secretary general. When it is so submitted the first duty of the council is to endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute. If it succeeds in doing this, of course, the matter is ended. If not so settled, the council may make a report, which to be effective for any purpose whatever must be unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, or it may refer the dispute to the assembly; and it must so refer it when either party to the dispute so requests within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council.

"Furthermore and most important: The only effect of an effective report by either council or assembly is as follows: The report must contain a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto. 'The members of the league (including, of course, the disputants) agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.' (Art. 15.) Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its obligations in this behalf it will be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, who undertake to then proceed in the manner provided in article 16. Only if the disputant resorts to war with another party which has complied with the recommendations of the report is there any action against it by the other members of the league based on the report.

"In the light of these facts, does it not seem that the objection we have discussed is entirely without substantial merit, and that it affords no good ground for the rejection of the treaty as it now stands, as is in effect proposed by an attempted amendment favorably reported by a majorty of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations?"

Mr. ROBINSON. I present a resolution adopted by Centerville Camp, No. 14439, Master Woodmen of America, of Hope, Ark., touching the ratification of the league of nations, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so referred.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on yesterday, as appears by the RECORD this morning, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce reported the bill for the return of the railroads to private interests, and stated that he was authorized by the committee to make the report. As there was no morning hour I had no notice of the fact that the report was to be presented on yesterday. Otherwise I would have been present, and would have stated that the report was not a unanimous one from the committee; that I dissent from the report; and that I shall at such time as the written report is filed by the chairman of the committee ask leave to file as a minority my views in dissent. I shall at the appropriate time present a substitute proposition to that reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ought to state that the present occupant of the chair as chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee in presenting the bill stated that later there would be both a majority and a minority report.

Mr. PHELAN. I have a telegram from railroad interests in California affecting the railroad bill before the Senate which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 15, 1919.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Electric railways in California are unanimous and very earnest in conclusion that legislation related to return of steam railroads to private control should not include interurban and street railway system in any manner, even though some of them may, as incidental to their other business, be engaged in interstate traffic. We, of course, as connections of steam roads expect to be controlled with respect to interstate rates and safety-appliance acts, as we are now, but national legislation as otherwise proposed will not help and is apt to harm us greatly. Our revenues, whether we do interstate business or not, are dependent to the extent of 90 per cent or more upon traffic purely local to our lines, and in many cases 100 per cent. So dependent rates, upon which we live without exception, are dependent upon local conditions, including motor-vehicles competition, franchise obligations, State and city control, and attitude of public; and while you can not help us in such matters by national legislation, you may harm greatly through other measures in your bill. A highly important industry, already finding it difficult to live, the conditions on the electric lines that have interstate business are apt, in large measure, to control conditions on those that do not, and so we feel we have one common interest in asking that all interurban and street railways be excluded.

Bakersfield & Kern Electric Railway; Central California Traction Co.; Fresno Traction Co.; Glendale & Montrose Railway; Humboldt Transit Co.; Los Angeles Railway Corporation; Sacramento Northern Railroad; Oakland Antioch & Eastern Railway; Pacific Coast Railway; Pacific Electric Railway Co.; Pacific Gas & Electric Co.; Peninsular Railway; Petaluma & Santa Rosa Railway; San Diego & Arizona Railroad; San Diego Electric Railway; San Francisco, Napa & Calistoga Railway; San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways; San Jose Railroads; Santa Barbara & Suburban Railway; Stockton Electric Railroad; Union Traction Co.; United Railroads of San Francisco; Visalia Electric Railroad. (Twelve California electric railway associations.)

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PHELAN. I also present a resolution of the Native Sons of the Golden West, Colusa Parlor No. 69, of Colusa, Calif., protesting against the present conditions of the immigration of Japanese to this country, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas we are deeply and vitally interested in the advancement of the State of California and the welfare of the people; and

"Whereas the Japanese and Hindu population in California is increasing rapidly; and

"Whereas these people will always remain in our midst an alien element, unassimilated and unassimilable; and

"Whereas their presence here lays the foundation for a race problem more serious than any that ever confronted us and may lead to armed conflict, which may again involve the world, since at least one of these races will be backed by a proud and war-like nation; and

"Whereas the only way to solve a race problem is to stop it before it begins; and

"Whereas the most feasible way to stop it is the prohibition of immigration from oriental countries: Now therefore be it

"Resolved by Colusa Parlor, No. 69, Native Sons of the Golden West, That our Senators, HIRAM W. JOHNSON and JAMES D. PHELAN, and our Representative, CLARENCE F. LEA, be asked to use their best and utmost endeavors in favor of the following proposition, to wit:

"1. Cancellation of the 'gentlemen's agreement.'
"2. Exclusion of 'picture brides.'
"3. Rigorous exclusion of Japanese as immigrants.
"4. Confirmation and legalization of the policy that Asiatics shall be forever barred from American citizenship.
"5. Amendment to section 1 of Article XIV of the Federal Constitution providing that no child born in the United States of foreign parents shall be considered an American citizen unless both parents are of a race that is eligible to citizenship.
"Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of said Members of Congress.

[SEAL.] "NATIVE SONS OF THE GOLDEN WEST,
"COLUSA PARLOR, No. 69.

"Attest:

"W. G. DANSON, Recording Secretary."

THREATENED COAL STRIKE.

Mr. THOMAS. I have been requested to ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD three telegrams from my State relating to the present coal strike.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., October 20, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The demand of the coal miners for a 60 per cent increase in wages and a reduction in working hours at the mines from 48 to 30 hours per week will mean a heavy increase in cost of coal to the consumers and industries which they can ill afford, and the reduced production of coal due to fewer hours worked will cause a shortage of coal that will result in suffering to every community in the country There is not enough coal produced now to take care of the present demand. With the entire winter before us, we sincerely trust you will use your good offices in trying to prevent such a calamity by vigorously opposing a strike, opposing any increase in wages to the men at the mines, or any decrease in the present working hours.

THE UNITED STATES PORTLAND CEMENT CO.

DENVER, COLO., October 20, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The threatened coal strike will mean nation-wide suffering, and the demands made by coal miners for a 30-hour week and 60 per cent increase in wages will increase the cost of coal to a figure that will curtail industry seriously and will increase the cost of necessities enormously. Can you use your influence to avert strike, especially in view of the fact that present wages for mine labor are now way above the value of the returns to society? It would seem that it is time to control the labor skates who are responsible for unwarranted propaganda as to the horrible condition of the laborer and the absolute unfairness of the employer. Compel the union to incorporate before dealing with them, and thereby create responsibility under the laws the same as other bodies.

WESTERN CHEMICAL MFG. CO.

DENVER, COLO., October 21, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The threatened coal strike will mean nation-wide suffering and closing down of all industries. The demands made by coal miners for a 30-hour week and 60 per cent increase in wages will raise the price of coal to a figure that will be prohibitive and at the same time curtail the production of many million tons annually. There is not enough coal produced now under eight hours per day worked at the mines to take care of the present demand. With the entire winter before us, every individual and industry is vitally interested, for the result will be an enormous increase in the cost of all the necessities of life. We sincerely trust you will use your influence to avert strike and to oppose any settlement that would result in an increased cost of coal to the consumer or any change in present working hours at the mines, in view of the fact that present wages for mine labor are commensurate with present living costs and the eight-hour day is a very reasonable workday.

THE DENVER MFRS. ASSN.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to have one telegram of five lines read and the signatures of several others given that refer to the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CASPER, WYO. October 23, 1919.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As business men of Wyoming and in the interests of commercial life of America we urge and earnestly bespeak your influence to avert threatened coal strike as we feel that the consequences of such strike would only spell ruin to business. We are short 3,000 tons now.

NATRONA FUEL CO.

Mr. WARREN. I have differently worded telegrams but referring to the same subject from the Casper Coal & Coke Co., a large operator named W. R. Johnson, the Natrona Power Co., the Natrona Fuel Co., the National Supply Co., and an individual coal owner by the name of George Stilphen, and also from the Bennett Oil Co. and the Leidecker Tool Co., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I have received from George P. Kimmel, a patent attorney residing in the city of Washington, relating to the condition of the business in the Patent Office. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Patents to the contents of this communication. I will not ask that it be read, but I do ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 23, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I write you about a matter that is of vital importance to the country as a whole and to many of your constituents in particular. As an attorney having a large practice before the United States Patent Office, I am in a position to know whereof I speak. When I say that conditions in the Patent Office are simply terrible and constantly growing worse, I am not stating the facts too strongly.

This is a matter over which the Commissioner of Patents certainly has no control, but it is something that must be put squarely up to Congress. It is something that patent attorneys, inventors, and manufacturers throughout the United States are even more vitally interested in than the Commissioner of Patents and the employees in that branch of the Government service.

Because a committee of Congress fails to realize the vital importance of this branch of the service is no reason why the matter should be dropped there. The situation plainly is that some of the very best men in the Patent Office have resigned and others will resign to accept positions which will amply compensate them for the use of their extraordinary knowledge and experience. I am sure that the details of the lamentable situation that this is creating in the Patent Office can be obtained from the proper officials thereof. Taking one instance alone, that of the division which issues certified copies of patents, and they are seven months behind with their work. This means, in a great many cases, that inventors filing applications in Great Britain are compelled to pay a fine of $11 because of their inability to file certified copies of their patent with the foreign application within the time limit prescribed by the British patent laws, while others may lose their foreign rights entirely by reason of this delay. The matter of procuring copies of patents cited in connection with searches or pending applications is absolutely exasperating to attorneys who must practice before the Patent Office. The other branches of the service are equally handicapped simply because Congress fails to appreciate the situation and meet it promptly and in an effective manner.

Something must be done! That something must be done immediately! In the interest of your constituents—attorneys, inventors, and manufacturers—won't you please lend your aid in this direction?

Very respectfully,

GEO. P. KIMMEL.

CONFIRMATION OF ADMIRAL ROBERT E. COONTZ.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs as in executive session. I report favorably the nomination of Robert E. Coontz, to be Chief of Naval Operations in the Department of the Navy. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration and confirmation and that the President be notified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, the report will be received. The Secretary will state it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Rear Admiral Robert E. Coontz, United States Navy, to be Chief of Naval Operations in the Department of the Navy, with the rank of admiral, for the term of four years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed and the President will be notified.

SEDITIOUS UTTERANCES BY STRIKERS.

Mr. HARDING. I send to the desk for printing in the RECORD a series of resolutions adopted by the Youngstown (Ohio) Chamber of Commerce, calling the attention of the Department of Justice to certain inflammatory revolutionary utterances made among the steel strikers of Youngstown without any governmental interference or restriction whatsoever. With the resolutions are certain quotations from these utterances which I think ought to be made a matter of record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas certain meetings have been held in the city of Youngstown recently consisting of alleged radical elements; and

Whereas such meetings have been addressed by openly avowed Bolsheviki representatives; and

Whereas the spreading of Bolsheviki propaganda by such addresses is to develop a dangerous condition in the already inflamed minds of the particular element likely to attend such meetings; and

Whereas in view of the existing steel strike it is regarded as detrimental to the interests of the community as a whole to have such meetings occur with speakers repeatedly spreading the violent Bolsheviki propaganda: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Department of Justice of the United States be urged to take immediate cognizance of this condition and to have its representatives at Youngstown attend meetings of this character and to suppress all further possibilities through prosecution of speakers publicly preaching the Bolsheviki doctrines, which are openly and without equivocation of the most violent and seditious nature.

THE YOUNGSTOWN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
PAUL J. JONES, Vice President.
FRED A. LABELLE, Secretary.

EXTRACTS OF SPEECHES MADE AT RESCH'S HALL, WEST FEDERAL STREET, OCTOBER 9 AND 15, 1919.

The object of these meetings, according to the assertions of the speakers, is to organize the workingmen for the purpose of taking forcible possession of the industries of the country and overthrowing the Government. The following extracts from speeches made at these meetings are submitted as proof of their intentions:

"With the flame of the steel strike burning we will soon have fresh fuel added to our red fire by the coal miners' strike and then the railroad workingmen will strike and help to keep the fires burning."

"Socialism is dead. This is a revolutionary organization. This movement is spreading all over the world, and we are going to overthrow all capitalistic governments."

"I am glad that they look upon me as a Bolshevik. I am looking for something to burst in the American Federation of Labor, and then Samuel Gompers will be sent the way of all kings and others who have betrayed the working class."

"When the time comes we are going to march into these mills and take possession of them, and we will run them to suit ourselves."

"The people are now receiving their pay for their loyalty and patriotism to the United States Government during the war. At Gary, Ind., they are putting the people into stockades with barbed wire on top. Your pay day will come in Youngstown when they send in the soldiers and plant machine guns on the corners of the streets."

THE HOUSING PROBLEM.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask that an address delivered by my colleague, Senator CALDER, at the sixteenth annual convention of the Real Estate Association of New York State on Saturday morning, October 18, be printed in the RECORD. This address has to do with a most important problem, namely, the housing problem, which my colleague has studied very carefully and it contains an excellent résumé of the situation. I ask that my colleague's address be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

Senator CALDER'S address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR CALDER AT THE SIXTEENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION, REAL ESTATE ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK STATE, HOTEL MCALPIN, NEW YORK CITY, ON THE MORNING OF SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1919.

THE HOUSING PROBLEM.

"In discussing the housing problem as it affects the United States, we must note that 'it is a condition, not a theory, that confronts us.'

"This condition, stated in the simplest and most direct terms, is that the United States lacks approximately 1,000,000 dwellings to meet the normal needs of the population; that abnormal conditions in business, due in a large part to the war and governmental interference with the natural course of trade and business, has turned from the building industries the money usually invested therein, the result being growing congestion of population, increasing taxation, and higher rents, with no relief in sight through any of the usual agencies of business.

"In addressing the United States Senate on August 9, 1919, I stated the situation, as I saw it, in the following language:

"During the war the policy of the Government was to divide its work among the different concerns in the same line in proportion to their capacity to perform. There was a fixed price and a fixed profit. There was little or no competition. It was, as the President has put it in dealing with our labor troubles, a matter of collective bargaining. The prices of a given article were practically the same, no matter from where or by whom quoted. To-day one must pay practically the same price for what he buys, no matter who sells it to him.

"During the war we abolished the economic law of competition and in its place have created a system of cooperation, where men in every line of industry are assured a profit on their output. This is all very fine in theory, but what about the ultimate consumer? The man who builds houses to-day not only competes with other men who have old houses for sale, houses built when prices for the material and labor that went into them were little over half what they are at present, and while this era of high prices has made large profits for those who were wise enough to purchase houses under old-price conditions, the man who builds houses to-day runs a great risk of having difficulty in disposing of them unless they are unusually attractive and different in type from those built in prewar times.

"Referring to my remarks on the subject in the Senate during the year previous, I also stated as follows:

"I pointed out then that the action of the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board in discouraging the loaning of money for building purposes would bring on a situation that by this year would be exceedingly difficult. Building was also discouraged by the War Industries Board; in fact, that board, over my protest, issued an order, which was generally obeyed, prohibiting building of every character without a permit from that board. Their object was, of course, to utilize the funds that would ordinarily go into building construction for the purchase of Liberty bonds and other war purposes. The War Industries Board also insisted that the material necessary for the construction of houses could not be spared and that the labor necessary for the same could be better utilized in manufacturing material for the Army and Navy abroad. I insisted that while every possible effort should be put forth to obtain for the Nation everything needed to carry out the war program, it was entirely unnecessary for us to break down the whole fabric of the building industry to carry out this purpose. I called the Senate's attention to this condition in detail, and I advised the War Industries Board that the complete destruction of our building organization would undoubtedly work havoc in the future. The results indicate that the statements I then made were entirely correct, for when the war was over and those who had been engaged in building pursuits resumed their operations they were compelled to organize from the ground up. As a result we have had inefficient help in many of these plants during the present year.

"Because of these governmental acts to-day's housing situation was inevitable. Man, in his wisdom, makes the attempt to interfere with the laws of trade. He has never been successful, no matter how often or in what fields he makes the endeavor. Neither does he learn by his experience; and so it comes about that in the first quarter of the twentieth century we find man setting out to contravene the law of supply and demand, with the usual results of throwing the business world into convulsions, entailing a long period of readjustment, with its trouble and suffering.

"At the time of the Civil War statesmen of the day thought it possible to escape the difficulties due to the scarcity of coin by the legal-tender act, which, after having been once declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, was afterwards given a legal standing by what is now generally conceded to have been a forced construction of our fundamental law. Future generations will pass their verdict upon the action of governmental authority during our recent war, and while they may not find any contravention of the laws set forth in the statutes they will decide what they did might have been done with less disturbance and upsetting of business and trade.

"Are statistics needed to substantiate the claim that there is a scarcity of dwelling construction? If so, take the figures showing the amount of money spent for dwellings in the three largest boroughs of Greater New York. It can be shown that even so late as the year 1916 the money spent for dwelling houses in the boroughs of Manhattan, Brooklyn, and The Bronx amounted to more than $76,000,000. As is well known, even that expenditure failed at that time to meet fully the increasing demand, so it must be evident that the failure was greater during 1917 and 1918, when the expenditure for the two years combined was about $29,000,000. Of this comparatively small sum about $10,000,000 was spent in 1918, so that when the armistice was signed New York was spending $10 for new dwelling houses where, in 1916, it was spending $76.

"With this tremendous diminution in accommodations for shelter, there is an increase in the population, thus producing an enormous strain upon the existing accommodations, creating a contest among occupants for the needed space which would of itself produce a rise in rent. In addition to this the costs of administration, paid chiefly through taxes on real estate, have also increased. To meet these increased charges additional taxes had to be laid on old buildings, which addition the landlord passes on to the tenant in the form of higher rent, and as a consequence we have such spectacles as are seen almost every day in the great metropolis—rent riots.

"A momentary consideration of the figures available shows that it is probable that the yearly expenditures during normal years for real estate improvements throughout the country approximates $3,500,000,000. If, as seems to be the case, the expenditures for last year for new construction were less than $300,000,000, it does not take much of an accountant to figure the gross loss and to show the increasing pressure upon existing accommodations.

"Statistics are available as to the number and amount of real estate mortgages placed upon New York property during the war years. From these it appears that from 1905 to 1914, inclusive, the average number of mortgages each year was 42,960, whereas the average number during the four years, 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918, was 5,461; or about 12¼ per cent of the average for the value of real estate mortgages placed in the boroughs of Manhattan, Brooklyn, and The Bronx, was $471,978,874, while the average value of the mortgages for the years 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918 was $44,831,550, less than 9 per cent of the average for the prewar years indicated.

"But consider the problem from any angle you please, we can not get away from the fact that there is a phenomenal scarcity of housing accommodations; that capital is not being attracted to this manner of investment in anything like normal measure; and that, unless something is done to change this tendency, we of this country are in a fair way of finding ourselves in the condition now said to exist in England, where people, unable to find other shelter, are living in caravans, house boats, tents, and in any kind of structure that can be erected with odds and ends of waste material. So serious is the situation there, the Government acts as if in panic, and is promising to make, and is making, strenuous efforts to meet the situation that are contrary to all the laws of supply and demand, and are laying the foundation for future trouble. The authorities are erecting dwellings without regard to their cost, which they propose to rent to tenants at any price the latter will pay, expecting to make up the ensuing deficiency by laying heavier taxes on the few who will have any property to be taxed.

"The trained business mind would find the correction for this difficulty with speed and certainty. A good business manager would tell his directors that they must immediately stimulate and encourage new business. He would not imitate the ostrich and, sticking his head into the sand, endeavor to blind himself to the situation as it is. Those of us who would try to correct the difficulty can not stand still. We have for years depended on the yearly increase in the amount of money spent in the building industry, and the only way to get it back again into the usual channels is to stimulate building activity now, so that a few years hence we will have doubled or tripled the usual income.

"For years builders have depended on banks and other loaning agencies for the money needed to carry on their functions, but now the banks, as well as other investors, find what they consider better methods of investing their money, so that much of the capital once depended upon for the building trades has been withdrawn and withheld from building loans and mortgages and put into other income-yielding activities. How extensive is this withdrawal and withholding is evidenced by the fact that if to-day the banks had invested in mortgage loans the same percentage of their resources as they did in 1913 we would have had placed in building operations one and one-half billion dollars more than was used for this purpose from 1913 until 1918.

"To make the investment in building loans and mortgages more attractive to investors and thus produce some of the funds which may be used to meet the housing needs of the Nation is the object of the proposed amendment to the income-tax law, provided by Senate bill 8094, which I have introduced, by which investment in mortgage loans to the extent of $40,000 are exempted from the provisions of the law.

"Technically speaking, the Government is not giving anything if it makes the offer of the remission of taxes as provided in the bill. It is merely delaying their assessment. On the other hand, the investor is giving something to the State and the Nation in that he is adding at once to the general wealth billions of dollars worth of real property, and the Government is doing a stroke of good business, because, within a year or two, it will have an income of double or triple the amount of the remitted taxes when taxes upon rentals and new real estate begin to flow into the treasuries of the Nation and State.

"That there is an absolute necessity for encouragement of this kind is apparent when one considers the amount of taxation that is now placed upon real estate. It is claimed that at the present time nearly nine-twentieths of the total income from real estate investments is taken up by taxation, and when in addition to this certain drain is added the uncertainties of business conditions and possible changes in prices and wages, it is not to be wondered at that former lenders of money on real estate securities are putting their money into other channels. They are uncertain and afraid; they find themselves facing new problems; they say labor and wages may drop in prices and cause depreciation in values, and that they may have to lose 20 or 30 per cent of the present cost, and perhaps be left high and dry with a partly completed building.

"During the period of advancing costs many a mortgage lender has had the unsatisfactory experience of being obliged to step in and complete a project at greatly increased costs, and naturally he is not going to run the chance of experiencing the same difficulty again. He knows that if he does not advance money enough the project will fail, and he will have a partly completed building on his hands, and that if he advances a sufficient amount a drop in prices of material, labor, and so forth, would quickly place him in a position of holding a 100 per cent mortgage.

"Too many people whose duty it should be to consider the problems we are discussing, and the proper methods for solving the difficulties which present themselves, are inclined to assume a policy of watchful waiting. They say, 'Just let us wait until we have reached a normal level of prices; let us keep our hands off natural processes and allow the laws of trade and commerce to assert themselves and bring about an equilibrium.' There is in this attitude an assumption that prices will fall to something approaching the prewar level. This prospect is to some a hope; to others, a dread; to all, an uncertainty. But a study of the situation shows beyond a doubt that, so far as we can be guided by the history of the past, we are now on a new level of prices which, if there is no economic cataclysm, will endure for many years.

"During the war we called on 'professors' to help us out of our difficulties. Let us listen to what one of them says in relation to the question of decreasing costs. Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale, is probably the most competent authority that America holds to-day, and his conclusion is this:

"Prices are not going to fall much, if at all.

"We are on a permanently higher price level, and business men should go ahead on that basis. * * *

"There is little likelihood of a fall in prices in the United States. The gold reserve, which is now the basis of our currency, is not likely to leave the banks and return to general circulation, since this is contrary to monetary experience. No great outflow of gold is to be expected through international trade, since our exports are likely to exceed our imports in the reconstruction period, and we no longer will have large interest and freight payments to make to Europe. Prices are higher to-day in Europe than in the United States, and hence for the present at least no influx of cheap goods is to be expected. Further issues of bonds or Treasury certificates by our Government and loans placed by European countries in this country will tend to further increase our present credit structure. Against any considerable reduction in bank credits the whole business community would rise in arms.

"Business men of the United States need not hesitate to plan for an immediate period of business prosperity. No period of depression and no collapse of values need be feared. The man who goes full speed ahead will gain an advantage over his procrastinating competitor which will far outweigh any possible slight decline in the costs of production.

"From the above quotations it is evident that the many leaders of thought and industry in the United States have no fear for future trouble based upon the decline of values.

"Persons who find it to their interest to oppose the provisions of the tax-exemption bill make the claim that the proposed bill is a measure of State paternalism, and that we are forcing the Government to perform a function that would better be left to the initiative of the individual. In general, we are opposed to the interference of the Government in matters of this kind, but because it has interfered in times past and by this interference created the condition by which we are to-day confronted we feel that the State is bound to interfere yet again in an effort to correct the difficulties it has created. By the imposition of discriminatory freight rates on building materials, by preferential restrictions on delivery, and by removing the balance wheel of competition through guaranteed profits it has made the production and transportation of building materials abnormally costly and in some cases practically impossible. Through the loans called for by the necessity of meeting the war expenses and by the exemptions from taxation granted to some of the bonds that represent these loans it has turned money that should naturally seek investment in building construction away from its natural course to channels where the returns are quicker and larger than they promise to be on a long-term mortgage loan.

"The object of the proposed amendment to the income-tax law is intended to remove some of the penalties attached to mortgage loans and to place such investments more nearly on a parity with the money that is seeking investment in Government loans and securities, and, in so far as the Government is asked to grant this concession, so far is it allowable that it interferes with the ordinary and natural courses of business.

"Congress is also asked to give its sanction to what is known as 'the home-loan bill,' which I have introduced. The object of this proposed legislation is to allow building and loan associations to use as property the enormous sums now tied up in first-class real estate mortgages. The limitation of the services rendered by these building and loan associations is due to the lack of liquid capital behind them, and this lack is likely to grow greater rather than less for the same reasons that prevent money going into other real estate investments. It is interesting to note that during the 40 years of their service to the home builders of the United States who had no capital except an earning power, they have had practically negligible losses and have built up an enormously potential capital in their mortgages, which, because of their inability to discount at a reasonable rate, amounts to the sequestration of about $2,000,000,000. It is the object of the home-loan bill to remove the prohibition of discounting and to turn this locked-up capital into industrial property.

"So far the emphasis has been placed upon the economic advantages to be secured through the passage of the two bills which I have mentioned. Important as these economic advantages are, they are, after all, the smaller part of the good that will accrue to the people and to the country through the assured stability of our political institutions. The main object of this proposed legislation is to enable the workingman to secure a home of his own. It is a truism of political economy that the land or home owner is the foundation on which the political stability of the Nation is founded. The most pessimistic thinker, as he looks over the world to-day, foresees political disaster for Great Britain, Germany, Italy, the United States, and, in fact, the whole world except France; and the one thing that gives the pessimist, as well as the fair-minded observer, assurance as to the future of France is the fact that nearly 80 per cent of its population is interested in the land as owners thereof. There are four families out of five living in their own homes, from which nothing, even the ravages of war, can separate them permanently. Were the United States in a similar condition we might smile at, or feel contempt for, all the disturbing and noisy elements that seem at the moment to threaten our social well-being. Bolshevism is a weed that will not flourish in communities of home owners. Where most of the people own their own homes, there you will find a refreshing spirit of common interest in the community, and a real, wholesome, patriotic, and zealous support of American traditions and ideals.

"It has been pointed out that the United States has been at war on an average of once in 20 years since the Constitution was adopted, and that the object of each of these wars has been, in the last analysis, to preserve the home. Yet we find that to the majority of people in this country 'home' means little more than a dwelling for which they are paying rent. This situation is bad enough, but what is worse in the situation is that the percentage of these rent payers is growing with each enumeration. In 1890 we were advised that 52 per cent of the people in America lived under the rental system; that in 1910 the percentage had increased to 55; and that probably the census of 1920 will show that fully 60 per cent of the people will be classed as tenants. If it is the case to-day that but 40 people out of a hundred live in their own homes, and that the increase, small as it is, will continue, it is fair to conclude that 25 years hence less than one-third of the population of the United States will be outside of the tenant class. A common interest in the Nation's wealth and the widest distribution of real property are absolutely essential to our national well-being, and these essentials are not to be looked for among a population three-quarters of whom are at the mercy of landlords. Tenantry is a poor substitute for the real home, as it leads neither toward independence and responsibility nor toward community association, which is as necessary for the poise and development of the adult as it is for that of the child.

"Normal home and community life best assures the health, recreation, development, and independence of the family, and, while the figures show that the normal or usual life of the family is spent in a hired home, it is understood by everybody who thinks that such a condition is abnormal. The tenant, no matter how long he remains on the land or in a community, is losing the 'unearned increment.' He is living in surroundings marred and depreciated by others. By changing from one community to another he deprives himself and his family of permanent acquaintances and friendships. This brings about an unsettled and discontented state of mind, induces unproductiveness, leads to waning power and lower wages, and a gradual descent in the social scale, all of which would be avoided if the family lived in its own home, 'Be it ever so humble.'

"The agencies that are striving for moral uplift along the lines of Christian missionary work recognize the folly of preaching religion to a hungry, homeless man. The first move is to feed him and then get him placed in one spot where he can be reached for further effort. It is equally foolish and useless to preach economy, prudence, and the obligation of citizenship to the workingman if he belongs nowhere and is not permanently attached to the community by ownership of the home in which he lives. Unless he is so attached he can not be said to really belong there, no matter how good may be his financial condition. In the long run a 'poor' home owner is a better asset to a community than a rich and transient tenant.

"If the object of government is to do the greatest good to the greatest number, is there any effort that promises greater results than in providing that it should be within the power of every man who is able to earn a day's wage and who wants to own his home, that he should be able to own his own home, that he may become an important factor in his community, so that the growth and development of the community shall be his aim because its well-being will redound to his own profit and benefit?

"The United States, like France, must either develop a home-owning instinct or a housing movement like England. This home-owning instinct may be helped forward through governmental aid, through preferential freight rates, through banking legislation and bills such as I have described, and encouragement of standardization of building materials. These governmental aids at this time will produce increased homes whose value will more than offset their cost.

"Or the Government may, on the other hand, wait for the situation to become worse and eventually be obliged to follow the example of England and provide housing at normal rentals, with the corresponding demoralization and pauperization of its people. The best way to help a man is to help him to help himself. This is the sentiment of the man who will make the best citizen, and in providing such help the Government can depend upon the support and applause of the best element of American citizenship."

SACCHARIN IN FOOD.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, in the Washington Post this morning there is a half-page advertisement on the use of saccharin in food. Recently before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry Dr. Carl L. Alsberg, chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, Department of Agriculture, made a statement with respect to the use of saccharin. I have also a letter from Dr. Alsberg on this subject and a further article taken from the Washington Herald, which I ask, together with the statement and the advertisement to which I have referred, may be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY,
Washington, D. C., October 23, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD J. GAY,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR GAY: In compliance with the request of your secretary over the telephone, I beg to transmit herewith food-inspection decisions Nos. 135 and 142, issued by the Department of Agriculture in 1911 and 1912. Saccharin is a coal-tar drug. As you will see from the decisions, the department regards its use in food as a menace to health. This is the position of the department to-day, as it was in 1911. There has been no scientific evidence adduced, of which I am aware, on the basis of which the department would be justified in any manner in altering its position. Indeed, the department has evidence in confirmation of the position taken in 1911, which was not then available.

The department regards food to which saccharin has been added as adulterated in two respects. It regards it as adulterated since a substance has been added to the food which may render it deleterious to health. It regards it as adulterated in that a substance of no food value whatever has been substituted for sugar, a very valuable food. The department now has pending a criminal prosecution against the Monsanto Chemical Co., which will be brought to speedy trial for the shipment interstate of a parcel of saccharin labeled as harmless. The department, moreover, has prosecuted, in all cases sucessfully, a number of manufacturers of food products for the substitution of saccharin for sugar. The food and drugs act does not contemplate the restriction of the traffic of any drug, however harmful, if unadulterated and properly labeled. It furthermore has no jurisdiction over representations that may be made in various types of advertising.

Furthermore, I beg to point out that a majority of the States prohibit the use of saccharin in food, either by statute or by regulation.

Aside from any question of deleteriousness, I believe the unrestricted use of saccharin to be contrary to public interest. Its use is not, as is frequently urged, a measure of economy. Its use is really extravagance. Sugar is a food, but saccharin has no food value. If one does without sugar and spends part of the money thus saved for saccharin, one will eventually have to spend the remainder, and possibly more, for some other food, to make up for the lack created by the absence of sugar, a concentrated food. If one considers that a not inconsiderable proportion of the people are forced to live continuously close to the starvation line, one must realize that no part of their essential diet can be decreased with safety. To encourage them to waste any portion of their inadequate resources upon an adulterated food of no food value is an economic fallacy.

Therefore, the substitution of a flavoring drug for a valuable food is not only contrary to the public interest, because it is uneconomical, but also because of the inroad it may make upon the health of the Nation. Finally, there are to-day available upon the market a considerable number of sugar substitutes equal in food value to sugar and quite unobjectionable. I refer to the various types of malt sirup and other sirups that are being placed, in ever-increasing quantity, upon the market.

Respectfully,

C. L. ALSBERG, Chief.

Inclosures: F. I. D. Nos. 135 and 142.

[F. I. D. 135. Issued Apr. 29, 1911. United States Department of Agriculture, office of the Secretary. Food inspection decision 135.]

SACCHARIN IN FOOD.

At the request of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Referee Board of Consulting Scientific Experts has conducted an investigation as to the effect on health of the use of saccharin. The investigation has been concluded, and the referee board reports that the continued use of saccharin for a long time in quantities over three-tenths of a gram per day is liable to impair digestion; and that the addition of saccharin as a substitute for cane sugar or other forms of sugar reduces the food value of the sweetened product and hence lowers its quality.

Saccharin has been used as a substitute for sugar in over 30 classes of foods in which sugar is commonly recognized as a normal and valuable ingredient. If the use of saccharin be continued it is evident that amounts of saccharin may readily be consumed which will, through continual use, produce digestive disturbances. In every food in which saccharin is used some other sweetening agent known to be harmless to health can be substituted, and there is not even a pretense that saccharin is a necessity in the manufacture of food products. Under the food and drugs act articles of food are adulterated if they contain added poisonous or other added deleterious ingredients which may render them injurious to health. Articles of food are also adulterated within the meaning of the act if substances have been mixed and packed with the foods so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect their quality or strength. The findings of the referee board show that saccharin in food is such an added poisonous or other added deleterious ingredient as is contemplated by the act, and also that the substitution of saccharin for sugar in foods reduces and lowers their quality.

The Secretary of Agriculture, therefore, will regard as adulterated under the food and drugs act foods containing saccharin which, on and after July 1, 1911, are manufactured or offered for sale in the District of Columbia or the Territories, or shipped in interstate or foreign commerce, or offered for importation into the United States.

Secretary of the Treasury.
JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture.
CHARLES NAGEL,
Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 26, 1911.

[F. I. D. 142. Issued Mar. 11, 1912. United States Department of Agriculture, office of the Secretary. Food inspection decision 142.]

SACCHARIN IN FOOD.

The following decision which relates to the use of saccharin in food will not go into effect until the 1st of April, 1912, the month of March being given to interested parties so as to arrange their business and take such steps as they may deem proper.

JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 1, 1912.

After full consideration of the representations made in behalf of the manufacturers of saccharin at the hearing before us and of the briefs filed by their attorneys, as well as the briefs filed, at our request, by officers of the Department of Agriculture, we conclude that the use of saccharin in normal foods, within the jurisdiction of the food and drugs act, is a violation of the law and will be prosecuted.

It is true that the referee board did not find that the use in foods of saccharin in small quantities (up to 0.3 gram daily) is injurious to health. However, the referee board did find that saccharin used in quantities over 0.3 gram per day for a considerable period is liable to disturb digestion, and the food and drugs act provides that articles of food are adulterated which contain any added poisonous or other added deleterious ingredient which may render them injurious to health.

The Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture reports that saccharin has been found in more than 50 kinds of foods in common use. It is argued, therefore, that if the use of saccharin in foods be allowed the consumer may very easily ingest day by day over 0.3 gram, the quantity which, according to the findings of the referee board, is liable to produce disturbances of digestion. On the other hand, it is claimed by the manufacturers that the sweetening power of saccharin is so great that in a normal dietary the amount of saccharin ingested daily would not exceed 0.3 gram, the amount found to be harmless by the referee board.

However this may be, it is plain from the finding of the referee board that the substitution of saccharin for sugar lowers the quality of the food. The only use of saccharin in foods is as a sweetener, and when it is so used it inevitably displaces the sugar of an equivalent sweetening power. Sugar has a food value and saccharin has none. It appears, therefore, that normal foods sweetened with saccharin are adulterated under the law.

In making this decision we are not unmindful of the fact that persons suffering from certain diseases may be directed by their physicians to abstain from the use of sugar. In cases of this kind saccharin is often prescribed as a substitute sweetening agent. This decision will not in any manner interfere with such a use of saccharin. The food and drugs act provides that any substance which is intended to be used for the prevention, cure, or mitigation of disease is a drug, and a product containing saccharin and plainly labeled to show that the mixture is intended for the use of those persons who, on account of disease, must abstain from the use of sugar, falls within the class of drugs and is not affected by this decision.

The Secretary of the Treasury dissents.

JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture,
CHARLES NAGEL,
Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 29, 1912.

[From the Washington Herald, Oct. 23, 1919.]

NO SACCHARIN UNDER DRUG ACT—MANUFACTURERS AND BAKERS CAN NOT USE SUGAR SUBSTITUTE.

Washington housewives who had pinned their hopes to saccharin as a relief from the growing sugar shortage will be disappointed to know that the District Health Department yesterday frowned on efforts being made to introduce the substitute for general household use.

Dr. John L. Norris, acting health officer, announced his intention of prosecuting violators of the law restricting the use of saccharin under the food and drug law.

The regulations provide that no saccharin shall be used by manufacturers of foods or drinks. Infringement of these laws by soda establishments, delicatessens, bakeries, candy makers, and the like will be vigorously prosecuted, said Dr. Norris.

Housewives who care to make use of the substitute at their own risk are privileged to do so, he said, as the law does not apply to private consumers.

However, Dr. Norris said, continued use of large quantities of saccharin is injurious to the health of the individual. "Three-tenths of a gram of saccharin a day is the limit of safety determined by a special investigation board of college experts appointed by the Department of Agriculture," he asserted. Dr. Norris said that this amount was about equal to a tenth of a teaspoonful.

Saccharin is a sugar-like substance derived from coal tar. It is far sweeter than sugar.

SACCHARIN—THE PUREST OF ALL SWEETENERS—IS RELIEVING THE SUGAR SITUATION.

Think of saccharin and ease your alarm over the present sugar shortage.

There is not a family or a member of a family who can not again enjoy sweetened coffee or tea or other beverages, as well as sweetened foods.

Saccharin has a sweetening strength five hundred times greater than that of suger. It is a healthful, harmless, sweetening agent.

It is excellent for use in coffee, tea, and wherever sweetness, not food value, is needed.

Go to a store to-day and buy saccharin tablets in boxes of 100. Use one tablet instead of a lump or teaspoonful of sugar in all your home beverages.

Sugar is scarce and costly. Saccharin is plentiful and cheap. By using it now as a sweetener instead of or as an auxiliary to sugar the present scarcity of sugar will be relieved with actual saving of money.

Saccharin will prove itself a useful aid to American health and economy.

Give saccharin a trial now in your coffee or tea.

JOHN F. QUEENEY,
Chairman of the Board,
Monsanto Chemical Works (Established 1901).

NOTE.—This advertisement is inserted by Monsanto Chemical Works, the world's most important manufacturers of saccharin.

STATEMENT OF DR. CARL L. ALSBERG, CHIEF BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

"Senator MCNARY. Dr. Alsberg, you have heard the statements made by Mr. Cooke and Dr. Du Bois concerning the desire on their part to have the ruling of the Department of Agriculture changed with respect to the use of saccharin. As a representative of the Bureau of Chemistry the committee would like to have you make such statement on the subject as you desire.

"Dr. ALSBERG. I have not very much to say, Mr. Chairman, except that we feel this particular matter is one which should properly be settled in court. A case has been pending for a couple of years. The reason why the department was not able to press it to trial during the war was that some of the Government's important witnesses were fighting in the Army in France and were not available. They are available now, and the Attorney General has been notified by the Department of Agriculture that the department is ready to go ahead at any time. And on that point all I would like to say is that it seems to me the proper place for the settlement of this particular question is in the courts.

"Also, I would like to point out, Mr. Chairman, if I may, that Mr. Cooke brought out that there is no prohibition on the shipment of saccharin as such. Anybody who wants to buy a tablet of saccharin to sweeten coffee with can go into any drug store in the United States and buy it at small cost and use it. The only prohibition there is is the expression of opinion on the part of the Department of Agriculture that saccharin is deleterious to health and that saccharin substituted for sugar may injuriously affect the quality of food. It follows that there is no prohibition against saccharin as such. Anybody may buy it and use it on his table and in his own cooking if he or she sees fit. But where the article is used in the manufacture of a compound food, such as soda pop, jam, jelly, or anything of that kind or any other kind, the department holds that it may be a deleterious ingredient added to the food, and that the addition of such deleterious ingredient is in violation of the law.

"Now, gentlemen of the committee, the Department of Agriculture still holds, and I still hold, that the question of the effect of saccharin is not clear and free from doubt, as has been represented here. I believe there is very considerable evidence that it may be deleterious to health. That evidence will be presented in court in due time. I believe also that the use of saccharin will lead to endless debasement of the country's food supply and result in endless fraud of one kind or another.

"It is very easy to argue that soda water is not food. But that is all nonsense. You can not take anything into your system which is capable of being used as food and after you have swallowed it control what your system shall do with it. You may will that the sugar in soda water is not going to be used as food. You may not be conscious that you are taking it as food, but it is food; and if you take an ounce of sugar in your diet in the form of soda water, your system has an automatic governor or regulator so that your appetite at your next meal is correspondingly less, and you will take a correspondingly less quantity of some other food. If you spend your money, as they want you to do, for an article that tickles your palate but is of no food value whatever, you have thrown that amount of money away and you have got to spend a correspondingly additional sum of money to get the amount of energy you would have gotten if you had gotten sugar. In my judgment, to permit the unrestricted use of saccharin would be contrary to public interest from any angle that you may look at the subject. It is deleterious to health, and it will debase the food supply of the country as a whole. The best evidence of that is that it will actually reduce the per capita consumption of sugar.

"If the war showed one thing, it showed this, that the average person in any country does not eat to excess. That is an honest figment of some food faddist; but we eat, the most of us, to the point we need, and not very much in excess of that. Now, if we are going to eliminate 100,000 tons or 100,000 pounds of sugar from the food value of the country, the people who have been eating that sugar must eat something else, and that will result in an increased expenditure for the food supply of the country.

"I can not see any argument at this time or any other time for an unrestricted use of saccharin. The only argument is a business argument, that for the time being, for a few weeks, certain industries will be hampered. We are not in the condition in which they were in Europe, where they could not get enough of any kind of food. The situation is different here.

"Senator MCNARY. Now, Dr. Alsberg, is there any Federal law that will prevent the manufacture of soda pop or ginger ale by the use of saccharin?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Well, there is no law against it, but the food and drugs act defines adulteration. It defines food as being adulterated if it contains any added deleterious ingredients. If saccharin, as the Department of Agriculture has held, is an added deleterious ingredient, then such soda water is adulterated, and can not be shipped in interstate commerce, because it contains an added deleterious ingredient.

"There is another definition of adulteration, and that is if in a food a substance has been substituted for a normal ingredient of food in such manner as to injuriously affect its quality and strength. So that it may be held that if soda water, which normally has always been made of sugar or some similar material, is made by the use of saccharin as a substitute, which saccharin has no food value, then that article is adulterated, in that a valuable ingredient has been substituted by an ingredient with no value. So we hold at the present time that soda water made by the use of saccharin instead of sugar and shipped in interstate commerce would not be legal.

"Senator RANSDELL. Suppose it is not shipped in interstate commerce?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Then we would have no jurisdiction over it whatever.

"Senator MCNARY. Supposing I am a manufacturer and bottler in a State where there is no local prohibitory law. Say I buy saccharin from the manufacturer in St. Louis, Mo., and ship it into New Jersey, where there is no State law. Is there any departmental restriction or order to prevent me from manufacturing soda water and selling it to the people of New Jersey?

"Dr. ALSBERG. The Department of Agriculture has no authority whatever to interfere in a case of that kind.

"Representative MARTIN of Louisiana. That is a matter for State law?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Yes, sir. But the chairman is assuming that there is no State law or regulation.

"Senator MCNARY. Can you assure this committee that there will be no further delays in the trial of your case, which is to be a test case?

"Dr. ALSBERG. There will be no future delays so fas as the Bureau of Chemistry, Department of Agriculture, is concerned. What delays may ensue due to the action of the court or due to some matter over which we have no jurisdiction, I can not say.

"Senator RANSDELL. Do you know how many States prohibit the use of saccharin?

"Dr. ALSBERG. I do not, sir; but I have the data on file in my office, and if this committee wishes I can easily have it inserted in the record.

"Senator RANSDELL. I would like to have it go along with your testimony.

"Dr. ALSBERG. I will make a note to furnish you a memorandum on that subject for insertion in the record.

"(The data subsequently furnished by the witness is here printed in full in the record, as follows:)

"UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
"BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY,
"Washington, D. C., October 14, 1919.

"Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SENATOR MCNARY: In keeping with my promise made to you at the hearings on saccharin this morning, I beg to transmit herewith information concerning the prohibition on the addition of saccharin to food in various States for inclusion in the record of the hearings held to-day:

"The addition of saccharin to food is prohibited by law in Iowa, Minnesota, Mississippi, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah, and Wisconsin.

"The addition of sweetening agents other than sugar to soda waters is prohibited by law in Alabama.

"The addition of saccharin to nonalcoholic beverages is prohibited by law in Nebraska and New Jersey.

"Nothing but cane sugar can be used as the sweetening agent in pickles and fruit sauces according to the law of Oregon.

"The addition of saccharin to cider and vinegar is prohibited by law in Arkansas.

"The addition of saccharin to food is prohibited by the rules and regulations of the food and drug commissioners of all the other States, except Delaware, Missouri, New Mexico, and Texas. There are no organizations for the enforcement of food and drug laws in Delaware and New Mexico.

"Very truly, yours,

"UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
"BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY,
"Washington, D. C., October 29, 1919.

"Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SENATOR MCNARY: The Bureau of Chemistry has done considerable work on providing substitutes other than saccharin for sugar in soft drinks. This work was done during the war for the purpose of conserving sugar. The substitutes recommended will not only replace part of the sugar, but will provide valuable food material, which saccharin does not.

"I am attaching a statement of this work and a number of the formulæ which have been used generally by the soft-drink industry with highly satisfactory results. If you consider it advisable, I would be very glad to have this statement inserted as a part of my remarks before the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on October 14.

"Very truly, yours, C. L. ALSBERG, Chief."

"STATEMENT OF EXPERIMENTAL WORK OF THE BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY TO PROVIDE SUBSTITUTES FOR SUGAR IN THE MANUFACTURE OF SOFT DRINKS.

"In the manufacture of beverages, especially that class known as 'soft drinks,' the use of sweetening materials other than refined white sugar is entirely practicable, as shown by the experimental work of the Bureau of Chemistry during the year 1918. Starch or 'corn' sirup, starch sugar, maltose sirup, and refiners' sirup may all be used to replace a part, at least, of the usual quantity of sugar. The quantity of starch sirup (glucose) which it is possible to produce is almost unlimited. Maltose sirup of a grade suited to the use of bottlers is only produced in limited quantity, but an active demand would induce the purification of the crude maltose sirup in quantity. The large anticipated surplus of barley due to the reduction of brewing would seem to indicate that a supply of maltose sirup could be made available to meet the demand. It should be remembered that the cost of production of soft drinks with sugar substitutes of equivalent sweetness has been in the past greater than with pure white sugar selling at 7 to 9 cents per pound, but if the sugar is not available, the substitutes are satisfactory from both a sweetening and a food-value standpoint.

"It is believed that the production of maltose, glucose, and starch sugar can be expanded to meet any legitimate demand, since the raw materials are available in great abundance.

"The formulæ as recommended to the soft-drink industry follow.

"QUANTITY OF SWEETENING INGREDIENT IN BOTTLED SOFT DRINKS.

"The quantity of sweetening ingredient to be used in bottled soft drinks depends upon the personal preference of the consumer, which is influenced by the acidity of the beverage. The acid beverages, such as ginger ale, cherry, raspberry, strawberry, pineapple, lemon, orangeade, grape, and other sodas, require more sweetening than do the nonacid beverages, such as root beer, sarsaparilla, birch beer, cream, chocolate, etc. Some consumers, especially children, prefer a sweeter product than do others. Consequently, from the standpoint of sweetness, soft drinks may be divided into 'sweet' products and 'dry' products, and since a 'sweet' acid drink requires more sweetening than does a 'sweet' nonacid drink, soft drinks may be further subdivided as indicated in Table 1, which shows the average quantity of sugar heretofore used in beverages.

"TABLE 1.—Normal quantity of sugar in soft drinks (based on analyses made in the Bureau of Chemistry).

	Ounces per half pint bottle.
Nonacid group (sarsaparilla, root beer, etc.):

"PRINCIPAL SWEETENING SUBSTITUTES.

"The principal sweetening ingredients proposed for replacing a part of the sugar in bottled soft drinks are corn sirup (ordinary glucose), corn sugar, maltose sirup, honey, and high-grade refiners' sirup. After testing these products in various combinations with many different flavors the Walter Laboratory has found that:

"(1) None of these products can be used to replace all of the sugar.

"(2) Each of these proposed sweetening ingredients possesses a characteristic flavor which may affect the palatability of the beverage unless it is used judiciously in the proper combination with ordinary sugar.

"(3) The keeping quality of these products when made up into sirups is not so high as that of ordinary sugar sirup, but if the new sirups are filtered, boiled, and used immediately the keeping quality of the finished beverage is satisfactory, as observed over a period of six weeks.

"(4) The relative sweetness of the products mentioned (except refiners' sirup) is as follows: Ordinary sugar, 100; honey (44° Baumé), 75; corn sugar, 45; maltose sirup (42° Baumé), 30; corn sirup (45° Baumé), 20.

"(5) These products can be used to replace one-fourth to one-half the amount of sugar ordinarily used, thereby effecting a saving of approximately 50,000 tons of sugar a year.

"FORMULAS.

"As a result of the experimental work conducted in the Bureau of Chemistry the quantities of sugar, corn sirup, and refiners' sirup given in Formulas I to VI are suggested for the different types of soft drinks.

"FORMULA I. SUGAR AND CORN SIRUP (COMMERCIAL GLUCOSE).

"To be used for a sweet root beer, sarsaparilla, birch beer, cream, chocolate, or for a dry lemon, orangeade, and the following beverages made with imitative flavors: Cherry, raspberry, strawberry, pineapple, or grape.

"Dissolve 100 pounds of granulated sugar and 200 pounds of corn sirup (45° Baumé) in 27 gallons of pure water. The solution obtained will measure about 50 gallons. Filter, boil, and use immediately. Add 1½ fluid ounces of this sirup to each half-pint bottle. Each 1½ fluid ounces of this sirup will contain three-eighths ounce sugar and three-fourths ounce corn sirup (45° Baumé).

"FORMULA II. SUGAR AND CORN SIRUP (COMMERCIAL GLUCOSE).

"To be used for a dry root beer, sarsaparilla, birch beer, cream, chocolate, or ginger ale.

"Same formula as Formula I. Add 1 fluid ounce sirup to each half-pint bottle. Each ounce of the sirup made according to Formula I will contain one-fourth ounce sugar and one-half ounce corn sirup (45° Baumé).

"FORMULA III. SUGAR AND CORN SIRUP (COMMERCIAL GLUCOSE).

"To be used for a sweet ginger ale, lemon, orangeade, or the following beverages made with imitation flavors: Cherry, raspberry, strawberry, pineapple, or grape, or for dry true fruit, blackberry, wild cherry, pineapple, strawberry, raspberry, or grape.

"Dissolve 114 2/7 pounds of granulated sugar and 171 3/7 pounds of corn sirup (45° Baumé) in 28.6 gallons of pure water. The solution obtained will measure about 50 gallons. Filter, boil, and use immediately. Add 1¾ fluid ounces sirup to each half-pint bottle. Each 1¾ fluid ounces of this sirup will contain one-half ounce sugar and three-fourths ounce corn sirup (45° Baumé).

"If it is desired to use a less concentrated sirup than the one given and to increase the quantity per half-pint bottle, the following formula may be employed:

"Dissolve 100 pounds of granulated sugar and 150 pounds of corn sirup (45° Baumé) in 31.3 gallons of pure water. The solution obtained will measure about 50 gallons. Filter, boil, and use immediately. Add 2 fluid ounces of this sirup to each half-pint bottle. Each 2 fluid ounces of this sirup will contain one-half ounce sugar and three-fourths ounce corn sirup (45° Baumé).

"FORMULA IV. SUGAR AND CORN SIRUP (COMMERCIAL GLUCOSE).

"To be used for a sweet true fruit, blackberry, wild cherry, pineapple, strawberry, raspberry, or grape.

"Dissolve 125 pounds of granulated sugar and 200 pounds of corn sirup (45° Baumé) in 25.6 gallons of pure water. The solution obtained will measure about 50 gallons. Add 2 fluid ounces of this sirup to each half-pint bottle. Each 2 fluid ounces of this sirup will contain five-eighths ounce sugar and 1 ounce corn sirup (45° Baumé).

"FORMULA V. SUGAR AND REFINERS' SIRUP.

"To be used for a sweet sarsaparilla or other heavy-flavored, nonacid beverages, for sweet beverages containing extract of cola, and for low-grade sweet ginger ale, or for a low-grade dry lemon, or other low-grade dry beverages of the acid group.

"Dissolve 200 pounds of ordinary sugar and 100 pounds of high-grade refiners' sirup (40° to 44° Baumé) in 27½ gallons of pure water. The solution obtained will measure about 50 gallons. Filter, if not clear, and use immediately. Add 1 fluid ounce to each half-pint bottle. Each fluid ounce of this sirup will contain one-half ounce ordinary sugar and one-fourth ounce refiners' sirup.

"FORMULA VI. SUGAR AND REFINERS' SIRUP.

"To be used for a dry sarsaparilla or other heavy-flavored, nonacid, dry beverages, for beverages containing extract of cola, and low-grade dry ginger ale.

"Add one-half fluid ounce of the sirup made according to Formula V to each half-pint bottle. Each one-half fluid ounce of this sirup will contain one-fourth ounce sugar and one-eighth ounce refiners' sirup.

"EXCEPTIONS.

"A cream soda made with three-eighths ounce sugar and three-fourths ounce corn sirup is less sweet than the other beverages of the same group, and a chocolate made with one-fourth ounce sugar and one-half ounce corn sirup is not quite sweet enough, even for a 'dry' product. On the contrary, ginger ale made with one-half ounce sugar and three-fourths ounce corn sirup will be too sweet even for a 'sweet' product, the combination one-half ounce sugar and one-eighth ounce or one-fourth ounce corn sirup being preferable. For a 'dry' ginger ale, one-fourth ounce sugar and one-half ounce corn sirup gave satisfactory results. One-half ounce sugar and three-fourths ounce corn sirup will make a 'dry' grape beverage, but more sugar will be required to make a 'sweet' product.

"Formula III can be used to make dry true fruit, blackberry, wild cherry, pineapple, strawberry, raspberry, and grape beverages, but for sweet products of this nature it will be necessary to increase the sweetening 30 per cent over that specified in Formula III.

"With the exceptions noted, Formulas I to VI can be used as a general guide for preparing beverages.

"MALTOSE SIRUP.

"If desired, the same quantity of maltose sirup (42° Baumé) may be used in place of the corn sirup in Formulas I, II, III, and IV. In the case of maltose sirup, care should be taken to purchase only a high-grade product which is low in protein; otherwise the keeping quality of the finished beverage will not be satisfactory.

"CORN SUGAR.

"If it is desired to use corn sugar or honey in place of corn sirup, it will be necessary to use only about one-half as much, since these products generally are sweeter than corn sirup. The corn sugar used in these experiments was slightly off flavor. It is suggested that corn sugar be used only in beverages with heavy flavors, such as sarsaparilla and root beer, in which the slight, not altogether unpleasant, bitterness is masked. It is suggested also that when corn sirup, corn sugar, etc., are used the normal quantity of acid be reduced to two-thirds of the usual amount and that the normal quantity of flavor be increased by one-half.

"HONEY.

"Honey, when used in soft drinks, must be clarified; otherwise, with some beverages the coloring matter will be precipitated as a sediment, making the product unmarketable. The commercial liquid honey is made into a sirup, about 1 ounce of kaolin (china clay) is added per gallon, the solution well mixed and filtered through paper. It is necessary to return to the filter the first runnings which are not clear. The filtration proceeds rather slowly, and it is probable that a filter press could be used to hasten the process when conducted on a commercial scale.

"REFINERS' SIRUP.

"Refiners' sirups which are being offered to the bottling trade vary greatly in quality and in price. The cost per gallon is not always a criterion of the quality. The strong molasses flavor and saline taste of even the best grades of refiners' sirup appear to limit its use largely to the nonacid and the cola beverages. It is believed, however, that bottlers will find it profitable to test thoroughly Formulas V and VI, which suggest the use of small percentages of refiners' sirups.

"COLA BEVERAGES.

"Beverages containing extract of cola, etc., can be manufactured with good results, using any of the substitutes mentioned except honey. The quantities and proportions are practically the same as those used for 'sweet' and 'dry' sarsaparilla.

"LIMITING PRODUCTION.

"Bottlers are urged, in the interests of sugar conservation, to limit the production of beverages such as grape, phosphates, and other acid drinks which require a large amount of sweetening to render them palatable. By curtailing the output of this type of beverage and by making use of the formulas here given, it is believed that the normal production of bottled soft drinks need not be greatly reduced and yet the supply of sugar will be conserved.

"SACCHARIN.

"Saccharin, which some bottlers have proposed to use during the period of the war, has no food value, and is considered to be deleterious to health. Its use is prohibited by the laws or regulations of 14 States, and is believed by the Department of Agriculture to be within the inhibition of the Federal food and drugs act (Food Inspection Decisions 135, 142); consequently, it is not classed with such products as corn sirup and maltose sirup.

"LABELING SOFT DRINKS.

"The Federal food and drugs act places no restriction on the use in soft drinks of corn sirup, maltose sirup, honey, corn sugar, and refiners' sirup. Their presence should be declared, however, on the label.

"FOUNTAIN SIRUPS.

"The application of these formulas to the preparation of fountain sirups has not been experimentally determined, but it is believed that they can be satisfactorily employed provided slightly more of the sirup is used than is ordinarily employed in bottled beverages and care is exercised to observe strictly the suggestions regarding the keeping quality of the sirups.

"REPORT OF RESULTS.

"The bureau will appreciate it if bottlers using these formulas will report the results obtained, especially any difficulties experienced in their application.

"SIRUP TABLES.

"In the manufacture of simple sirups, it is convenient to know the final volume, degrees Baumé, percentage sugar, etc., of the sirup obtained when a given weight of sugar or other sweetening ingredient is added to a given volume of water. Such data are not always available to the bottler, nor is it a simple matter to deduce them from the data which the average bottler can conveniently obtain. For this reason it was thought worth while to make the calculations contained in Table 2.

"CAUTION.

"In many instances, as little as one-eighth ounce additional sugar to the half-pint bottle will raise the grade of a soft drink from an unmarketable product to a medium or high-grade product. Now, in a 10-pound sirup (i. e., 10 pounds sugar to each gallon of water taken), one-eighth ounce sugar is contained in 0.17 fluid ounce. If a machine is presumed to deliver 1 fluid ounce of sirup, but actually delivers only three-fourths fluid ounce, this would, therefore, in many cases affect the marketability of the product. Consequently, while it is always advisable to so adjust the machine to measure accurately the quantity of sirup delivered, it is particularly necessary if sugar substitute sirups are used. Serious errors may occur in making up the sirups, due to inaccurate measurement of the sweetening ingredients and of the water used. Especial care should be taken to make up the sirups of known strength, and in doing this, good use can be made of Table 2, in which the volume relations have been worked out accurately. The water should be measured at a temperature approximately 17.5° C. (63.5° F.), although a difference of 10° F. will not seriously affect the result. More serious errors are likely to result from the process of filtering and heating.

"Senator RANSDELL. Do the people in your profession agree on how much sugar the human system ought to take in order to get the very best results?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Well, I do not think anybody has ever considered it from that standpoint. Sugar is a source of energy in the human frame, and so are all fats, and so are all starchy materials, and we know that the average man requires enough fuel-furnishing food—that is, fats, or oils, or starches, or sugars—to furnish him a certain amount of energy, which the physicist figures out in heat units. A person needs so much a day. A person needs so much if he is lying in bed, and a larger quantity if moving around. You need more in winter than in summer. If you are chopping wood or doing very hard physical labor, you need an additional quantity. Of course, a small man will need relatively more than a large man, because the small man loses more heat from his body for the reason that more heat radiates from his body, and he loses more.

"Senator KEYES. You mean the other way, don't you?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Per unit of weight, the small man needs more than the large man; per pound of body weight, the small man needs more than the large one, because the amount of his body surface is greater, and a thin man needs more than the fat man, because the fat man has the better insulation.

"Representative MARTIN. Dr. Alsberg, what about prohibition? Do you think that is one cause of the demand for sugar?

"Dr. ALSBERG. I think it will increase the consumption of sugar.

"Senator RANSDELL. Why?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Because of the large quantity of sugar that is being used in beverages and will be continued in various beverages of all kinds.

"Senator RANSDELL. Is that the sole reason, or does the man who has been accustomed to intoxicating drinks get any beneficial effect; or at least imagine that he gets a beneficial effect from an intoxicating point of view from the use of sugar?

"Dr. ALSBERG. He will not get any intoxicating effect, but there is this to be said, that sugar is the most quickly available form of food that you can take into the system. When I used to talk to students before I came into the department, I used to use this metaphor: That the sugar you take into your body is like the loose change you carry around in your pocket—available very easily; that the starch you take into your body is like the bills that you carry in your billfold—you have to unbutton your coat in order to get to them; and that the fats that you take into your body are like your bank account—you have to draw a check and go to the bank or somewhere else and get it cashed, being the least available of the three.

"It is a well-known fact that it helps an athlete at the beginning of a race or just before any great effort to take a few lumps of sugar, because that sugar is immediately available. Starch has to be broken down into glucose first, and fats have to be burned to yield energy very slowly. A man requires so much energy a day, according to size, and weight, and shape, and the life he follows. He can get that energy mainly from starches or sugar, or mainly from fats, or mainly from nitrogenous materials, according to circumstances. So we can not really say what a man's sugar requirements during the year are. You can say what the total requirements in his diet are, and he can get that by varying the three ingredients.

"Senator MCNARY. Following Senator RANSDELL's questions, isn't it true that a man having alcohol denied him craves sweets?

"Dr. ALSBERG. That is generally so stated, but I do not know that it is correct.

"Senator RANSDELL. I know that is the opinion, but does science agree to that?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Well, that is my observation, too, but why it should be I do not know.

"Representative MARTIN. It is not a stimulant, then?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Sugar is not a stimulant in the sense that alcohol is. Scientifically speaking, alcohol is not a stimulant; it is a depressant. It seems to be a stimulant because it paralyzes the highest centers and removes the inhibitions. In other words, a man who is brave when he is drunk is brave in fact because he does not care; his inhibitions have been removed. Alcohol stimulates, apparently, but actually it paralyzes, the paralysis beginning with the highest intellectual centers and going progressively downward until a man gets dead drunk. So that what appears to begin with stimulation is in fact the beginning of the paralysis. That is the scientific view of the effect of alcohol. Sugar does not have and can not possibly have any effect of that kind. The nearest approach to it that it might have is that it is a source of energy immediately and rapidly available, so that if a man has sudden and great efforts to make if he has a little extra sugar that can be absorbed into the blood and so into the system it helps just that much.

"Senator RANSDELL. Isn't it true that people who perform very hard manual labor have a craving for sugar and will eat more sugar than those doing mental work?

"Dr. ALSBERG. That is true; and they have to eat more food generally. It is just the same proposition as in the case of a machine. There are two elements in food; one is fuel and the other is repair parts. The nitrogenous materials which we take in our food are repair parts. They repair the machine. The sugar, fats, and starch are just fuel. If a man does hard manual labor he has to have more fuel, the same as an automobile which runs 100 miles has to have more fuel than the automobile which runs 10 miles. That craving of the man who is at work for starch and sweet food is simply his expression of greater requirements for fuel.

"Senator RANSDELL. Not especially for sweets, but for more fuel?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Yes, sir; that is it, for more fuel.

"Senator MCNARY. Does not the human system generate alcohol in its daily functioning?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Yes, sir; in small amounts.

"Senator MCNARY. Isn't sugar one of the very strong ingredients that bring about that condition?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Senator, that is true, apparently, but we do not know the details, unfortunately. Sugar goes to the muscle and in the muscle it is burned just the same as you burn it by putting a match to it. The difference in the burning is that instead of burning it up all at once it is gradually broken down step by step, and it is believed that a part of the sugar in one of those steps of oxidation may be transformed somewhat into alcohol.

"Senator MCNARY. Any other questions?

"Mr. COOKE. May I ask a question or two?

"Senator MCNARY. Certainly.

"Mr. COOKE. In the case of a sugar shortage, Dr. Alsberg, which makes the normal ration, whatever it may be, unavailable, would you consider it preferable to have the sugar that goes into soda water used on the table or in the production of any true foods?

"Dr. ALSBERG. I do not think so far as the well-being of the country is concerned it makes much difference where the sugar ration is used. It is going to be used as food whether it goes into the stomach—whether it is used to sweeten coffee or in foods. You can not take it into your mouth and swallow it whether in the form of the sugar itself or when added to food without using it, so that the sum total of the sugar is the same, although the distribution may be different.

"Mr. COOKE. If the housewife can find no sugar at her store on a given morning and wants sugar for her children's oatmeal, would you say failing that she should go to the drug store and get a drink of sweetened water?

"Dr. ALSBERG. No; and I shouldn't say that she should go to the drug store and buy saccharin to put on her oatmeal either.

"Mr. COOKE. No; but if saccharin were used in soda water and sugar on oatmeal it would be preferable from a dietetic standpoint.

"Dr. ALSBERG. I do not think that makes any difference.

"Mr. COOKE. The young woman who eats a full dinner and then eats a pound of candy while sitting on the lounge afterwards would not get a balanced ration, would you say? Is that candied sugar necessary to her?

"Dr. ALSBERG. No; but you will find she does not eat as much supper, so it becomes the same thing.

"Mr. COOKE. But she eats the candy after eating a full dinner?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Yes; but she will not eat so much supper thereafter.

"Mr. COOKE. Do you think that the use of saccharin in soda water would have a deleterious effect upon people?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Yes, sir.

"Mr. COOKE. Have you heard about the opinion of Dr. W. E. Burge, of the physiological laboratory at the University of Illinois?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Yes, sir.

"Mr. COOKE. Here is his conclusion——

"Dr. ALSBERG. Yes; I have had it repeated. We have never been able to corroborate it in any respect.

"Mr. COOKE. We know nothing of this ourselves.

"Dr. ALSBERG. I know; you had nothing to do with it. When I saw that I believed it necessary to have it repeated by a man of higher standing than he has, and he could not corroborate it.

"Mr. COOKE. May I put this in the record, because it is interesting?

"Senator MCNARY. Yes.

"Mr. COOKE. It is as follows:

"The conclusion is drawn that in addition to being a sweetening agent, saccharin, although not oxidized itself, serves to facilitate the oxidation of the other food materials by stimulating the liver to an increased output of catalase, the enzyme in the body principally responsible for oxidation. Hence it would seem that saccharin should be positively helpful in the diet, instead of harmful, as some have claimed, particularly in a disease such as diabetes, where the principal trouble is defective oxidation.

"Senator RANSDELL. Before you leave, Dr. Alsberg, how does sugar compare with other food products in food-producing value, do you know?

"Dr. ALSBERG. One part of sugar will produce four units of energy in the system, in round numbers. One part of fat or oil will produce nine units of energy in the system. One part of protein or nitrogenous material will produce about the same number of units as sugar, four units of energy. Of course, nitrogenous material has an advantage over the fats and over sugar in that you have to repair your tissues with it and it becomes available as a repair material.

"Senator RANSDELL. Sugar is a very valuable food product?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Oh, yes; very valuable.

"Senator MCNARY. Any other questions, Mr. Cooke?

"Mr. COOKE. Conceding that sugar is valuable as a food product, is it possible for a citizen to overindulge in sugar?

"Dr. ALSBERG. It is possible to indulge too much in any ingredient.

"Mr. COOKE. And sugar is a deleterious thing if too much is used?

"Dr. ALSBERG. Well, that depends upon circumstances. You can get a deleterious effect from the excessive use of anything.

"Mr. COOKE. In other words, you can use too much sugar, and you can use too much beef, and you can use too much salt?

"Dr. ALSBERG. You can make a pig of yourself in the use of any ingredient.

"Mr. COOKE. And possibly you could use too much saccharin.

"Dr. ALSBERG. I think it altogether likely that you could.

"Mr. COOKE. That is all.

"Senator MCNARY. I wish to thank you on behalf of the committee, Dr. Alsberg, for your attendance here. Dr. Du Bois, have you anything further to say?

"Dr. DU BOIS. My only suggestion is to conclude, from our standpoint, with the statement that I am sorry the controversial aspect has taken so much time. If there could be a relaxation of the regulation with reference to saccharin there is no question but what there would be a better distribution of sugar, and if saccharin could be used where it may be used, it would be absolutely harmless. You could release 100,000 pounds of sugar at least for the table and food products."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KING. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Utah, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF UTAH, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.

This is to certify that the document hereto attached is a true copy of senate joint memorial No. 1, passed by the Legislature of the State of Utah at a special session, convened on the 29th day of September and adjourned on the 6th day of October, 1919, petitioning the Congress of the United States to pass necessary legislation to determine the question of title to mineral lands included in sections of public lands granted to the State under the enabling act, approved July 16, 1894, and for other purposes, as the same now appears of record in said office

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah, at Salt Lake City, in said State, this 17th day of October, 1919.

[SEAL.]

HARDEN BENNION, Secretary of State,
By JERROLD R. LETCHER, Deputy.

Senate joint memorial 1.

Petitioning the Congress of the United States to pass necessary legislation to determine the question of title to mineral lands included in sections of public lands granted to the State under the enabling act, approved July 16, 1894, and entitled "An act to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

To the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the United States, by section 6 of an act approved July 16, 1894, entitled "An act to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," granted to the State of Utah for the support of common schools certain sections of every township in said State, to wit: Sections 2, 16, 32, and 36, and provided for lands in lieu thereof where said-named sections or any part thereof in any township were unavailable; and

Whereas in said same act it was provided that certain public lands were to be granted to the State upon its admission into the Union for the purpose of constructing public buildings and for the University and Agricultural College, and for the purpose of building permanent water reservoirs for irrigating purposes, and for the establishment and maintenance of an insane asylum and for the establishment and maintenance of a school of mines, and for the establishment and maintenance of a deaf and dumb asylum, and for the establishment and maintenance of a reform school, and for the establishment of a State normal school, and for the establishment and maintenance of an institution for the blind, and for a miners' hospital for disabled miners; and

Whereas the State of Utah has sold and disposed of large parts of said lands so granted by the United States under the impression and with the understanding that it had full title thereto, regardless of whether said lands were mineral or otherwise; and

Whereas said grantees purchased said lands under the impression and understanding that the title in said lands was in the State; and

Whereas it was the understanding and impression of the executive officers dealing with said lands, and of the State of Utah, that said lands were granted by said enabling act to the State of Utah with all mineral rights included; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the United States v. Sweet, administrator of Sweet, has held that the school section grant contained in the enabling act and known as section 6 of said act was not intended to embrace the land known to be valuable for coal, and has further held that lands known to be mineral at the time of the taking effect of said grant were reserved to the United States; and

Whereas said decision has worked a hardship on those purchasers who purchased school lands under the impression and with the understanding that they obtained full title from the State; and

Whereas the State of Utah is unable to determine in any case just what lands were known to be mineral at the time of the taking effect of said grant, and is thus unable to determine just what lands the State of Utah has title to, and what it has not title to, and is unable to assure purchasers or prospective purchasers as to the title to such lands; and

Whereas lands which are now found to contain minerals or thought to be mineral lands upon investigation by the Department of the Interior, and which were included in the sections conveyed by the United States to the State of Utah and sold by the State of Utah to purchasers for the purposes designated in the enabling act, are being disposed of or attempted to be disposed of by the Department of the Interior as property of the United States; and

Whereas in each case where said attempted disposition is made by the United States a contest between the State and the United States, or between a purchaser of the United States and the State, or between a purchaser of the State and the United States, is entailed; and

Whereas there have been a great many of such contests and under the present state of affairs a likelihood of many more contests of like nature will take place, leading to the unsettlement of titles and supposed rights, and will tend to confusion; and

Whereas the State of Utah is unable to determine in many cases just exactly what land it owns, and therefore what it may sell, to the great detriment of the common-school funds and the purposes for which said lands were granted; and

Whereas it is deemed that said state of affairs should be remedied by proper legislation of Congress:

Now, therefore, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully petition that necessary legislation be enacted by the Congress of the United States whereby it may be determined what sections granted by the enabling act to the State of Utah for the purposes therein mentioned belong to the State of Utah, and that some certain and workable method be instituted for determining without contest in each particular case what lands sold by the State to purchasers really belong to the said purchasers or belong to the United States.

Passed October 4, 1919.

Approved October 8, 1919.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of the congregation of the Free Baptist Church of Branch County, of the Association of Congregational Churches of Saginaw, and of sundry citizens of Alanson, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Hiram Lodge, No. 1, Free and Accepted Masons, of Detroit, Mich., praying for an investigation into the recent race riots and mob violence in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER presented a memorial of Local Lodge No. 867, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, of Hutchinson, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Cummins bill for the operation and control of railroads, which was ordered to lie on the table.

DETACHED SERVICE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3238) relating to detached service of officers of the Regular Army, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 275) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3290) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer free of charge to the Federal Board for Vocational Education certain machines, appliances, tools, equipment, and other supplies under the control of the War Department; and

A bill (S. 3291) to fix the mileage to be paid to officers of the Army, active and retired, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, contract surgeons, expert accountants of the Inspector General's Department, and others connected with the Army, and also providing for reimbursement for actual expenses of travel and a flat per diem in lieu thereof; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 3292) for the relief of Davidson County, Tenn., and the city of Nashville, Tenn.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3293) for the relief of the owner of the derrick Capitol;

A bill (S. 3294) for the relief of the owner of the derrick Concord; and

A bill (S. 3295) for the relief of the Moran Towing & Transportation Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3296) regarding the education and naturalization of aliens and the children of aliens, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

A bill (S. 3297) to punish conspiracy against organized government; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 3298) granting a pension to August Garich (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 3299) providing for the purchase of certain inventions, designs, and methods of aircraft, aircraft parts, and aviation technique of Edwin Fairfax Naulty and Leslie Fairfax Naulty, of New York; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 3300) to subject Indian lands to condemnation under the eminent domain of the several States for waterways and highways; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask leave to present a Senate resolution of inquiry, and I ask for its immediate consideration. If it leads to any discussion I will withdraw the request for consideration, but I do not think that it will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 219), as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to give to the Senate the following information in regard to the public statement dated October 22, 1919, purporting to be issued by the Federal Trade Commission with reference to Senator JAMES E. WATSON, a Senator from the State of Indiana, to wit:

1. Who directed and authorized the preparation of said public statement?
2. Who prepared it?
3. How many copies were prepared?
4. How many copies were distributed?
5. To whom and to what publications and organizations were they sent?
6. Who paid for their preparation and distribution?
7. If paid for with Government money, out of what fund was it taken?
8. How members of the commission approved the preparation and distribution of this document, and if not all of them, give the names of those who did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. Until at least the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] can be heard on the resolution, I think it ought to go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Indiana has been conferred with about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it is satisfactory to the Senator from Indiana, I have no objection, but it relates to an address which he made a few days ago.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is satisfactory to him.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think he should be heard with reference to any such matter.

Mr. WATSON. It is entirely satisfactory to me to have the resolution passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

Mr. McCUMBER subsequently said: Mr. President, there seems to have been a misunderstanding in regard to my having objected to the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I did not object to the present consideration of the resolution, provided it was satisfactory to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who was not in the Chamber. That Senator, however, is now present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota withdraws his objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; if my intervention was understood to have been an objection, I withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Washington?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ROGERS, Mr. TEMPLE, and Mr. FLOOD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 333. An act providing for the disinterment and removal of the remains of the infant child, Norman Lee Molzahn, from the temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to a permanent burial place;

H. R. 446. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to transfer fractional block 6 of Naylor's addition, Forest Grove, Oreg., to the United States of America for the use of the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture;

H. R. 753. An act for the relief of Susie Currier;

H. R. 2452. An act for the relief of Charles A. Carey; and

H. R. 5007. An act granting citizenship to certain Indians.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. GRONNA obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has kindly yielded to me for a moment to report from the Committee on Foreign Relations a new draft of the reservations already reported, together with certain additional reservations. I ask that these may be printed in the RECORD without reading, and also printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Massachusetts is granted.

The reservations this day reported by Mr. LODGE are as follows:

"The committee also report the following reservations and understandings to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said following reservations and understandings have been accepted as a part and a condition of said instrument of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit: Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

"1. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the league of nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

"2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

"3. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, part 1, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

"4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the league of nations or any agency thereof or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

"5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the league of nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said league of nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

"6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158 and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan.

"7. The Congress of the United States will provide by law for the appointment of the representatives of the United States in the assembly and the council of the league of nations and may in its discretion provide for the participation of the United States in any commission, committee, tribunal, court, council, or conference, or in the selection of any members thereof, and for the appointment of members of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences, or any other representatives under the treaty of peace, or in carrying out its provisions, and until such participation and appointment have been so provided for and the powers and duties of such representatives so defined, no person shall represent the United States under either said league of nations or the treaty of peace with Germany or be authorized to perform any act for or on behalf of the United States thereunder and no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences, except with the approval of the Senate of the United States.

"8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

"9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the league of nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency organized under the league of nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.

"10. If the United States shall at any time adopt any plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the league of nations under the provisions of article 8, it reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

"11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the league of nations, residing within the United States or in the countries other than that violating said article 16, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

"12. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

"13. The United States declines to accept any interest as trustee or in her own right, or any responsibility for the government or disposition of the overseas possessions of Germany, her rights and titles to which Germany renounces to the principal allied and associated powers under articles 119 to 127, inclusive.

"14. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions affect its honor or its vital interests, and declares that such questions are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the league of nations or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power."

THE LEAGUE COVENANT AND THE TREATY OF PEACE.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I was very glad to have the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] this morning introduce petitions and resolutions adopted by certain religious organizations throughout the United States. I shall refer to some of those matters in the course of my address. I believe if there are any organizations which have great responsibilities to meet they are organizations composed of ministers of the gospel, who profess to preach the teachings of the Immaculate Master. I have not examined as carefully as I should like to do the history which I am about to rehearse, but it has been stated by one Sherman Pettigrew that during the entire known history of the world preachers have advocated war and that during the same period there have been 2,358 years of war and only 227 years of peace. Approximately 90 per cent of the leaders in the recent war were professed Christians and the other 10 per cent were Buddhists and Mohammedans. That being the case, I believe that the preachers should not only be interested but that they ought to feel that they have some responsibilities to meet in this matter.

Mr. President, in connection with this covenant, which proposes an international organization, invested, as it is, with what I believe to be arbitrary and almost unlimited power, I feel that we should carefully look into the subject and ascertain what has been done by the Governments which are to be our partners in this colossal enterprise.

In looking at it from an absolutely unprejudiced standpoint so far as it may affect foreign nations, but naturally with a keen interest on behalf of my own country, it appears to me that before we enter into this world business on this tremendous scale it is the right as well as the duty of those of us who are representatives of the American people most carefully to scrutinize and investigate the affairs of our business partners. I shall, therefore, be compelled to refer to what has happened in the past, but in referring to what has been done by certain administrations of the various governments of the world I shall only give such as are known to be historical facts.

I hope that I may not be understood as favoring the people of any foreign nation as against the people of any other foreign nation, for such is absolutely not the case. I hope that the remarks that I am about to make will not lead to the conclusion that I owe any allegiance to any country under the sun except to the United States of America. Neither do I want to be understood as entertaining any hatred whatever for the people of foreign lands, and especially the British people or people of British descent. I consider it wholly unnecessary for me to make an effort to eulogize the English-speaking race, for American history is an illustration so complete of what the English-speaking people did to establish this Government that any fulsome praise coming from me would add nothing to the glory of their splendid achievements.

Mr. President, there is now pending in this body for our consideration a document denominated as the covenant for a league of nations combined with a treaty of peace between the allied nations and Germany.

This is the first time in our history as a nation, and so far as I know it is the first time in the history of civilization, that the people of any nation have been forced to consider and urged to adopt as one document a treaty of peace which necessarily involves the settlement of claims, of boundaries, and indemnities, together with a covenant which prescribes rules of conduct, and both legal and moral obligations of the contracting parties, to be administered by an executive council or by a supergovernment.

If this double-headed contract only provided for specific obligations and performances, setting forth in plain, unmistakable terms what the obligations are, we might overlook the novelty of this scheme. But the most unfortunate and objectionable features of the covenant are its provisions setting up a supergovernment with unlimited powers defined in vague and indefinite language.

I think it is only fair to say that the American people are very much divided on the question of what this supergovernment can and can not do. Some of us honestly believe that it would be a surrender of our American sovereignty, of our Monroe doctrine, and of control of questions affecting our vital interests to adopt this covenant in its present form. Others say that we would not surrender our sovereignty, our Monroe doctrine, and the control of questions affecting our vital interests by adopting it; but, at best, we stand divided as to the meaning of some of the provisions, and especially as to some of the most important provisions of the covenant.

Some people seem to believe that this covenant embodies a new theory of promoting peace, but it does not, because in theory as well as in practice the making of peace treaties and alliances is as old as the world itself. They may be found and are referred to in the Old Testament; they are recorded on the monuments of Egypt and Assyria, and many of them will be found in the histories of Greece and Rome.

These treaties and alliances may be classed as political, as treaties of peace, of cession, of boundary, of neutralization, of guaranty, but I know of no treaties or alliances subscribed to by any nation or nations in which there have not been specific provisions to safeguard and protect most carefully the sovereignty of the nations or parties in interest.

It has been the common practice among the people to enter into agreements for the submission of controversies to an arbitral tribunal, or the objects may have been commercial and relating to conventions. We have had treaties with reference to the slave trade, and navigation treaties. During the last 3,000 years there have been an innumerable number of treaties and conventions relating to civil justice, and there have been confederations for special social objects. More than 500 years before the birth of Christ the celebrated treaty was made between Rome and Carthage.

In making a treaty the first consideration in importance is the object sought and the validity of the treaty. It must be made between competent parties, sovereign States. A treaty made between the United States of America and Great Britain can rightfully be called a valid treaty, because both are competent to act; they are sovereign nations. But a treaty between British India and the United States is not a valid treaty, nor would a treaty between Egypt and British India be a valid treaty, because the foreign nations named are not sovereign States.

At one time, since the beginning of the Christian era, it was held that a treaty between an infidel and a Christian State was not a valid contract or treaty. Treaties of peace and guaranty were made between Great Britain and Portugal and other European nations as far back as 1373.

This is not the first time that an effort has been made to unite the nations of the earth, to form an alliance and agree to a covenant for the promotion of peace, but it is the first time that an effort has been made to establish a supergovernment to rule every nation on the face of the earth. For centuries it has been the common practice among the nations of the earth when tired and sick of war to enter into alliances which would assure the parties to such an agreement that they would not be disturbed as long as the agreement entered into was in good faith carried out, but these agreements have too often been violated and broken. They have, nevertheless, been the means of temporarily delaying war. But never has any nation been asked, as we are now asked, to surrender its sovereignty, involving its domestic and vital interests, nor have the people of any nation been asked to send their soldiers across the sea, a distance of 3,000 miles, to police any other nation, and thus guarantee the territorial integrity of foreign nations.

As a rule, these treaties have commenced with the following words:

"In the name of the Most Holy and Indivisible Trinity" or "In the name of Almighty God."

I believe it is safe to say that all former peace treaties between nations which have been of any great importance have at the outset referred to and recognized the existence of a supreme being; but, contrary to this old custom, this treaty seems to ignore the existence of Almighty God; at any rate, it does not refer to nor recognize in any form the existence of a supreme being.

The Holy Alliance, ratified by Alexander I, Emperor of Russia, Francis I, Emperor of Austria, and Frederick William III, King of Prussia, on the 26th of September, 1815, if compared with the proposed league covenant, will be found to be in better form, and is as much superior, both in spirit and in form, to this proposed covenant as is the Master's Sermon on the Mount to the Book of Talmud or the Koran. This so-called Holy Alliance, which was a general treaty, was based upon exalted Christian principles, but still it never became effective as a diplomatic instrument. But at that time Europe had gone through ceaseless wars for more than a quarter of a century, and the people were war-torn, tired, and sick of wars, as the people now are tired and sick of wars. The people were then, as we are now, praying for wars to end and for the promotion of peace among all the peoples of the earth.

If the Holy Alliance of 1815, based as it was on the most beautiful declaration of principles to which any Christian could subscribe, was not regarded as a treaty, was not effective and lived up to, how can we expect that an unholy alliance such as is proposed at this time will promote peace? This proposed covenant sets up and establishes a supergovernment and authorizes an executive council consisting of nine men to dictate the business, the terms, and the policies of every nation on the earth with reference to both peace and war; and the people of the United States of America must take their chances with one representative on this executive council and with one vote in the assembly. This council consists of the representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, together with four other representatives of the league, and we have only one vote in the assembly as against the 32 original members of the league signatories of the treaty, and the possible 45 members of the league if the States which have been invited accede to the covenant. How can we expect that the smaller and less powerful nations of the world will be satisfied, even though they subscribe to this autocratic and despotic constitution and covenant such as is proposed?

Fortunately, or unfortunately, some people have been blessed with a great vocabulary and a superabundance of ingenuity and skill to prepare and use phrases which are very, very pleasing to the ear, but which are as meaningless as a sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal, and which are as impossible of execution as was the Holy Alliance of 1815.

Anxious as we are, and glad as we all would be if it were possible, to reach an agreement and have an understanding with the peoples of the earth that no more wars should be fought, that no more human lives should be sacrificed on the field of battle, we must, nevertheless, not forget that the renaissance of the people among the nations of the earth is not yet complete. Some of us, at least, fear that there still linger in the hearts and minds of men selfish and unworthy motives, and we refuse to believe that it is possible for all humanity to do to others as they would others should do unto them. So let us face the situation as it actually exists, and let us deal with it in an honest, upright, and practical way. Some of us refuse to believe that the peoples of the earth have become perfect; and we need not go to foreign lands to be convinced that mortal man still possesses a desire for wealth and power, and is not altogether careful how he may obtain it. The millennium has not been reached; a state of perfection is as much of an uncertainty to-day as it was in the days when former treaties and covenants were made and broken.

So let us not attempt the impossible, but let us proceed in a sane and practical manner; let us protect our own people first—the people of the United States—with confidence and full assurance and belief that we shall in the future as we have in the past, to the utmost of our ability, assist the helpless, defend the defenseless, assist and protect the oppressed, and to the best of our ability aid and support the people of the nations which may suffer injustice. But I believe that the people of the United States will resent the idea, and will take it as an insult, to be told by a council composed mostly of aliens that we must do thus and so. Whatever we do in the future should be done with the sanction and approval of our own people, and not at the command of some autocratic or despotic foreign power which would say "Go" and we must go, and "Come" and we must come. It should be left to the free will of the American people; it must be approved or disapproved through the representatives of the people of the United States of America.

It is not necessary for me to point out what it has cost our people to make this a free and independent Nation. It is not necessary to call attention to the battles fought by the heroes of the Revolutionary days, commencing at Lexington on April 19, 1775, and ending at Yorktown on the 19th of October, 1781. It is not necessary to call attention to the War of 1812, when we were fighting for the freedom of the seas, or to the Civil War, when we had our internecine strife to perpetuate this Union. It is hardly necessary to call attention to what the brave boys did who fought in the Spanish-American War; and I am sure that no one has forgotten the heroic deeds of our American boys during this war—a war so costly in blood and treasure, a war so stupendous that no writer will ever be able to fully describe the sufferings and the losses to the entire human race. At any rate, let it not be said that these stupendous sacrifices which we have made shall be treated lightly; that the services which these young brave heroes of the United States have performed have already been forgotten by us, and that the sorrows and the tears of the mothers and other relatives and friends shall so soon be forgotten.

We know that thousands of them have sacrificed their precious blood, and for what? Was it to protect the territorial integrity of foreign nations? Was it to extend the boundary lines of aggressive European powers who wish to control the earth? Must it be said that we are ready or willing to turn over the affairs of government, the principles for which our boys believed they fought, to an executive council composed largely of aliens, and that from now on the several nationalities, many of whom are found among the nations of Europe, and also in Asia and Africa, shall be denied the right of self-determination and must submit to the mandate of this council or this league, regardless of how brutally they may be oppressed or how just their cause for freedom and liberty may be?

The most cruel war in the history of the world has hardly ended; millions of men have been killed, more have been wounded, and billions of dollars of wealth have been squandered. We have hardly withdrawn from the conflict and ceased fighting, and yet we are asked to give up that which has always been the most cherished ideal of the human race, the opportunity of independent and separate nationalities who love liberty and freedom to establish governments fit for free people to live in.

I shall not go into the alleged causes which led us into this war, because in reading the statements made by prominent officials of the administration before the war and the statements that are being made now they differ somewhat; and listening to the debates in the Senate, it is evident that all do not agree as to the real causes, although the declaration of war itself is presumed to give the best reason for our entry into the terrible conflict.

If I may be pardoned for digressing for a moment from the consideration of this proposed treaty, I wish to make a few observations with reference to conditions as I saw them for at least two years previous to our entry into the war. But before I enter into any discussion as to what provoked or caused the unfriendly relations, and ultimately war, between the United States and Germany, I wish to say that no one could more severely condemn the wrongs and the injustices perpetrated upon the people of Belgium and France by the German army than I did, and on many occasions I said that the entry of the German army into those countries meant the ultimate defeat of the German army, and more than that, it meant the destruction of the German Government, and that the people of Germany would for generations to come have to bear the burdens and pay the penalties for the gross violations committed against the people of Belgium and France.

It is a well-known fact that we all poured out our treasure and our sympathy, and helped in every way we could the people of Belgium and the people of France before our entry into the war, and it was our plain duty to do so.

When on the 7th day of May, 1915, the Lusitania was sunk by a German submarine, I received from the metropolitan press of New York a telegram asking me to state my position with reference to what should be done by the United States, and the files of at least one of those papers will show that I stated very plainly that although I was opposed to war I considered that the sinking of the Lusitania was an assault upon our Government and an insult to our flag and our people; that it was a gross violation of international law, and unless the German Imperial Government should immediately make reparation and cease its murderous operations against the American people it was a cause for war against them by our Government.

I know that my telegram was printed in at least one of the New York papers, because it was reprinted in some of the western newspapers, which criticized me for the position I then took, and I was reminded of the fact that it was a mistake for any Member of this body to make such a frank declaration, because our President was committed to a policy of peace, and we had declared our intention to remain neutral and keep out of the European war.

An election was subsequently held, and the people of my State and of the United States indorsed the position of President Wilson in keeping this country out of war. It was nearly two years from the time the Lusitania was sunk until our declaration of war was made against the Imperial Government of Germany. I believed then, sir, and I believe now, that if a firm stand had been taken by the administration against the invasion of Belgium and France by the German army, and against the murder of American people regardless of whether they were on foreign ships or not; if we had made it known in unmistakable language and terms that immediate reparation must be made for the insult to our flag, and the gross violation of killing our people by sinking the Lusitania, and that submarine warfare must immediately stop or we would be compelled to resort to war, as we did two years later—I say if we had at that time taken such a firm stand and asserted our rights as a great government, I believe, sir, that there would have been no war between the United States and the Central Powers of Europe. If we had taken the position that the German army must withdraw from Belgium and France or face the inevitable, if we had used more firmness instead of a shilly-shallying policy, there is every reason to believe that the German Government would have known that they would meet with an ignominious and disastrous defeat, because it would not take a military genius to know that Germany would have to surrender, as she could not hope to be successful against her European enemies and against the United States.

I am not mentioning this as a criticism of the administration because I have stated that President Wilson's policy for peace was indorsed at the election of 1916. I know, because I personally participated in that campaign, and any argument that might be advanced against President Wilson's administration would immediately be met by his supporters with the assertion that he must be reelected in order that our beloved country should be kept out of European wars. That is what reelected President Wilson in 1916 to the high position which he now holds. I am not relating this as a matter of criticism against the administration; I am simply reciting an historical fact. But after the election, what happened? Conditions seemed to change. The war clouds which had been visible only upon the horizon soon spread their gloomy darkness over our entire land; and it now became apparent that the sinking of the Lusitania was a violation of international law, a violation of American rights and decency; and the friends of the administration who formerly had pictured the horrors of war, and who had promised the American people that we would keep out of it, now changed from angels of peace to advocates of war.

All these changes took place suddenly; it all happened, so to speak, over night. But no one was permitted to discuss it. The freedom of speech was not only limited, but denied and prohibited; and, unless you were in a position and willing to say "So sayeth the king," you were denominated a pro-German and a traitor; and even before the war was declared it was treason to express an honest opinion. No one was permitted to ask for information as to what had been done or what had happened to cause this sudden change, and history already reveals that much misinformation was given to the people of this country.

The Angel of Peace had now vanished, and the country became inflamed with the spirit of war, and if any Member of this or the other body of Congress should take a very limited portion of time to discuss the question, he was at once consigned to be guillotined, or to face a firing squad.

As one member of this body, I felt that sufficient information was not given by the administration to warrant this sudden change; without at least some discussion upon a resolution which meant so much to America and to the American people, involving, as it did, the lives of millions of our people and the expenditure of untold sums of treasure. On this fateful day, the 4th day of April, 1917, I was one of the six Senators who voted against this resolution. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate to go over the brief statement which I then made, but I ask unanimous consent to insert at the conclusion of my remarks the statement which I then made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe now, as I did then, that we had as much right to oppose the resolution as any other Member had to speak and vote for it. I well remember how some of you, who are now clamoring for this covenant which you say will give an immediate peace, were then acting as demons of war—nothing could be discussed, no information could be obtained even by a Member of Congress, we had to take orders from our Chief Executive, and regardless of whether we saw honest mistakes made or not, no one would be allowed to correct them. But you say now that you hate war, and you believe in peace. You know as well as I do that this covenant will not be a promoter of lasting peace; you know as well as I do that no covenant can be made to promote a lasting peace unless it is based upon the fundamental principles of justice and equality. You need not be alarmed and you must not console yourselves with the false hope that the people of the country have so soon forgotten this horrible conflict, so costly to them, a war which robbed them of so many of their loved ones, and which placed upon them the burdens of taxation which it will take generations to overcome. You need not console yourselves with the idea that they will so soon forget the sudden change and the hasty action which you then took.

The citizens of the United States unanimously supported the administration during the war. It was their patriotic duty to do so after war was declared; to have done otherwise would have been disobedience to law, and disloyalty to our country. Undoubtedly there were many honest, well-meaning, and law-abiding citizens who were at a loss to understand what compelling force caused our entry into the war so suddenly after President Wilson's second inauguration. Most of the people did not know that the revolutionary outbreak in Russia to a large extent changed the European conditions. Had the Russian armies continued to fight the armies of Germany and Austria-Hungary, the war would undoubtedly have ended much sooner than it did; there would also have been less demand for American troops, because Germany would have been defeated if Russia with her once powerful armies had been able to carry on a vigorous fight. Nevertheless, a great number of loyal American citizens believed that we should either have entered the war at an earlier time or else stayed out altogether. That was honest opinion.

I made the statement that if war should be declared I would do my full duty. Mr. President, I can truthfully assert that my promise has been made good, as four young men bearing my name, and of my nearest kin, participated in the horrible conflict on the battle fields of France, three of whom were in the trenches as doughboys and the fourth one served in the heavy Artillery until the day the armistice was signed. All of these boys were under age and not subject to conscription. None of them sought a swivel-chair position, but fought on the battle fields of France and elsewhere in the trenches and on the fields until the armistice was signed. We contributed in a most substantial way in every way that we could to the support of our Army, and no red-blooded American could afford to do less after our declaration of war than to aid to the extent of his ability to help furnish food, supplies, and money to successfully prosecute the war.

Of course I am not saying this boastfully, but I want to remind the character assassins and detractors of the past that the success of the war so far as America is concerned can not be attributed to those who spoke longest and loudest and did the shouting. Throughout this entire land the patriotic men and women, regardless of party or creed, regardless of nationality or descent, most loyally contributed in every way possible, and it was but natural for them to do so, because their sons were in the struggle; they were doing the fighting, and were the most potential in winning the war.

I have called attention to this because very naturally the question will be asked, Why are those who opposed the declaration of war now against this covenant and this treaty?

Mr. President, we are not opposing the treaty of peace. If the Shantung robbery were not included in the provisions of the treaty, I should not oppose the treaty; but I am opposing the covenant, which in all fairness ought to be considered as a separate document by this body and by the Chief Executive of our land.

Answering for myself only, I wish to say that there never was presented to the American people a document so replete with inconsistencies and with provisions so dangerous and full of pitfalls as the proposed covenant. There never was in the history of our country presented to this legislative body a document so inimical to the best interests of our country and our people, and it really seems to me that every provision affecting American interests must have been conceived in iniquity and born in sin. In the first place, it is established on the basis of inequality and injustice, and it adds to the power of the stronger nations as against the weaker nations, and worst of all it takes from the people of dependencies, of empires, and kingdoms the God-given right to rebel against tyranny and injustice.

If we ratify this covenant as proposed, we bind ourselves and our posterity to support the dominant powers of every nation that belongs to this league, and to participate in their wars, their struggles, and their troubles; and the question of self-determination will have been completely defeated and destroyed. If we ratify this treaty, we, as members of the league, must live up to all its provisions, both moral and legal. If we do not intend to do so, let us not obligate ourselves to do so. If we approve this treaty we would have nothing to say as to which side of the question we shall make our fight, because that would be determined by the council or by the league. This covenant in its present form sets up an autocracy with powers unrivaled or unheard of among the family of man. It would take from the American people their sovereign rights; it would involve them in the wars of Europe, Asia, and Africa whenever the members of the league might see fit to demand our service; and as to our representation in the league, it discriminates against us.

The senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] the other day called attention to the fact that the American Nation is composed of peoples from many foreign lands. America has been an asylum for the oppressed and the poor; it has brought to our shores virile men and women, men and women possessing the very best and strongest minds, all of whom loved freedom and independence more than they respected the emperors, kings, and rulers of Europe. Most of these men and women have come to our shores to obtain for themselves their own freedom and liberty; they were anxious to become citizens of the United States because they knew that they would share the blessings and the liberties of the natural-born citizens of our land; they were anxious to renounce all their allegiance to the rulers of the lands from whence they came. They have been obedient to law, and while their hearts may throb with friendly feelings toward the land of their birth—and it is only natural that they should feel friendly toward their own kin—they have always been mindful of the responsibilities and the obligations which they owe to their adopted country. There may be exceptions to this rule, but I am glad to say that there are mighty few who have disgraced themselves and their ancestors by showing disobedience to law and disloyalty to their adopted land. This is now their country, and they are in soul and spirit loyal to America; the Stars and Stripes is their banner and they have manifested their loyalty and their eagerness to defend our flag, because thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, of these young men have offered to sacrifice, and thousands have sacrificed, their all on the fields of battle. These men know that men of foreign birth can pay the greatest tribute to their ancestors and to the country from whence they or their ancestors came, by becoming loyal, patriotic, and law-abiding citizens. And let me say right now that no man of foreign birth who comes to this country to better his condition, who advocates the destruction of government, who refuses to be obedient to law, or who looks upon citizenship as an empty honor or an informal ceremony, has any right whatever to ask to become a citizen of the United States and share the blessings of liberty, freedom, and justice; and such men should not be permitted to live in the United States, but they should be sent back to the country from whence they came.

Mr. President, I am aware that a few foreigners who had the opportunity to land on American soil have been unfaithful to the promises they made when they were permitted to enter our shores. Some of them have not become citizens of this country. For such men I shall make no apology, because I believe that the man who asks to share our blessings should also assume his share of our burdens and responsibilities.

But I am not defending or speaking for individuals. I am calling attention to the different nationalities in our country. It is of the patriotism of nationalities I speak and not of individuals.

Speaking of our heroic soldiers and their ancestry, is it possible that anyone will dare to question the loyalty and the valor of the American soldier of Irish or British blood, of Scandinavian, of French, of Italian, of Finnish, of Russian, or even of German, or any other blood or ancestry? To do so would be a malignant falsehood, because millions of American boys, descendants of citizens of foreign birth, went to the field of battle with only one purpose in view, and that was to win a glorious victory for the United States of America. Who will challenge the Americanism of these patriotic heroes, all of whom stood ready to sacrifice their all upon the battle fields of France and elsewhere for the protection of the Stars and Stripes, and for the honor and the glory of America?

It is true that we are called a representative democracy, and this is one of the fundamental principles which the American soldier had in mind; that the administration of our Government shall be in the hands of the many and not of the few; that nobility and rank shall not be recognized, but that our citizens when distinguished shall be preferred to public service upon merit and honor, and, first of all, because of loyalty to America and to American institutions and ideals. If excellence and honor are recognized, let it be based upon meritorious service, so that we shall always have laws which secure equal justice to all alike in their private disputes, and let this principle extend to public and international disputes. If we do so, it will not be necessary for us to copy from our neighbors; it will not be necessary for us to enter into any rivalry with the institutions of others, because we shall prove to the world that the fundamental principles enunciated by the fathers still live, and that America shall, in the future as in the past, exemplify in deed as will as in word the teachings of Washington, Jefferson, the Adamses, Monroe, Lincoln, and other great heroic statesmen, who through their love for the people of America served for the promotion of justice, liberty, and freedom.

Mr. President, I now come to the covenant which I shall briefly discuss.

ARTICLE 1.

In the very first paragraph of article 1 of the covenant we find this provision:

> The original members of the league of nations shall be those of the signatories which are named in the annex to this covenant, and also such of those other States named in the annex as shall accede without reservation to this covenant.

Why was it necessary in order to become an original member of the league to provide that the covenant must be agreed to without reservations, which might mean without explanation, and also without the right of any of the signatories to place a definite construction upon the language or provisions of the covenant?

In the second paragraph of article 1 we find this provision:

> Any fully self-governing State, dominion, or colony not named in the annex may become a member of the league if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly, provided that it shall give effective guarantees of its sincere intention to observe its international obligations, and shall accept such regulations as may be prescribed by the league in regard to its military, naval, and air forces and armaments.

In the first place, this paragraph makes clear that the league is not a mere debating society as has been contended by the President of the United States; secondly, it means that any dominion or colony may become a member of the league if agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly.

The self-governing dominions or colonies under the control of Great Britain being recognized as original members of the league of nations and as signatories to the treaty of peace, it will become more difficult in the future for any other dominion or colony to be recognized in like manner as a member of the league.

A great deal has been said with reference to the privilege granted a member of the league to withdraw from the league.

We find in the third paragraph of article 1 this language:

Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

Under this provision it might become not only difficult, but absolutely impossible for any nation to withdraw from the league, because it would be easy for the council or the league to impose international or other obligations which would estop the applicant from withdrawing, because the requirements might be of such a nature as would be impossible of fulfillment.

ARTICLE 2.

Article 2 provides that the action of the league under this covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of an assembly and of a council, with a permanent secretariat. This is a very simple and plain provision, and can not easily be misconstrued.

If we analyze this article we must conclude that what is possible to be done under the authorities granted this league may be done under the exertion of power or force, or under the agency, activity, or operation of the council or of the league. I think we shall all agree that whatever shall be done or executed through this organization will be done through the instrumentality of the assembly and of the council. We must come to the conclusion that it means that the action, operation, or whatever is being done, is effected, executed, performed, enforced, accomplished, or fulfilled through the operation of the assembly and the council.

ARTICLE 3.

The first paragraph of article 3 reads as follows:

The assembly shall consist of representatives of the members of the league.

The second paragraph reads:

The assembly shall meet at stated intervals and from time to time as occasion may require at the seat of the league or at such other place as may be decided upon.

Both of these paragraphs are plain, and can not easily be misconstrued.

The third paragraph, however, is one that is not so easily understood because it deals in the broadest sense with all matters within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world. Quoting the whole paragraph, it reads:

The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

There never was, nor do I believe that there ever will be, any man possessing the wisdom fully to realize the scope, the full interpretation and meaning of this paragraph. Who can say what may be affecting, or what may not be affecting, the peace of the world? Any and every exertion or performance of any human being may to a greater or lesser degree affect the peace of the world. Any and all things done by a government will to a greater or smaller degree affect the peace of the world. So that we may easily inquire, What is there to prohibit, or what vital question may arise which does not come under the jurisdiction of this league? It may be a financial or an economic question, it may be a religious or moral question, or it may be a question of government; and it seems to me that this body of men must necessarily be possessed with more wisdom than was possessed by Solomon in order to meet the responsibilities devolved upon them.

Is it good statesmanship to trust our vital interest to be decided by this council consisting of one American only as against all the other members, most of whom are aliens; to trust them to decide our questions of vital interest such as education, immigration, and other questions most vitally affecting the people of our Nation?

ARTICLE 4.

Article 4 provides that the council shall consist of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, together with representatives of four other members of the league. This means that Great Britain, Japan, France, Italy, and the United States shall be permanent members of the council, and that four other members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion; and until the appointment of the representatives of the four members of the league, Belgium, Brazil, Spain, and Greece are named as members. It also provides that with the approval of a majority of the assembly the council may name additional members of the league, whose representatives shall always be members of the council. The council, with like approval may increase the number of members of the league, to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council.

It will be observed that the four members to be selected by the assembly may be so selected from time to time in its discretion. It is fair to presume that there will be no change in the membership of the council unless the countries which are dominating the league shall desire that such a change be made. It is also fair to presume that the membership of the council will not be increased unless Great Britain and her allies should desire that it be increased, as it is plain to us all that the same countries which control the assembly will also control the council.

In this article it is provided that the council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league, or affecting the peace of the world.

In article 3 it is provided that the assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league, or affecting the peace of the world. It is obvious, therefore, that both the assembly and the council have jurisdiction and may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or of the council, affecting the peace of the world.

It has been argued by the President and his supporters that Great Britain does not have six votes. Technically that may be true, but it is quite certain that upon any and every question affecting the welfare of Great Britain or any of her colonies, she will have six votes, and the United States will have only one vote. It has also been argued that Canada can not become a member of the council. It may be true that she will not become a member of the council, because, as I have said, in all probability no change whatever will be made, but if a change is desired—and that change can only be made by Great Britain and her allies, as she will be in control—there is absolutely no reason why Canada can not become a member of the council.

I desire to read from the speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] made on September 22, 1919, on page 5710 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

On September 3, Sir Robert Borden, premier of Canada, in addressing the Canadian Parliament, declared, in answering the inquiry, "What are the powers and what is the standing of Canada in the league?"

"The new and definite status of the dominions at the peace conference is further manifested in the constitution of the league of nations. Since they had enjoyed the same status at the peace conference as that of minor powers, we took the ground that the dominions should be similarly accepted in the future international relationship contemplated by the league. The league of nations commission, while inclined to accept this in principle, did not at the outset accept all its implications, as was apparent in the first draft of the covenant. This document, however, was professedly tentative. The dominions' case was pressed, and in the final form, as amended and incorporated in the treaty of peace with Germany, the status of the dominions as to membership and representation in the assembly and the council was fully recognized. They are to become members signatories of the treaty, and the terms of the document make no distinction between them and other signatory members"—

Now, get this, for I am coming back to it—

"An official statement as to the true intent and meaning of the provisions of the covenant in that regard was secured by me, and is on record in the archives of the peace conference."

The British premier goes on to state that a similar question arose in respect to the constitution of the international labor organization and in substance declares that the representatives of the dominions and colonies forced its revision so as to recognize their status in that organization as it had been recognized in the league covenant. He then declared:

"I hope the House will realize that the recognition and status accorded to the British dominions at the peace conference were not won without constant effort and firm insistence. In all these efforts the dominions had the strong and unwavering support of the British prime minister and his colleagues."

Further on he discusses the future of the British Empire, and in substance declares that the colonies are to be recognized as nations in their dealings with the British Empire itself, held together, however, by what he says is a British league of nations.

Referring back to the statement just quoted, I call attention to the clause in the statement of Sir Robert Borden:

"An official statement as to the true intent and meaning of the provisions of the covenant in that regard (the status as to membership of the dominions and colonies) was secured by me and is on record in the archives of the peace conference."

That official statement filed in the archives of the peace conference was undoubtedly disclosed in the House of Commons of Canada on September 9 by Hon. Arthur Lewis Sifton, minister of public works, and one of the representatives of Canada at the Versailles conference, and one of the plenipotentiaries who signed the treaty for the Dominion.

After concurring generally in the statement made by Sir Robert Borden as to the struggles of the Dominion's statesmen to secure the full right to take part in the peace conference, he said:

"And, undoubtedly, they did work—

The Canadian representatives—

"in conjunction with the permanent officials of the British Government * * * for the purpose of assisting in the formation of the treaty that would be of great advantage to Great Britain, to the advantage of the British Empire, and, as far as possible, a fair and honorable treaty for the world at large."

That is the British view. It is a photograph of the British soul. I do not say that with unkindness for Great Britain; she is not a monster, but she is a great power that first secures great advantage to herself and then, as far as possible, a fair and honorable treaty for the other fellow. I continue reading; I should not have broken the thread of my discourse. I read on:

"That work—

That is, the work of securing this recognition—

"was performed in connection with what I may call the peace treaty proper."

I continue reading:

"The leader of the opposition contends that we can not take any part in the league of nations.

"The President of the United States contends that they can not take any part in the league of nations; that they are only members of the council; that they have not any authority; that they are just admitted to a debating society. Let us see what these Canadians say:

"'The leader of the opposition contends that we can not take any part in the league of nations. Let me say that Clemenceau, President Wilson, and Lloyd-George disagreed absolutely with the honorable gentleman in that contention.'

"In proof of this he submitted the following letter signed by Clemenceau, Wilson, and George:

"'The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council. We have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view. If there were any doubt it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles are not subject to a narrow or technical construction.

"'(Signed) G. CLEMENCEAU.
WOODROW WILSON.
D. LLOYD-GEORGE.

"'Dated at the Quai D'Orsay, Paris, the 6th day of May, 1919.'"

I suppose that is sufficient proof that Canada's representatives can become members of the council if it is decided to make a change. Of course, as I said in the first place, if it is deemed best to leave matters in statu quo, there will be no change; but if the change is made it must be plain to every Senator here or to any man who has carefully read this document that Canada may become a member of the council as well as a member of the league, because it is agreed that she is one of the signatories and original members of the league.

ARTICLE 5.

This article provides as follows:

Except where otherwise expressly provided in this covenant or by the terms of the present treaty, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.

It is clear that in any and all business of any great importance it will be held that the decision at any meeting of the assembly or of the council must be unanimous. It would be argued that this is in the interest of the United States, which has only one vote. Let us see from a practical standpoint how it would work out. If the United States were one of the parties to a controversy, she would not, according to one of the paragraphs of article 15, be entitled to vote, because that paragraph reads:

If a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

This clearly indicates that if the parties which are not parties to the dispute shall agree, it will not be necessary to submit the matter to arbitration. But the question may be decided by unanimous vote, leaving out the countries of the parties which are the parties in dispute.

I have heard it stated so often on this floor that this council will have no important work to perform. I have heard that argued by lawyers who have made themselves famous as students of law. I ask, in all seriousness, how can any right-thinking man who can read either the English language or the French language or both stand upon this floor and assert that no important function can be transacted by this council in the face of that language?

ARTICLE 6.

This article only provides for the modes of procedure by the league, and also how the secretaries, etc., shall be appointed.

ARTICLE 7.

This article provides where the seat of the league shall be established, and who may attend. It also provides that representatives or members of the league and officials of the league engaged in business of the league shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.

ARTICLE 8.

This article is a significant one. It demonstrates that those who framed this covenant, to a small extent, at least, recognized that on the maintenance of peace depends the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety, etc., but it leaves it to the council to decide what the reduction of armaments shall be.

Quoting the second paragraph of this article, which reads:

The council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several Governments.

The brief paragraph following provides that "Such plans shall be subject to reconsideration and revision at least every 10 years."

The fourth paragraph provides:

After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments, the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.

And yet you say the council does not perform any important function, when, as a matter of fact, the council has it in its power to say what each nation shall have as a matter of armaments, of standing armies and of navies.

To anyone who understands the English language or the French language it must be apparent that the executive council of the league dictates the policy of its members with reference to armaments.

The fifth paragraph of this article is not only significant, but alarming. It provides that:

The members of the league agree that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objections. The council shall advise how the evil effects attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented, due regard being had to the necessities of those members of the league which are not able to manufacture the munitions and implements of war necessary for their safety.

While the delegates to this convention recognized that it was necessary in order to maintain the peace of the world to reduce armaments, yet they proceeded on the theory that it will be necessary for all the members of the league to be provided with armaments, so it is provided that due regard shall be paid to such States as are unable to manufacture for themselves munitions and implements of war.

In the last paragraph of this article it is provided that all the members of the league must furnish full and frank information as to the amount of armaments as well as their military, naval, and air programs, and such of their industries as are adaptable to warlike purposes. Let us see, now, what that means. That means, of course, that the question of production as well as the enterprise of munitions and implements of war must be reported to the league. In other words, this supergovernment will have the authority to demand full and frank reports with reference to the condition of the industries of its membership, whether food products or munitions and implements of war, and for this purpose there is provided in article 9 a permanent commission which shall advise the council on the execution of the provisions of articles 1 and 8 on military, naval, and air questions generally.

ARTICLE 10.

We now come to the celebrated article 10, which, I think, is one of the most objectionable in the entire proposed covenant:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

I seriously doubt if any two members of this body or any two citizens anywhere would agree upon the construction and the meaning of this article. I may be entirely mistaken in my analysis and my conclusions, but I interpret it to mean that the members of the league agree to preserve and protect the territorial integrity and the existing political independence of all the members of the league. I construe the last sentence of this paragraph to mean that in case of any aggression or assault, or in case of any threat against any member of the league, the council shall advise what steps are to be taken and what means are to be employed in order that the obligations entered into shall be fulfilled.

The proponents of this league argue that this article does not mean that the United States or any other member of this league shall be compelled to go to war or to assist in maintaining the territorial integrity or the political independence of any foreign nation unless it be so directed by the legal authorities of the government of any member of the league. I wish I could believe that, Mr. President. In other words, if the United States should become a member of this league she would not be compelled to send her boys across the sea to wage war against any nation unless Congress should so direct.

In all probability the people of the United States would likely do what the friends of this measure say they must do, but it is very clear to me that if the executive council should command that the United States send her soldiers abroad to protect some European, Asiatic, or African nationality, and if the United States should refuse until Congress had so declared, we would have violated article 10, because the language is so plain and so clear that it can not be misunderstood by anyone.

If we join this league we are both morally and legally bound to abide by all the provisions of it, and article 10 provides in unmistakable language that if the council directs that war shall be declared against some nation because of some violation of the territorial integrity and the existing political independence of such nation, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled, and certainly it would do so.

How any red-blooded American who loves American liberty and American independence can subscribe to a proposition of this sort is beyond my comprehension. With the existing inequalities and the discriminations prevailing if this covenant is adopted it seems to me unthinkable that any real American should be willing to agree to a provision so eminently unfair and so dangerous and destructive of our American Government.

ARTICLE 11.

Article 11 provides that:

Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise the secretary general shall on the request of any member of the league forthwith summon a meeting of the council.

It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

This article makes it possible for any member of the league to summon a meeting of the council, and to interfere with any war or threat of war, whether it affects any of the members of the league or not. In other words, this supergovernment undertakes to dictate and regulate the affairs of every nation on the face of the globe. Can it be possible that such a policy would promote peace? And does anyone believe that it would be possible for the dominant powers of the league at any time in the future to reduce armaments to a minimum? Is it not reasonable to believe that munitions and armaments must be increased on a tremendously large scale, so that peace may be enforced by war, and that no small nation will at any time in the future have the right to demand reform, regardless of how oppressed, or of how brutal the treatment of its people may be by the dominant nation which may happen to be a member of the league?

In other words, if any of the European, Asiatic, or African peoples shall be threatened with war, our boys must again cross the ocean to police the boundary lines of Europe, Asia, and Africa, possibly to extend boundary lines. If you want them to do that, vote for it. I for one am not in favor of it. This is limitless autocracy and oligarchy complete; self-determination will forever be a thing of the past. Peoples who want to be freed from the oppression and brutality of the rulers of the dominant powers would never, as long as this league is in existence, enjoy their inherent right to withdraw and become a separate government dominated by any certain nationality.

I wonder what has become of the idealistic 14 points; the freedom of the seas; of the right of the people to self-determination, to rule themselves in accordance with their own views? The executive council of the league of nations might just as well adopt the slogan used by that distinguished autocrat, Louis XIV, who said, "I am the State," because it would be the State; it would be the controlling factor; the men composing this executive council would indicate and control the policy of every nation on the globe.

The last paragraph of this article provides:

It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

To use an old time-worn phrase, "that may embrace and constitute a multitude of sins." It may affect the economic affairs of this Nation, as well as international trade and other matters affecting international transactions.

ARTICLE 12.

In this article we agree, if we become a member of this league, that if there should arise between us any dispute likely to lead to a rupture we will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council; and we agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.

In the second paragraph it provides:

In any case under this article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

Standing alone there could be no objection to this article; but in the article which follows, article 13, the members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration, and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration, and so forth.

If there is a dispute in interpretation of the treaty—

As to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration.

In article 12 the members of the league agree that if there should arise any dispute which would lead to a rupture, they would submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council. And in article 13 it is provided that in case of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be a court agreed upon by the parties to the dispute.

The provision is very indefinite, and the only choice is to have the matter left either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council. Then it is agreed that in no case will either party resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or of the report of the council.

ARTICLE 13.

This article is to some extent similar to the preceding one in that it refers to arbitration. Under the first paragraph of this article it is agreed that whenever any dispute shall arise between the members which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration, and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

Paragraph 2 submits for arbitration any question with reference to the interpretation of any question of international law or with reference to any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, also as to the damages which may be assessed or the reparation to be made for any such breach.

ARTICLE 14.

Article 14 provides for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice, which court shall be competent to hear and determine any dispute of international character which the parties thereto submit to it. It might also give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it either by the council or by the assembly.

ARTICLE 15.

This article clothes the council with great authority and power in that it provides:

If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13, the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council. Any party to the dispute may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the secretary general, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof.

In case the council shall fail to effect a settlement of the dispute, the article provides that a statement shall be made up, giving the facts regarding the dispute, and also the terms of settlement thereof as the council may deem appropriate. If the dispute is not settled, the council shall either unanimously, or by a majority vote, publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto. In other words, the council is authorized to decide the case by a majority vote by declaring what it deems as just and proper. On the other hand, if the council fails to reach a report unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice. In other words, the league may, if it sees fit, make its decision and enforce such penalties as "it" may deem to be right and just.

It is claimed by the friends of this measure that in no case shall the council or the league interfere with any domestic question, but the eighth paragraph of this article provides:

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

That means, in my judgment, that the council shall be the judge and shall decide whether or not the question is a domestic one; so it is not fair to say that the United States or any other country which shall become a member of this league can decide for itself what is or is not a purely domestic question.

In the next paragraph we find that the council has the authority, and it may in any case under article 15 refer the dispute to the assembly. This may be done at the request of either party to the dispute; so it will not do to say that the league is a mere "debating society" because it has the power and authority, and may have to decide some of the most important questions affecting the nations which are parties to the dispute.

The last paragraph of this article provides:

In any case referred to the assembly, all the provisions of this article and of article 12 relating to the action and powers of the council shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

But it is argued by the proponents of this covenant that neither the council nor the assembly renders any verdict or award. Such arguments are not warranted by the facts if we are to assume that the assembly or the council will use the authority and the power granted to it under article 15 as well as under article 12.

ARTICLE 16.

This article in very plain language provides that:

Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league.

How can any Senator, in view of this language, argue that neither the council nor the assembly has the authority to render a verdict or an award when it is declared that in the case of a disregard for that which may have been done by either the council or the assembly shall of itself be deemed as an act of war against all members of the league? I can not see how anyone can justify his position by using the argument that neither the council nor the assembly has any power. I do not know by what mode of reasoning anyone can come to any other conclusion than that both the assembly and the council have almost plenary powers in the matter of settlements between members as well as between those who might not be members of the league. The authority and the powers of the council are authorized to the extent of recommending to the several governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

The other day I listened to a speech of the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and I heard the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], in questioning the statement of the Senator from Illinois as to what extent the burdens of military, naval, or air forces may be imposed upon the Government of the United States, state specifically that the expense would be borne in proportion or in accordance with the proportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union. I do not believe that any such provisions can be found in this covenant. That reference and provision which is found in section 6 has reference only to the expenses of the secretariat or to the expenses of the office of the secretary.

It would be not only possible, but probable, that in the case of a dispute which could not be settled under the provisions of article 12 or under article 15, that the United States would be assessed to the very extreme, and that the main burdens would fall upon our country both as to the men required to enter the war as well as the armaments required. So that the United States would become the pack horse for the Governments of Europe, Asia, and Africa; not only would we have to sacrifice our men in the settlement of these disputes, but we would have to pay the bills. I think that this language is so plain that it can be easily understood by anyone who can read either the French or the English language, or both, or who wants to understand it.

ARTICLE 17.

If this covenant has been written for the sole purpose of doing justice and promoting peace, why was it necessary to set up an autocratic standard such as is provided for in article 17, where it refers to a dispute between a member of the league and a State which is not a member of the league, or between States not members of the league? Why not use the same yardstick in the measuring of justice to be dealt out to all the nations of the earth if we are proceeding upon the theory that this measure is complete and replete in its provisions for its dealings not only with the members of the league, but in meting out justice and righteousness to humanity wherever it may be found?

Anyone who has seriously studied this measure from an unbiased and unprejudiced standpoint can not help but be convinced that it is autocratic in the extreme, and drastic in its provisions, and untold misery may be imposed upon the weaker nations under the domination of this supergovernment.

I am not going to take the time to analyze the provisions of every article of this covenant, but I want to briefly refer to article 21, which reads as follows:

Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

This, as has been so ably argued by those who are opposed to this treaty, is said to be intended to protect our Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine, as I understand it and as has been said, is not an international agreement; it is an American doctrine, promulgated and enforced by the American Government without any understanding whatsoever with any European, Asiatic, or African nation. It is wholly an American doctrine, and with which we want no European interference or agreement. I think that most any citizen who is capable of reading and writing the English language could have written a provision which would have more clearly interpreted the intent and the purpose of the Monroe doctrine.

ARTICLE 22.

Mr. President, this article was so well explained in a recent editorial in the Washington Post that I have taken the liberty of using that editorial. This article was there very ably analyzed. I ask that the editorial be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Monday, Oct. 20, 1919.]

DEFINING FUTURE OBLIGATIONS.

From the expressions of individual Senators on both sides of the Chamber and from the drift of the voting upon proposed amendments it is now quite certain that the outcome of the long discussion of the peace treaty will be ratification of the text without amendment in a resolution making such reservations as will thoroughly safeguard the vital interests, honor, and independence of the United States.

The reservations that have been tentatively agreed upon by a majority of the Senate will not only keep the United States safe, but will furnish such valuable suggestions to other nations as will cause them, without doubt, to make similar reservations. The result will be a league of nations incomparably better fitted for the maintenance of the world's peace than the league that would have been evolved from the covenant adopted at Paris. A simple illustration will emphasize this point. The reservation which will provide that Congress shall determine when and how this Government shall intervene in behalf of another nation under article 10 will be infinitely more potent than the original provision, because American intervention under the reservation will be made only in response to the combined will of the American people, constituting an action which no other nation, however ambitious or powerful, would care to resist. Without the reservation, however, the action of the United States might be merely a diplomatic move, similar to some of those made by the American delegates to the Paris conference, which might or might not earn the fear and respect of other powers.

The nature and effect of the reservations tacitly agreed upon are now well known and are generally believed to be adequate. We believe, however, another reservation should be made which heretofore has received little attention. This reservation should provide that no commitments or undertakings of any kind tending toward the acceptance by the United States of a mandate over any foreign territory or people should be valid without the express consent of Congress.

The truth is that the Senate is still in the dark concerning the matters dealt with in article 22 of the covenant. There are ambiguities and hidden meanings in this article which may be of immense consequence to the United States, not only in the dispatch of American troops to various parts of the world, but in the amicable relations of this Government with four other great powers. If there is anything in the covenant which the Senate and people should understand in every implication before committing themselves to it it is the article relating to mandatories. Yet almost nothing is known to the Senate, and absolutely nothing is known to the public. If there is nothing to know, as is sometimes asserted by advocates of the covenant, then the Senate should guard against future deadly surprises by providing that the United States shall not be committed in any way except by consent of Congress.

The little that is known by the Senate indicates that immediately upon ratification of the treaty the United States will be found to have incurred a "moral obligation"—a binding obligation, in other words—to send armed forces to pacify and govern the territory loosely described as "Armenia." This region is of indefinite boundaries, but is usually understood to be a portion of the late Turkish Empire, consisting of vilayets stretching from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean, between Anatolia and Persia, and inhabited largely by Armenians, but also by Kurds, Tartars, and other turbulent and uncivilized tribes. There is a mixture of races and religions in that backward region which makes for murders and wars as long as the population exists.

But the pacification of Armenia would be only one phase of difficulty. What about the disposition of Armenia after having taken over the mandate? How could the United States get rid of the country? It could not turn it adrift, nor could it turn it back to the league, which has no machinery for administering a colony. If it should attempt to turn it over to some other power a quarrel would almost surely ensue, such as now threatens the good relations of France, Italy, England, and Japan in various directions. On the other hand, the powers may take mandates over other regions, and administer them in a manner contrary to the interests of the United States, and in violation of the spirit of the covenant. In that case violent disputes might develop in spite of the efforts of the league council.

The inevitable tendency of article 22 is to embroil the United States in foreign quarrels. Therefore the Senate should make specific reservations concerning it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, on January 8, 1918, President Wilson made an address to the Congress of the United States, which, to my mind, is the most memorable of all the addresses made by the President during the war. In this address are embodied the so-called "14 points," and I might say that if the provisions of the proposed covenant were in accord with the principles laid down by the President at that time, this treaty would meet with my approval.

In this address, President Wilson lays down certain basic and fundamental principles without which no nation can long endure; at any rate, it is quite certain that no nation, great or small, can escape the horrors of war and other difficulties unless the basic principles laid down by the President are put into practice.

In this speech the President advocated the following:

1. Open covenants of peace openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

Mr. President, that sounds well to any citizen who is at all interested in the welfare of mankind, and had this declaration impressed itself upon the minds of the members of the peace conference, there would have been no condonation of the Shantung robbery committed by the military powers of Germany during the Boxer War. If the secret treaties which were perfected during this war had been taken into consideration, we would not be confronted to-day with a treaty which proposes to take from one of our friendliest and most loyal allies and give to another ally a portion of the territory of China taken from her at a time when the Chinese people were unable to defend themselves.

You say China is weak. Of course, she is weak in militarism and warfare. China has lived up to the doctrine of Confucius, whose teachings are still fresh in the memories of the Chinese people, whose dust still rests in the bosom of the earth in the K'une Cemetery outside of the city of K'uih-fow, and who, as we are told, in the fourth month of the year 478 B. C. passed away from among men.

Almost 24 centuries have passed since this sage and reformer died, and while dynasties have vanished and governments have crumbled the words of this great reformer still live, and tributes are paid to his memory as much so as we pay our tributes to the memory of the Father of his Country. Yet we are about to take from this peaceful race of people this hallowed ground where lie the remains of this wise and once powerful man who exercised his influence for the relief of his people and for the betterment of humanity. It was Confucius who said to his disciples, of which we are told he had more than 3,000, "Remember this, my children, oppressive government is fiercer and more to be feared than a tiger." This statement was made upon the occasion of meeting a woman who was weeping and wailing at a grave. The sage stopped and sent one of his followers to ask the reason of her grief. He was told that her husband's father and her husband and also her son were killed in this particular place by a tiger. Being asked why she did not leave so fatal a spot, where there was so much danger of being devoured by carniverous animals, what was her reply? She responded that there was no oppressive government at that place. She preferred to face those wild animals rather than to live in a country where the people were being oppressed.

Millions of Chinese people still worship the memory of this reformer, and as I have said, although it is almost 2,400 years since his remains were laid at rest, millions of Chinese people meet at least once a year upon this hallowed spot, there to worship in their own way their god and to pay a tribute to the memory of Confucius. Yet we are proposing to condone the wrong done in 1898 and approve the secret treaty made by Japan during the recent war when she threatened to overpower the Chinese people unless these concessions were made. We are now approving this robbery and this theft.

The Chinese are an honest and industrious class of people, most of whom live by cultivating the soil. They religiously follow the principle and doctrine of minding their own business. China is a peaceful nation. For centuries her people have been taught to believe and to practice the doctrines of peaceful relations with all the nations of the earth. Shall it now be said because the people of China believe in peace that she must be dismembered; that part of her most sacred territory shall be taken away from her people because she does not happen to be a military nation?

I may not be able to comprehend this philosophy, but to me it seems a cold-blooded, cruel, and wicked procedure. To take Shantung from China is a crime against the people of China; it is a violation of the fundamental laws of society; it is a crime against civilization and against the highest standards of morality. We can not afford at this time, or at any time, to take from this friendly ally this most valued portion of her territory and give it to her most dangerous opponent and enemy; and it shall not be done with my vote.

I am no more pro-Chinese than I am pro-Japanese, but it is not a question of whether we favor China or Japan; it is a question of doing even-handed justice, and this treaty will be but a rope of sand if enacted into law in its present form, with all its imperfections, with all its discriminations which will breed dissension and war, and can not promote the principles of peace.

Let me tell you that the Christian principles of peace can not be enforced with the cannon or the sword, or by the use of force or armaments of any kind; they can not be established and promoted without the principles of equality and justice. Yet we are asked to ratify this treaty in this form, when every proponent of it has admitted that to take Shantung from China is not in accordance with the principles of justice and morality. Most of those who are for the treaty have already admitted that it is a wrongful act.

The time to right this wrong is now; the time to correct this mistake is right now, and not at some future time.

I almost get impatient with men who have been sent here to represent 110,000,000 people standing upon this floor and arguing that we must not do anything which would have the effect of sending this document back for further consideration. I lose my patience with statesmen of that caliber. It might just as well be said that the men who represented the nations at the peace conference are superior to God Almighty. You have admitted that robberies and thefts have been committed; you are condoning those robberies and thefts when you say you do not want the treaty to go back with an amendment. What a pitiful exhibition when men of high character, representing more than a hundred million people, care more for the opinion of 40 men who sat at Versailles and who made this imperfect document than they do for right and justice.

There is not a Member of the Senate who will say that this is a perfect treaty; there is not one Senator on the floor who will dare to say to the American people that it has been framed upon the broad principles of humanity, of equality, and of justice; but "So saith the king," and we must follow him.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] with reference to the persecution of the people of Korea by the Japanese, and I would advise every minister of the gospel in this broad land to read the great speech made by the statesman from Nebraska, who stated that he did not belong to any church. He may not belong to any church, but from what I know about Christianity, God Almighty has implanted in his heart the fundamental ideas upon which Christianity is based, and I advise and ask you preachers and ministers of the gospel to read the speech of the Senator from Nebraska.

It is of very little use for any of us to lift our eyes to heaven, invoke the blessings and the power of God, and ask that something shall be done which we know is contrary to Christian and moral principles. It is worse than sacrilege to invoke the aid of an omnipotent God to do something which we ourselves have acknowledged to be wrong and unjust. By doing so we acknowledge that we have adopted the doctrine of Kaiser Bill, and our prayers will not be heeded or heard, but ignored, as his prayers were ignored.

Those who oppose this treaty are not only criticized but denominated as advocates of war and the enemies of peace. The opponents of this measure are also charged with stirring up race prejudices; they are called pro-German and friendly to Germany, as advocates of Bolshevism, and friends of the hyphenated Americans.

It must be clear to anyone who is a sincere lover of peace and a firm believer in the Christian faith that the criticism does not come from men who have been converted either to peace or to the Christian faith and religion. Anyone who is fully committed to a righteous plan must concede something to his enemies as well as to his friends. Anyone who is a lover of and a believer in the doctrines of peace must not discriminate against the Irish any more than the English, or against any nationality, not even the German people or citizens of German descent. If you do, you are proceeding upon a false doctrine, and your advocacy of a peace measure will be as impotent and as meaningless as were the prayers of the scribes and the Pharisees in the days of centuries ago.

To be consistent, we can not claim that we advocate peace and at the same time do the things which we know will provoke war. We are either in favor of peace or we are in favor of war. We can not serve two masters. We are either believers in the teachings of Christ or we are dissenters.

I find in St. Matthew, twenty-second chapter, beginning with the twenty-fourth verse, the following:

But when the Pharisees had heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence, they were gathered together. Then one of them, which was a lawyer—

It seems there were lawyers in those days, too. I am glad we have them now—asked Him a question, tempting Him, and saying, Master, which is the great commandment in the law?

Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

This is the first and great commandment and the second is like unto it. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

The question will naturally be raised, Who is our neighbor? According to the teachings of this same Christ, all men are our neighbors.

So I say I do not believe that many who have spoken so often and so eloquently in favor of this covenant are preaching the true gospel of Christ, nor the basic principles of the fundamental laws which promote peace.

The second paragraph of the President's 14 points reads:

Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

Will some Senator who may have given this treaty more careful study than I have point out any provision in this covenant or in the treaty which embodies this principle laid down by President Wilson, and which is conceded by us all to be of more than ordinary importance? This paragraph, like the first one, has either been forgotten or rejected.

In paragraph 4 the President touches upon one of the most fundamental principles absolutely necessary to the promotion of peace and the elimination of wars.

The fourth point, or paragraph 4, reads:

Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with the domestic safety.

The first paragraph of article 8 of the covenant provides:

The members of the league recognize that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

This is the only place in this proposed covenant where reference is made to the reduction of armaments.

In the President's fourteen points it is proposed that adequate guaranties shall be given that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety. In the covenant it is mentioned that the members of the league recognize that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations—quite a different proposition from that advocated by the President in his address on January 8, 1918.

Anyone having studied this covenant and who wishes to place an honest interpretation upon its provisions, must conclude that the questions which I have raised with reference to the President's fourteen points are not embodied in this covenant, and unless it shall be argued that all the President's addresses made during the war—the fourteen points included—shall ipso facto become a portion of the covenant or the treaty, you must admit that the humane principles advocated by the President have been overlooked or rejected.

There is one important matter which the peace conference overlooked, and that is the fundamental principles of Nature's God, which can not be violated.

Some four thousand years ago, when there was but one language in the world, and the earth was of one speech, the generations of Noah undertook to perpetuate this condition, and in order to do so they attempted on the plain in the land of Shinar to construct a great building in the form of a tower. Undoubtedly this was done with the very best of intentions, as it may be with the best of intentions that this league is advocated by its proponents, who profess that it will promote peace. The people of that day wanted to build a monument so high that it might reach unto heaven. They wanted to assume a certain name lest they be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth; but we are also told that the Lord came down to see the city and the tower which the children of men builded, and the Lord said—

Behold the people is one—

He recognized that they were one—and they have one language, and this they begin to do, and now nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do.

Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech.

So the language of these people was confounded so that they could not understand each other, and they were much confused; and ever since that day the people of this earth have been scattered upon the face of all the earth. It seems that some mighty power deemed it unwise to have but one people and one language, and so their language was confounded and the people were confused and scattered broadcast over the earth.

It is evident to me from the reading of the history of this event that this omnipotent power did not desire that man's individuality should forever be lost, and so the people were scattered, and many differing languages came into use, all for the purpose of establishing individualism among the family of man.

I think we all realize that a larger amount of good might be accomplished if all the people of the world would unite upon some altruistic and Utopian principle, but we also agree that such a thing is impossible, and that it would be just as bad for all the people to unite on something which in itself is destructive of that which is good, and so through this individualism man's power has been reduced to a minimum to accomplish that which is either good or bad.

There are hundreds, yes, thousands, of nationalities in the world to-day, and in my judgment it would be just as difficult and just as impossible to unite them all, as it was in the days when the people of Noah had in their minds the idea of constructing the Tower of Babel. So let us keep these nationalities separate, and let them work out their own form of government so long as they do not interfere with us and peoples of other governments.

This league consisting of a few men would be exactly what the men composing it would make it. If they should happen to be high-minded men, men of altruistic and Utopian ideas, the league might become a power for good. On the other hand, if its membership should happen to consist of weak and selfish men, the league would become just as powerful and effective in the administration and practice of injustice and oppression, and it might result in endless wars—wars which could not cease until this supergovernment was destroyed.

President Wilson, in one of his points, in speaking of all of the Russian territory and her people, lays down a principle which is fundamental not only to the people of Russia but to every nationality on the face of the globe.

VI. The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

The President's reference to the people of Russia might well apply to the people of Ireland, to the people of India, of Finland, or to any nationality that feels oppressed and is capable of setting up its own form of government, where people may enjoy to the fullest extent freedom and liberty. The inherent right of nationalities to set up their own form of government could easily be denied under the provisions of this covenant. Self-determination would become a forlorn hope, and this to me is one of the most objectionable features of this covenant.

Let us suppose that Ireland, whose population has been reduced since 1841 from more than 8,000,000 of people to nearly half that number, should insist on becoming a free and independent people. But you say it is none of our business to interfere with Ireland or with England, and I agree with you. We refuse to be bound by an international agreement setting up a superstate, and which establishes a principle of status quo in every kingdom and monarchy, and no matter how much oppression there might be, the people who are oppressed would have no right to protest, and could, of course, have no hope of becoming a free and independent people. I think we all agree to that. So I say that I agree with you that we should mind our own business and not interfere with the affairs of foreign nations unless it is for the purpose of assisting the weak and the oppressed.

Why should we in America with our 110,000,000 of people, a larger portion of which consists of a foreign population; when we take into consideration that from 1820 to 1918 more than 33,000,000 foreigners came to our shores and settled on American soil; more than 8,000,000 have come from Great Britain and Ireland, almost 3,500,000 from Russia, more than 4,000,000 from Italy, 500,000 from France, 5,500,000 from Germany, 2,250,000 from the Scandinavian countries, and since 1861 more than 4,000,000 have emigrated from Austria-Hungary, millions of people have come from a great many of the other nations, most of whom have come from Europe, a very few have come from Asia, less than 300,000 from China, and only a little more than 200,000 from Japan—with this condition, why do we wish to interfere with European affairs?

It is absolutely true that a large proportion of these aliens have become thoroughly Americanized; it is also true that nearly all, if not all of them, are loyal to America, but naturally they would have a more friendly feeling for the land of their birth than they would have for some other nation in Europe or in Asia. But, regardless of this fact, we undertake to meddle in the affairs of every nation on the face of the globe. For America to meddle in all European and Asiatic squabbles is unwise, and would lead to many an unnecessary conflict and war. The people of Ireland, like the people of Scandinavia, Great Britain, Germany, or France, who come here to make this their home, have sworn allegiance to our flag; they have manifested their willingness on many occasions to sacrifice their all for the honor of our flag and for the glory of our people.

No member of this body can more earnestly desire the adoption of a world plan that would stop wars and promote peace than I do, and while there may be great doubts as to the possibility of perfecting such a plan I most earnestly desire to help in any way that I can to arrive at some practical plan which will help to reduce standing armies and armaments to a minimum, so that instead of building up a military machine we may set up a more perfect plan, one in which all the people of the respective nations shall be the deciding factors whether or not we shall have another war.

To adopt this proposed covenant would be to give the lie to the principles for which we said we fought. We were told by the leaders of Great Britain, of France, of Italy, of Japan, as well as by the leaders of this Government, that this war was waged in the interest of humanity and democracy, in the interest of self-determination of oppressed people. How can we at this moment, before this horrible war has completely ended, before peace has been officially declared, how can we look any liberty-loving human being in the face and say that we are carrying out our pledges in good faith, when as a matter of fact this treaty provides for the creation of a superstate, of government by a very few? And while it may not be the purpose that it shall be autocratic and despotic, it surely must be conceded that there is a possibility, and a probability, that the administration of this supergovernment would become the most autocratic, and possibly the most despotic of any organization the world has ever known.

Mr. President, I was born on American soil, but my parents both came from the little Kingdom of Norway, and I am not ashamed of being a descendant of people of that splendid race. It is true that they are not rich in material wealth, but the people of that little kingdom compare favorably with the people of any other nation on the face of the earth in morality, in obedience to law, in education and in art, in music and in literature. It can not be truthfully said that the people of Norway consist of an inferior race. They love liberty and freedom more than their own lives. Ever since the dawn of civilization the Scandinavian people have been looked upon as a class of intelligent, intellectual, and law-abiding people, people who love liberty and justice, and who love peace.

I assume that none of you are interested in the history of the Scandinavian Peninsula, but I am going to outline briefly some of the historical events of the three little kingdoms, which are now separate, but which at one time composed one kingdom.

At one time the three Scandinavian Kingdoms were all under the administration of one government. There is very little difference in their language, their customs, and their ideals. The people of Denmark have the same language as the people of Norway, and the people of the three Kingdoms all fully understand the language of each other. So we may truly say that they are a homogenous people. They are people with the same habits, the same customs, the same love for liberty and justice. They all believe in religious liberty and they all belong to the same denomination.

Denmark's history dates back to the dim twilight of the Sagas, out of which shines the figures of her heroes, their brave deeds, as well as their daring voyages. I want you who are not ashamed of acknowledging that you are of Celtic descent to pay a little attention to this history, because I assure you it is correct. It was here that the Celts first had their home, and from these shores the Angles and the Saxons sailed in the fifth century to conquer England, and in their place the Danes of Zeeland, a little island north of Denmark, settled on the deserted lands.

We are told that the missionary Ansgar baptized a Danish king in the year 826, but even in that day, I am sorry to admit, Christianity did not hinder the Danes from making their usual inroads into the territory of the Franks or check the piratical voyages of the famous vikings. The islands were first united by Gorm the Old, one of the old viking pirates. At that time the mainland, under one ruler, opposed Christianity, but Gorm had a grandson named Canute who became the conqueror of England, who was a zealous friend of Christianity. But as time went on the nobles grew powerful by means of the adoption of the feudal system. In this country to-day we do not have the feudal system, but we have a system which in many ways is just as inimical to the best interests of American ideals and American Government as the feudal system was to the Danes and to the Scandinavians at that time. The nobles in those days took advantage of their fellowmen and ground down the once free people to mere serfs.

Waldemar I (1157–1182) conquered Norway, while Waldemar II conquered German and other lands, which were lost under his successors. Under the humane rule of that splendid queen, Marguerite, who ruled Denmark, Norway, and Sweden from 1375 until 1412, the three rival Scandinavian kingdoms lived together quietly and peaceably.

I have often been asked by the good ladies who champion the cause of votes for women why it was that the Scandinavian countries were in favor of woman suffrage. I have always told them that I wished they would not ask me that question, because it indicated to me that they had failed to read Scandinavian history.

But following the reign of Marguerite, Christian I—1448–1481—founded what is known as the Oldenberg line of kings, and these were maintained on the throne until 1863. But, mark you, up to this time the kings were chosen by the people; but Christian II, who ruled from 1513 to 1523, was such a tyrant that he lost his throne and his kingdom. He was recalled by the Danes, who chose his uncle, Frederick I, to be their king.

That is why people of Scandinavian descent have always been in favor of what you denominate radical laws, such as laws for the referendum and for the recall of men who do not carry out the wishes of the people who elected them. The Scandinavian people get that idea from the early history of their country.

At this time Sweden was forever separated from Denmark. From this time on, democracy lost its sway, the people lost their power, nobility was so firmly established that it became the controlling factor, and it was not until the early part of the eighteenth century that the peasants became free from serfdom and more liberal laws were enacted.

It is a peculiar coincidence, Mr. President, that nobility and democracy never travel the same road. They do not go together.

We find in 1801 that Copenhagen was bombarded by the British under Nelson, and the second bombardment took place in 1807, when the Danish people had to surrender. From 1807 to 1813 Denmark was in the hands of Napoleon. It was then that Denmark was forced to relinquish Norway, and from that time on Norway and Sweden became united.

I have very briefly, and I might say incoherently, recited this bit of history relating to the Scandinavian peninsula, not only for the purpose of paying a tribute to these peoples, but to show that even in a land where the people may be of the same race and the same religion, the same customs and the same ideals, differences will arise. The climatic conditions of these three little kingdoms differ, and the temperament of the people is not altogether the same. At any rate, the difference in the make-up of these people was sufficient to divide them into three separate and distinct classes, so that they became three separate independent governments.

If a league of nations such as is here proposed had been in existence during the struggles of these people, there would not be the tranquillity and the cemented friendship which now exists between these three nations, because it might have been impossible for them to separate.

The Scandinavian people are not a cowardly people, neither do they love war, as was shown in 1905, when, on the 7th day of June, Norway declared its independence from Sweden, and became a separate kingdom, ruled by one king; and all this was done without shedding a single drop of blood. Sweden, who at that time had more than twice and almost three times as many people as Norway, yielded.

But it was not altogether because these people differed somewhat temperamentally that strifes and wars were carried on between these peoples of practically the same kin and blood. The real issue causing the troubles was of an economic nature. For almost a century the people of Norway protested against the injustice of refusing them their own consuls, of being able to do their business in their own way. All exports and imports had to be sent through the consulate of Sweden, and very naturally the people of Norway were unwilling to pay into the treasury of Sweden an extra profit. They demanded the right to appoint their own consuls and to transact their own business.

Now, those of you who find fault with the people of Ireland because they are protesting against British rule, let me say to you that the condition which existed between Norway and Sweden also exists between England and Ireland. I can find no fault with the people of Ireland for protesting against the injustice of compelling Ireland to conduct her national business through the consulate of Great Britain. Ireland has more people and is larger in area than many of the small nations of Europe. It has a larger population than Norway, Denmark, and Switzerland; it has a larger area than Belgium, Holland, Denmark, and Switzerland. Ireland has an area of 32,531 square miles, and claims a population of 4,392,219.

Mr. President, I said at the outset of my remarks that I have no hatred for any European people. I respect the people of one nationality as much as those of another, but let me call attention to the fact that Ireland, which has an area of little more than 32,000 square miles, and which has slightly more than 4,000,000 people, did a business last year of more than $820,000,000, and more than 95 per cent of that was done with England, only 5 per cent of it being done outside of England. Serbia did a business of $47,500,000; Greece, $61,500,000; Bulgaria, $75,000,000; Portugal, $115,000,000 Roumania, $205,000,000; Norway, $210,000,000; Denmark, $325,000,000; Sweden, $375,000,000.

Mr. President, I hold no brief for the Irish people, and I would not even mention or refer to the business of any nationality were it not for the fact that you are compelling us to go into partnership with these people, you are compelling us to take in as an equal partner Great Britain, with her six votes, and you are satisfied with but one vote. Is that satisfactory to you? You will also receive the blessing that will come in the course of time. Do not expect that any curses will come, because we have reached that Utopian stage where we are perfect and we can not commit any wrong, of course. It would be sacrilegious to say that people from now on will never commit any wrong, and I am not here to make that definite statement.

I repeat what I have just stated, that Sweden yielded to the demands of the people of Norway without resorting to war. The Swedish people did not surrender because they were a cowardly people. The noble and humane King Oscar, a philosopher as well as a great statesman, who loved peace more than war, knew too well the history of his country; the history of the great Gustavus Adolphus and that of Charles XII, as well as he knew the history of his own administration. He knew that Gustavus Adolphus, who reigned from 1611 to 1632, became famous, and was adorned by one of the great writers as the father of Swedish poetry and as a man who loved humanity, and that Charles XII was among the great generals and military leaders of his day, and I say that he is to-day recognized by students of history as one of the greatest leaders and greatest generals.

He knew what happened to Stockholm when invaded by the Danes in 1389, and what happened when captured by Christian of Denmark in 1520, when the terrible massacre followed, known as the "blood bath of Stockholm." He had studied the warlike career of the gifted but reckless King Charles XII, who reigned from 1697 to 1718, who humbled Frederick IV of Denmark; and Peter the Great of Russia who defeated Augustus of Poland and nearly ruined his country. No greater general can be found in the annals of history than Charles XII, but King Oscar had more love for peace and humanity than he had for fame and war, and so he yielded to the demands of the ministers of the cabinet of Norway, and on that historic day, June 7, 1905, Norway, like Sweden, became a free, independent Government.

To my mind, this beautiful lesson taught us by this great King should be printed in our textbooks and taught the children in our schools.

There are only two roads to follow: Either follow the military road to war, or follow the road to peace and prosperity.

King Oscar was a real lover of peace; he was a humanitarian; he laid down and followed the Golden Rule as announced by the Master in His Sermon on the Mount.

I call the attention of some of these advocates who are so earnest in their prayer for the adoption of these provisions without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i" that none of these things must be written in the textbook which the children of to-day read. Those men advocate militarism and war. I have listened to them upon many occasions. The two do not go together; you may be sure of that. You can not harmonize them. They will not mix any more than water will mix with oil. You are either for militarism and war or you are for peace. You can not be for both. Just remember that.

Charles XII, on the other hand, chose to follow his inclination as a military genius. He humiliated monarchs, destroyed governments, and captured armies, but ultimately he failed as others have failed, and as others will fail who choose the method of murder and destruction rather than the path of righteousness and peace.

On the question of peace and war there can only be two classes; and to be consistent we must either recognize the necessity of a military government or we must follow in the path of the noble King of Sweden, and promote peace by righteous and just dealings rather than to enforce peace by the sword.

This proposed treaty provides for the enforcement of peace by force, by the sword, by waging war, and it takes from the peoples of every nation on the face of the globe the right to have a voice in the matter. So in this matter, so important to the welfare of the human family, you are setting up a supergovernment ruled by what we hope may be a few benevolent despots; but, if we miss our guess, so that instead of directing their energies in the interest of benevolence, justice, and peace, if they desire to become autocrats, there is absolutely nothing to prevent them from becoming the greatest tyrants the world has ever known; and yet you call this a league to establish peace.

Perhaps I am unable to understand the meaning of the words which this covenant and this treaty contain; but understanding it as I do to be a breeder of troubles and war and not a covenant for the promotion of peace, I must follow the dictates of my own conscience; and believing as I do that some of the provisions of this covenant are in direct contravention of the Constitution, I must again follow the dictates of my own conscience, as I do not want to violate the oath to which I have subscribed to "support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic," to "bear true faith and allegiance to the same," to "take this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion," and to "well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office."

I have spoken of the early history, and referred to the traditions of the Scandinavian people, simply for the purpose of illustrating how difficult it is for peoples who differ temperamentally, although they may be of the same race and the same religion, to agree on all issues without dissension and troubles which may lead to war. You may then ask, Why is not this true of America? Happily, it does not apply to America, because every man who comes to America for the purpose of becoming one of its citizens relinquishes all that which may be inimical to American citizenship, and he becomes a full-fledged American. Let me say right here that any man who asks for citizenship in any other way is not worthy of the splendid opportunity of becoming a citizen of this great land—"the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Any man of foreign birth who is not willing to subscribe to that oath, and to live up to it, is not worthy of citizenship in this country. Now, think you, because I have spoken feelingly and friendly of the people whose descendant I am, that I would yield any of America's sovereignty in the interest of the peoples of that land? If you do, you are sadly mistaken.

I heard the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] say a few days ago, with reference to the great Irish race, that rather than to yield American rights or American sovereignty he would prefer to see that splendid country sink into the sea than to do anything which would interfere with their citizenship or take from us our rights or our sovereignty. I confess that this is my feeling with reference to the land from whence my people came. I hope and believe that the time will never come that these people will ask America or ask American citizens to surrender American sovereignty or to disobey American laws and dishonor the American flag. I hope and believe that such shall never happen, but if it should, with me America is first and America last. The Stars and Stripes is my only banner, and I shall protect that banner wherever it may be found against any and all enemies, no matter what the cost may be. I shall as cheerfully give up life itself, as I would be willing to part with and give up what little treasure I might possess, in the defense of this unsullied emblem and in the defense of the United States of America.

We have been told that we should hate our late enemies. A big man will hate and resent insults, and he will also fight when he has to fight, but when he sees before him his conquered foe prostrate and helpless, begging for mercy, and promising to make reparation so far as he is able to make it, the victor's hate is transformed into a spirit of commiseration and sympathy, and while still firm in his demands for justice from his conquered foe, he turns his face to the future and demands from his opponent only a just and equitable settlement, and if such agreement is carried out, the parties to the combat again become friends.

It is the small man with a small mind who loves to hate and continually quarrels and fights.

We hated the English during the Revolutionary War; we hated them in 1812, when they stopped our ships and kidnapped our sailors; and we especially hated them when Admiral Cockburn, on August 24, 1814, seated himself in the Speaker's chair in this Capitol and asked his fellow Englishmen, "Shall this harbor of Yankee democracy be burned? All for it will say "aye.'" And a general shout of ayes settled the question. The torch was applied not only to this Capitol Building, but to the President's house and other public buildings.

But we do not now hate the British people; we have long ago forgiven them for this wrongful act. We have years ago turned that hate into amity and friendship. A really civilized man never continues to hate his opponent if that opponent makes an effort to correct his mistakes. It is the uncivilized, heathen barbarian who continually hates, and, like Satan himself, never loves anybody or anything, but always hates.

We hated the Germans during this war. It was only natural for us to do so. They were killing our soldiers and destroying our property whenever the opportunity afforded. We still hate and we always shall hate their wrongdoings, but we shall not always continue to hate the German people any more than our hatred continued for the British people. It was the unlawful acts of the British which we hated; it is the unlawful acts and the wrongdoing of the Germans that we hate and which we shall always hate.

The German autocracy and the German Government have been destroyed; the German people must now see to it that a real representative form of government is established. The German people must accept the inevitable. The burdens placed upon them by their autocratic and military government must be patiently endured by the German people. Militarism destroyed Germany; it was not the people of Germany who destroyed it.

Mr. President, I realize that accompanying all wars waged by the sword is an intellectual warfare where great minds, like great armies, clash, and where the one does its best to outdo the other. Yes, greater even than the clash of swords is the opposition of great minds, more confusing even than the roar of guns, and ultimately more effective than explosive shells is the mass of skilled and ingenious arguments. The cannon is fired and the roar and detonation soon subsides, but the words spoken here in the Senate and recorded in the RECORD, and the thoughts which they clothe, go much further than any cannon shot, and while their effects may not be apparent to all, they surely will in time to come become an instrumentality in fashioning governments, and if the arguments used and the words spoken are wrong and misleading, they are more destructive of liberty and freedom and human welfare than the shells fired are to the soldiers upon the field of battle.

A year has passed since the armistice was signed, yet we are facing an intellectual warfare as fierce, desperate, cruel, cunning, and unrelenting as the bayonet assaults in the trenches.

CONCLUSION.

We say the war is over; we are not complaining so much about our expended treasure which reached such an enormous amount during this horrible conflict; we are willing to share the burden of taxation if the principles for which we said we fought are put into operation throughout the world.

Our soldier boys who crossed the sea to fight on the fields of Europe in the greatest and most destructive war in the annals of history, and who through the providence of God have returned to their homeland, are not complaining that they went and fought and suffered; their sacrifices were great, but if the principles for which they so gallantly fought are put into practice, they will not complain. But what shall we say of those who have not returned, and who never will return to see their loved ones? What shall we say of the fifty thousand or more whose lives were snuffed out on the battle fields of France? They have sacrificed their all for the United States of America. How can we pay a fitting tribute to their memory and commemorate their deeds and achievements? If they were here, and if this covenant and treaty were left with them, what would they do? Are we not safe in believing that the first thing they would do would be to safeguard America and American interests? Are we paying a tribute to the honor of their memory unless we really live up to the fundamental principles for which they fought? What a beautiful and unselfish example these heroes, the living and the dead, have furnished, having fought on the battle fields of a foreign land to make men throughout the world free, but first of all to honor and protect the United States of America.

Believing that these were the uppermost thoughts in the American soldiers' minds, should we not with the greatest reverence and respect carry out the principles for which they all fought and for which so many sacrificed their precious blood? What shall we say to the 50,000 mothers and fathers, and to the thousands of brothers and sisters and widowed mothers, to the widows, sons, and daughters of the heroes who have sacrificed their all? These men who gave up their lives to protect our land from a foreign foe would at least expect that this great Government of ours shall in a more substantial way than by mere words of praise assist the parents, the widows, and the orphans who need assistance. Can we do less than to aid substantially those who are financially oppressed because they have lost those upon whom they depended for support? Thousands of these heroes now rest in unmarked graves. To be remembered they need no costly monuments; their deeds will always be fresh in the minds and memories of their relatives and friends.

If we believe that these heroes made this great sacrifice for any other purpose than that I have named; if we believe that the acquisition of territory, the changing of the boundary lines of the nations of Europe or elsewhere, or guaranteeing the territorial integrity of all the nations of the earth were the principles for which these men fought, we may vote for this proposed covenant. But if we believe that first and foremost they fought for our nationality, for the protection of America, for the liberation and freedom of oppressed peoples, no matter where found, then surely we can not support this covenant in its present form.

Wednesday, April 4, 1917.

[The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, had under consideration the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and the people of the United States, and making provision to prosecute the same.]

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I had intended to take some time in calling to the attention of the Senate and the country some of the things which happened during the closing hours of the last Congress, and also, with reference to the European war, some of the facts which I believe have been overlooked or which have not been disclosed so far as I know. But after listening to the speeches of some of my colleagues, and especially to the wise and patriotic words of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. Stone], I have concluded to occupy only a few minutes, because I agree with what the Senator from Missouri has said—that we ought not at this time to enter into any controversy among ourselves. I shall, therefore, waste neither time nor words; but the question of peace or war is so momentous a question and so serious that I feel that I would not do my full duty should I remain silent. This resolution declaring war is too grave a question to be decided passionately.

Senators, we are intrusted with and are holding the power vested in 100,000,000 of American people. I would, therefore, agree that we proceed to argue this question impassionately, in a friendly spirit; not in a light spirit, nor with minds clouded by passion.

The members of this Congress and the President of the United States are holding in their hands the destiny of 100,000,000 of people. May God give us wisdom and strength to discharge the responsibility with which we have been intrusted, in obedience to Christian principles, rights, and justice.

Senators, I do not presume to point out to any one of you the course you should pursue. Each one of us must take this momentous problem into the judgment chamber of our own hearts and decide it according to our own judgment and the dictation of our own conscience. Those of you who have made up your minds to plunge this country into a bloody war have no right to criticize any one who sincerely and patriotically believes in peace. Those of you who believe that the only way in which we can protect our national honor is to declare war, and in that way manifest your patriotism, I ask you in all sincerity, Have you reckoned the cost of the dreadful conflict that will ensue?

I shall not now argue whether the majority of the American people desire war. No man knows, without first submitting it to a vote of the American people, what their decision might be. The American people will not have that opportunity. But while I believe that the majority of the American people are for peace, I can not with any certainty assert that it is so. I do know, however, the sentiment of the people of my own State, and I do assert that a very small minority are in favor of war. We criticize European monarchies for forcing their subjects into war against their will, but we refuse to ascertain by a referendum vote of the American people whether they desire peace or war.

Mr. President, this is a fateful hour, and the Senate is about to decide one of the most momentous problems in the history of our country. Let me remind the Senate that we are not the Government; let me remind you that Congress is not the Government; let me remind you that the President of the United States is not the Government; but the 100,000,000 of people are the sovereign power of this country. Why do we refuse to submit for their decision a question so important to the future welfare of our people? Why do we ignore their petitions, which we have by the hundreds of thousands, asking us to avert war? Why do we ignore the pleadings and the petitions of the millions of mothers of this country, whose hearts are bleeding in sadness and whose minds are disturbed over the possible loss of lives dear to them and the future welfare of their beloved ones?

Mr. President, I have before me the petitions of thousands of patriotic American citizens asking me to oppose a declaration of war with any of the nations of Europe. Shall I regard their pleading prayers as noisy clamor or shall I respect their constitutional right of petition? This question will not be decided until it is decided right. It will not meet with the approval of the American people unless it is based upon the principles of right, justice, and equality.

Mr. President, the European countries are to-day regretting that they precipitated a war. Their people are sick to death and are wishing that they could find a way to end it. Selfishness was the cause of beginning this cruel and bloody war in Europe; false national pride prevents the ending of it.

Mr. President, speaking for the people whom I in part represent, we are as jealous of our national honor as any loyal American can possibly be. We are as devoted to the flag and would as quickly resent any insult as would those who are now clamoring for war. But we believe, sir, that there is a possibility of averting war without the killing of the millions of our youth and the sacrifice of our national honor.

I shall therefore vote against this resolution declaring war against the Imperial Government of Germany. I would under similar circumstances vote against war with any of the nations of Europe. I shall vote against war because I believe it would have been possible to maintain an honorable peace with all the nations of the earth. While I believe it will be a tremendous mistake and an unpardonable blunder and error to plunge our country into war at a time when we ought to be at peace with all the nations of the earth, if war shall be declared—as I fear it will be—there will be but one course for every loyal American citizen to pursue, and that course will be to do our full duty in defense of our flag.

Mr. President, I am opposed to war because war means destruction, misery, and poverty to the toiling millions of our country for generations to come; but if it shall come I shall do my full duty.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the amendments proposed to give the United States equal representation in the council and in the assembly of the proposed league of nations with the British Empire and five of its dominions and colonies or political divisions, or to reduce the representation of the British Empire to the equality of the other members of those bodies, are now before the Senate; and I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate some facts which I think are important and should be considered in the disposition of these amendments and to make some observations upon them.

Mr. President, the British Empire, by the express provisions of the proposed league of nations, is one of the five permanent members of the council of the league with one vote in all its decisions, and the Empire, in its sovereign and collective capacity, and five of its overseas dominions or colonies—Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Union of South Africa, and India—integral parts of the Empire, are made members of the assembly with the right to one vote and to be represented by three delegates each in the assembly of the league, thus giving to the Empire 6 votes and 18 delegates in that body.

The United States, France, Italy, and Japan are also made permanent members of the council with one vote each, and members of the assembly with the right, respectively, to three delegates and one vote.

Those Governments, not members of the council, 27 in number, original members of the league of nations and those who may hereafter become members, are allowed three delegates and one vote each, and any of them has the potential possibility of being elected to become one of the four temporary members of the council subject to removal. They are also eligible to permanent and temporary membership if increased in number.

That this is a correct statement of the original organization of the proposed league of nations can not be controverted, and I do not understand that it is now denied by anyone who understands the terms of the covenant.

There was a controversy as to whether or not Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Union of South Africa, and India could be elected to membership in the council; but this was abandoned, as I understand, when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], in a recent address, read the letter of President Wilson, M. Clemenceau, and Mr. Lloyd-George to the premier of the Dominion of Canada.

That there may be no mistake as to the contents of that letter I will reread it:

> The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council. We have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view. If there were any doubt it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles are not subject to a narrow or technical construction.

Mr. President, the proposition has been advanced that, notwithstanding the British Empire and five of its subordinate political divisions are given this preponderance of power over any one nation in the assembly and the possibility of further representation in the council, the United States and perhaps other members of the league have no grounds to fear that their rights and interests will be prejudiced in the deliberations and decisions of the council or the assembly, that there is no assurance that the subordinate divisions or governments of the British Empire will always favor the Imperial Government in its contentions, and that we could reasonably expect them, especially Canada, to side with the United States.

There never was, in my opinion, a more groundless suggestion. While the British Empire is geographically and physically widely separated, its dominions lying in both the Eastern and Western Hemispheres, in the Continents of Europe, Asia, Africa, and North and South America, and innumerable islands in the Atlantic, Pacific, Indian, Arctic, and Antarctic Oceans, and the Mediterranean and Caribbean Seas, it is politically the most thoroughly organized, united, and compact Government whose existence history records.

The Imperial Government dominating all these far-flung dominions is styled "The Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," and has its seat and capital at London, England. It is composed of England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, the Isle of Man, and the islands lying adjacent in the British and Irish Channels and the North Sea.

The chief executive of the Empire at this time is George V, whose title as conferred by Parliament is "George V, by the Grace of God, King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India." His imperial office is hereditary and his government a limited monarchy.

The supreme legislative power of the Empire is vested in a Parliament, sitting at London, composed of the House of Lords, whose offices are hereditary, and a House of Commons, the members of which are elected by the people of Great Britain and Ireland.

Canada, Australia, Union of South Africa, New Zealand, and India are overseas dominions, and the most important of the Empire in wealth and population. These and the other dependencies of the Empire enjoy a limited local self-government, granted them in the form of charters or patents, as they are styled, by the King and Parliament of Great Britain, and subject to amendment and repeal by the granting power.

The chief executives of Canada and New Zealand, Australia, and Union of South Africa are styled governors general; and that of India, governor general or viceroy. They are appointed by the King and Emperor, with the advice and assistance of his ministers, with tenure of office subject to his will or for brief terms of years. They are the representatives of the King and Emperor, and derive all of their authority from him, and act in his name and for him. They have no other authority than that conferred upon them by the King and the acts of the British Parliament.

These political divisions have parliaments, which may enact laws for their government in regard to local concerns and affairs as authorized and empowered in the acts of the British Parliament providing for them, consisting of an upper and a lower house; the members of the first being in part, at least, appointed by the King through his representative, the governor general, and those of the latter elected by the people of the colony or dominion. There is also a well-organized judicial system for each of the local governments, with broad jurisdiction and powers. The King has the veto power upon much of the legislation; and appeals, with some limitations, lie from the courts of last resort to the King in council in England.

These local governments are largely self-governing in local affairs, but not so much as the several States of the United States in many particulars.

The colonies and dominions of the Kingdom of Great Britain are subordinate political divisions and dependencies of the Empire.

The Commonwealths and States composing the United States are sovereign and independent governments, save in Federal affairs as fixed by the Constitution.

The chief executives of the dominions and colonies are appointed by the King and Emperor, and are responsible to him, and not to the people.

The governors of the States are elected by their people, and responsible alone to them.

The legislative power is vested in the general assemblies of the States, elected by the people, and the power vested in them, when not involving a Federal matter, is unlimited, save by their local constitutions, which they have the power to amend or abrogate at pleasure.

The Federal Government has no control over these matters.

There is no appeal from their courts of last resort, except in questions involving the Constitution and laws of the Federal Government.

The governors general, members of Parliament, and other officials of the colonies and dominions owe and swear allegiance to their King.

The governors and other officials of the several States swear to support the constitutions of their States in State matters and the Constitution of the United States in Federal matters.

I make this comparison that the political corporate entity of the dominions and colonies and their want of that independent sovereignty necessary to constitute an independent nation entitled under the laws of nations to absolute equality with the other nations of the world in national affairs may fully appear, and that the incongruity—yes, the injustice—of giving these colonies and dominions a position and membership in the league of nations equal to the United States may be clear beyond question.

The acts of the Parliament of Great Britain granting the charters and patents of local self-government to the dominions and colonies are too voluminous for me to read them in full.

"The British North America act," applicable to the Dominion of Canada, was enacted in 1867 (30 and 31 Victoria) and amended in 1871 (34 Victoria) and 1875 (39 Victoria).

The act applicable to Australia was enacted in 1900 (63 and 64 Victoria).

The act for New Zealand was enacted in 1852 (15 and 16 Victoria), supplemented by an order in council made September 9, 1907.

The South African act for the Union of South Africa was passed in 1909 (9 Edward VII).

The present form of the government of the Indian Empire was established by various acts of the British Parliament, consolidated in the Government of India act, 1915 (5 and 6 George V).

Those who desire to examine them can do so, and I think they will find my statement substantially correct.

I will, however, read from Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies, by Alpheus Todd, LL. D., C. M. G., author of Parliamentary Government in England, a recognized authority upon British colonial government.

I read concerning the general authority of the Imperial Government over its colonies from pages 29, 39, 40:

The mother country, however, still retains the right to interpose—either by advice, remonstrance, or, if need be, by active measures of control—whenever the powers of self-government are attempted to be exercised by any colony in an unlawful, unconstitutional, or oppressive manner. "The whole question of the relations of the imperial authority to the representative colonies is one of great difficulty and delicacy. It requires consummate prudence and statesmanship to reconcile the metropolitan supremacy with the worthy spirit of colonial independence. As a matter of abstract right, the mother country has never parted with the claim of ultimate, supreme authority for the imperial legislature. If it did so, it would dissolve the imperial tie and convert the colonies into foreign and independent states."

Throughout the British Empire—even in colonies where self-government has been conceded to the fullest extent compatible with the maintenance of imperial supremacy—there is a reservation of the paramount authority of Parliament, and of the right of every British subject, to appeal to that tribunal. But while the ultimate control, alike over colonial and imperial administration, is vested by the constitution in the Imperial Parliament, which is at all times ready to listen to complaints of an undue exercise of power on the part of any minister of the Crown, that supreme authority may be constitutionally invoked only in extreme cases, and enforced only when it is indispensably necessary to maintain the integrity of the Empire.

Moreover, certain prerogatives of the Crown are suitably reserved in every colony to the direct and immediate expression of the royal pleasure thereon. The powers so reserved differ according to the position and circumstances of the particular colony, but they invariably include the abstract right of dealing with all colonial legislation, and of disallowing such acts as may be deemed objectionable or in direct opposition to imperial policy. Sometimes colonial laws which, for defect in form or substance, might otherwise need to be disallowed, are remitted to the colony wherein they were enacted, accompanied by a dispatch from the secretary of state for the colonies, suggesting their modification or repeal. The judicial prerogative of the Crown or the right of determining in the last resort all controversies between subjects in every part of the empire, has been universally reserved as being one of the most stable safeguards, and most beneficial acts of sovereign power.

Concerning the power of the King and Emperor through his representative, the governor general, I read from pages 34, 35, 36, and 37:

In every British colony of adequate extent and importance the personal authority of the Crown is represented and monarchial functions discharged by a governor, who is nominated to his office by the sovereign in council and appointed by letters patent under the great seal; his jurisdiction and powers being defined by the terms of his commission, and by the royal instructions which accompany the same.

A governor so appointed is empowered by his commission "to do and execute all things that shall belong" to his office and be appropriate to the trust confided to him by the royal instructions, then or afterwards to be communicated to him through one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, who is the constitutional mouthpiece of the Crown.

He is authorized to exercise the lawful powers and prerogatives of the Crown in assembling, proroguing, and dissolving the colonial parliament; to give or withhold the royal assent to bills passed by the parliament; or to reserve them for the signification of the royal pleasure, pursuant to his instructions from the Crown. He is empowered to appoint to office all ministers of state and other public officers in the colony, and upon sufficient cause to suspend or remove them from office. He is authorized, under certain restrictions, to administer the prerogative of mercy, by the reprieve or pardon of criminal offenders within his jurisdiction; and to remit fines and penalties due to the Crown. All moneys to be expended for the public service are issued from the treasury under the governor's warrant. And furthermore it is expressly declared that "if anything should happen which may be for the advantage or security of the colony, and is not provided for in the governor's commission and instructions, he may take order for the present therein."

It is true that the governor of a colony is not a viceroy and that unlimited sovereign authority is not delegated to him. He can not exercise all the prerogatives of the Crown, but only such as are expressly or impliedly included within the scope of his commission. The lawful extent of a governor's powers has in repeated instances been ascertained and determined by courts of law. Nevertheless, there is a general devolution to every colonial governor of so much of the authority of the Crown as may be necessary for the purpose of administering the government of the colony over which he is placed by the sovereign, whose office and authority he represents. Pursuant to his commission and the accompanying instructions he becomes within the limits assigned to him the embodiment and expression of the monarchial element in the colonial polity, so far as that element can find a constitutional channel for its exercise under parliamentary government. The office of governor is as much a constituent part of the constitution in every colony as is that of either of the other branches of the local legislature. A constitutional governor is not merely the source and warrant of all executive authority within his jurisdiction; he is also the pledge and safeguard against all abuse of power, by whomsoever it may be proposed or manifested; and to this end he is intrusted with the maintenance of certain rights and the performance of certain duties which are essential to the welfare of the whole community. And while he may not encroach upon the rights and privileges of other portions of the body politic, he is equally bound to preserve inviolate those which appertain to his own office, for they are a trust which he holds in the name and on the behalf of the Crown for the benefit of the people.

Should a governor exceed his rightful powers or commit any act to which exception could be justly taken, an appeal is always open to the sovereign, through the secretary of state, and to the Imperial Parliament, which is the grand inquest of the nation for the redress of all grievances.

And from pages 155 and 156, under the head "Imperial dominion exercisable over self-governing colonies in matters of local legislation":

The right of the Crown, as the supreme executive authority of the Empire, to control all legislation which is enacted in the name of the crown in any part of the Queen's dominions is self-evident and unquestionable.

In the mother country the personal and direct exercise of this prerogative has fallen into disuse. But eminent statesmen, irrespective of party, and who represent the ideas of our own day, have concurred in asserting that "it is a fundamental error to suppose that the power of the Crown to reject laws has consequently ceased to exist." The authority of the Crown, as a constituent part of the legislative body, still remains, although since the establishment of parliamentary government the prerogative has been constitutionally exercised in a different way.

But, in respect to the colonies, the royal veto upon legislation has always been an active and not a dormant power. The reason of this is obvious. A colony is but a part of the Empire, occupying a subordinate position in the realm. No colonial legislative body is competent to pass a law which is at variance with, or repugnant to, any imperial statute which extends, in its operation, to the particular colony. Neither may a colonial legislature exceed the bounds of its assigned jurisdiction or limited powers. Should such an excess of authority be assumed, it becomes the duty of the Crown to veto, or disallow, the illegal or unconstitutional enactment. This duty should be fulfilled by the Crown without reference to the conclusions arrived at, in respect to the legality of a particular enactment, by any legal tribunal. It would be no adequate protection to the public against erroneous and unlawful legislation on the part of a colonial legislature that a decision of a court of law had pronounced the same to be ultra vires. An appeal might be taken against this decision and the question carried to a higher court. Pending its ultimate determination the public interests might suffer. Therefore, whenever it is clear to the advisers of the Crown that there has been an unlawful exercise of power by a legislative body, it becomes their duty to recommend that the royal prerogative should be invoked to annul the same.

The Crown, moreover, is the chief executive authority of the Empire, and the instrument for giving effect to the national will, as the same has been embodied in acts of the Imperial Parliament, or sanctioned by Parliament, upon the advice of responsible ministers. It is the proper function of the Crown, therefore, to uphold and enforce the national policy throughout the realm, save only in so far as rights of local self-government may have been conceded to any portion thereof.

This is said of the supreme judicial power retained and exercised over the colonies, page 301:

Legislation by the Imperial Parliament, as has been already pointed out, is not subject to be reviewed and annulled by any court of law within the realm. Parliament itself, in its collective capacity, is the highest court in the Kingdom, and is necessarily the supreme judge of the proper limits of its own jurisdiction and powers; and it is not either constitutional or lawful for an inferior court to question the propriety or the discretion of any act done or passed by the Imperial Parliament.

Within the limits of every colony or Province having representative institutions the local legislature is invested with a similar supreme authority and jurisdiction, subject, of course, to the discretion of the Crown in assenting to or disallowing colonial enactments; and subject, moreover, to the determination of the question, whether the legislature has exceeded its competency and the lawful bounds of its prescribed powers on any given occasion. For the powers of every colonial legislature—in contradistinction to those of the Imperial Parliament—are defined and limited, and are practically prescribed by a constitution which is written.

And on page 305 it is said:

The sovereign, as the fountain of justice, is constitutionally empowered to receive petitions and appeals from all her colonies and possessions abroad upon whatever regulations and conditions may be defined and imposed by the authority of the Crown in council.

Such petitions or appeals are referred to the consideration either of the judicial committee of the privy council or of some other committee of that body, upon whose report the decision of the sovereign is pronounced. The reference may be made either upon an appeal from an inferior colonial court or on a petition or claim of right or on a petition praying for the redress of a grievance that is not within the prescribed jurisdiction of other courts or departments of state, but which the Crown is willing to entertain. It is not the duty of the governor of a colony to transmit to the secretary of state an application of this description from parties in a private suit, but the same should be brought before the lords of the council by a professional agent in the customary way.

The King of Great Britain, under the unwritten constitution and form of government of that Kingdom, has for centuries exercised the absolute power to declare war, make peace, and negotiate and ratify treaties with foreign nations. The power over all foreign relations is vested in him and is one of the exclusive prerogatives of the Crown.

There has been of late years a number of treaties submitted to the Parliament for its approval, but this was a concession upon the part of the King and not a right which the Parliament could demand. The acts of Parliament, which constitute the organic law of the self-governing dominions and colonies, do not undertake to interfere with this prerogative of the Crown or to confer any jurisdiction over foreign relations upon these dependencies.

There seems to be no controversy but what they are bound in all such matters by the Imperial Government, and can only take such part in negotiating treaties applicable to the particular dominion or colony as the King may consent and authorize, and as his representatives.

I desire to read from the same authority from which I have quoted upon this subject, page 41:

Finally, all questions which involve the relations of British dependencies, and consequently of the United Kingdom itself, with foreign States—the formation of treaties and alliances; the naturalization of aliens; the declaration of war or peace, and, by consequence, all regulations affecting the disposition or control of imperial military forces—are invariably, and for obvious reasons, reserved for the direction and control of the parent State.

And, again, on page 388, it is said:

In affairs of peace and war, which are essentially of Imperial concern, the supremacy of the Crown must be everywhere maintained inviolate. The governor in every colony is the representative of the sovereign in the administration of this prerogative; but he himself must be careful that he acts in such matters in obedience to his instructions from Her Majesty's Government. For example, upon the breaking out of hostilities between Russia and Turkey, in 1877, the secretary of state for the colonies addressed a circular dispatch to governors, with rules for the guidance of colonies in the observance of neutrality toward the belligerent powers.

Mr. President, it has been said that the demand for representation in the league of nations by these dominions and colonies came from them and that the British Empire did not really favor it. Whatever the representatives of the empire may have said upon the subject, I can not believe that they looked with disfavor upon the prospect of having five additional votes for their Government.

I can readily see British diplomacy and shrewdness in allowing the colonies to make the demand as in their own interest, and I fear that those who believe the parent country was not behind them are not fully informed of the aggressive foreign policy of the British statesmen and diplomats to obtain every political and commercial advantage possible in all treaties entered into by them and that their guile is "childlike and bland."

I attach little weight to the argument advanced that those overseas dominions, especially Canada, would probably favor the United States in a controversy with the empire. They are not only bound to the parent country by the strongest political ties and look to it for political favors and commercial advantages, but they rely upon its great navy to protect them in their exposed geographical positions from aggressions of predatory nations. Their political and national interests are with the parent country against all the world, and they have so manifested it upon every occasion which required them to speak or act.

Canada, in the War of 1812, strongly supported Great Britain, and in the Civil War between the States, when Great Britain was secretly favoring the South in order to disrupt the Union, Canada was an asylum and safe refuge to all those in sympathy with the Confederate States. It also furnished troops in the Boer War.

Further, when the great World War, through which we have just passed, broke out and Great Britain became involved a wave of loyal enthusiasm swept over those dominions and they rallied to the support of their King and Emperor, sending money, munitions, supplies, ships, and armies to its defense without a parallel in the annals of history. Indeed, they furnished of their magnificent citizenship the flower and most effective part of the British Army in France.

Canada furnished 418,052 officers and men and the total Canadian casualties were 213,586, including 51,022 dead and 7,988 presumed dead, missing, and prisoners.

Australia, out of a volunteer enlistment of 417,000, accepted and sent to France 330,000, and her casualties were 54,890 dead and 158,099 wounded.

The Union of South Africa furnished for service in France and in expeditions against German African possessions 144,000 officers and men, and its casualties were 6,320 killed and 11,661 wounded.

New Zealand, out of its total population of 1,099,449, sent to France 99,650 officers and men, and its casualties of all kinds exceeded 52,000.

India, from the outbreak of the war to September 30, 1918, furnished, at her own expense, 219,534 British and 953,374 Indians, nearly all of whom saw active service.

The majority of the soldiers furnished by Canada and New Zealand and all of those in the other dominions were volunteers.

Can we say that the sovereign States of our own country responded to the call of the Federal Government more promptly and more loyally under the compelling force of conscription?

These brave colonials fought side by side with the soldiers from Great Britain and Ireland, and their blood flowed freely together, and all that is mortal of thousands of them lie united in death and in glorious history in the same cemeteries and often in the same graves upon the plains of France, and there they receive, as the brave sons of one people, one country, and one Empire the reverence and devotion of a common country.

Mr. FALL. I call the Senator's attention to the manner in which the disposition of the oil lands in Canada has been provided for, not leaving it even to the English Parliament to pass acts, or to the local Canadian Parliament or Government to dispose of them, but by an oil directory named by the King of England, directing how the disposition of such lands should be effected.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I understand that is true; and it is only an evidence of the complete control that the parent country yet exercises over all its dominions. There can be no doubt of it; and there is no necessity to cite instances when one reads the various charters granted by the Parliament to the dominions, constituting their organic law.

Mr. President, it takes no argument to convince anyone that the people of Great Britain and her colonies are now united more closely, strongly, and permanently than ever before; that friends of one are the friends of all, and that the foe of any one of them is the common enemy. Can you conceive a case wherein it is possible that one of these dominions would take sides against the parent country or one of their sisters in favor of any other country of the world? The very suggestion of such a possibility is, to my mind, absurd.

Mr. President, there is no sound reason, moral or legal, why the dominions and colonies of the British Empire should be recognized in the league of nations and not the sovereign States of the United States. There are many of our States and Commonwealths greater in wealth and population than all those colonies, and their people are just as brave and patriotic and contributed as much to the winning of the World War. We are as much entitled to 48 votes in the league of nations for our sovereign States as Great Britain is to 5 votes for its colonies; and if one is allowed, common justice and national equality require that the other should be allowed.

The Empire State of New York, with its immense wealth and 11,000,000 people, is certainly entitled to the same consideration as Australia with 5,000,000; and Tennessee, the great volunteer State, with her 2,300,000 brave, free, and enlightened people, the equal of any in the world, has more right to be recognized among the nations of the world than far-off New Zealand with her population of 1,000,000. I could make similar comparisons for other States of our great country, but it is unnecessary to do so.

Mr. President, we are gravely told that the British dominions and colonies have representation in the assembly of the league of nations only and that that body is without power—a mere "debating society"—and therefore the five additional votes give the British Empire no material advantage over the other members of the league. If this were true, it would be the most cruel joke of all history. It would be a disappointment and a delusion to all the nations that have been invited to come in and accept membership in the proposed league of nations. But it is not true. The second paragraph of article 1 provides that—

> Any fully self-governing State, dominion, or colony not named in the annex may become a member of the league if its submission is agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly, provided that it shall give effective guaranties of its sincere intention to observe its international obligations and shall accept such regulations as may be prescribed by the league in regard to its military and naval forces and armaments.

This vests in the assembly the power and control over the admission of new members, including that to prescribe conditions under which they may be admitted.

There are half of the white people of the world, including the great nations of Russia, Germany, and Austria, on the outside. Is the power to exclude some 300,000,000 civilized people from the society of nations and thus deny them a voice in controlling the affairs of the world in their own interest and the advancement of civilization immaterial? I will not argue such an obviously unsound proposition.

In article 4 the power to elect the four temporary members of the council from time to time, in its discretion, is conferred upon the assembly.

In the same article the approval of the majority of the assembly is required to authorize the council to increase the number of its permanent and temporary members. Is not the membership in number and personnel of the great governing body of the league of some importance? Give me the power to name the members of a political council or convention and to increase the membership at my pleasure and I will not fear any adverse action from its deliberations and decisions.

Will anyone be so guileless as to believe that the great and experienced diplomats of the British Empire will fail to take advantage of their greater representation in the assembly to see that the new members of the council are not unfriendly to its interests, or that the council will or will not be increased by the election of permanent or temporary members who are friendly or unfriendly to it? And it must be remembered that any or all of these dominions or colonies are eligible to membership in the council.

In article 6, while the council is authorized to appoint the secretary general, the assembly by a majority vote may veto its appointment. Surely the control over the chief executive officer of the league is of some importance.

All matters of procedure, including the appointment of committees to investigate particular matters by the assembly, shall be decided by a majority of its members represented at the meeting. The power to control organization and appoint committees is obviously important and often controls the action of the body and reports of committees. The member that controls six votes certainly has greater influence in such matters than the member who has only one vote.

The broad jurisdiction of the assembly is declared in article 3 in these words:

> The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

The like jurisdiction, conferred upon the council, is set forth in article 4 in the same identical words save "council" is substituted for "assembly." What else can this mean but to consider, decide, and dispose of all matters within the purpose and jurisdiction of the league of nations?

How it is to be done is not here definitely declared, but surely the great men who drafted this instrument, after deliberating for six months, did not intend that these most important clauses conferring jurisdiction upon both the assembly and the council should be inoperative, null, and void, mere sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.

Was it purposely left in this way in order that these great governing bodies might in the future, as emergencies confronted them and exigencies of nations required, put their own construction upon their powers and jurisdiction? They certainly have that power, because the clause must be construed and interpreted by some one, and the authority to do so is not to be found in any other article or clause of the covenant.

Diplomatic language is generally left open for liberal construction, and in this connection Talleyrand, the great French diplomat, said "words were invented to conceal ideas." President Wilson, Mr. Clemenceau, and Mr. Lloyd-George, in their letter to the Canadian premier, said:

> That these articles are not subject to a narrow and technical construction.

A familiar canon of constitutional and statutory construction is that such instruments must be so construed as to make them valid and effectual for the purpose for which they were intended, and not one to nullify and destroy them. These clauses were certainly intended to give the league power.

There is here the vestiture of great power to be used by the assembly in its broad and unlimited discretion.

Article 11 declares:

> It is also declared to be the fundamental right to each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb either the peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

This is authority for a member of the assembly to, in substance, hale any member of the league before that body or before the council, to answer any charge which such member may believe affects international relations or threatens the peace or the good understanding between nations.

Surely this power to harass nations and to consume the time of the assembly or the council means something and is of some importance. It must have been intended that the assembly and the council in such cases shall take some action.

The jurisdiction in this case, it will be seen, is not confined to members of the league, but, at the instance of any of its members, these governing bodies may intermeddle and concern themselves with the affairs of any nation in the world.

Was there ever such a scheme for stirring up discord and bringing on wars conceived by the mind of man; and yet it is said to be a provision for keeping the peace.

Article 14 authorizes the council to formulate plans for the establishment of a court of international justice, and when created this court is authorized to give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it by the council or the assembly. Here again is a provision for the assembly to engage in disturbing the peace.

Article 15 provides that if there should arise between the members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration, it shall be submitted to the council, and that the council may in any case, under this article, refer the dispute to the assembly or it shall be referred at the request of either party, and that the assembly acting under the rules prescribed for the council shall take jurisdiction; and if its action is concurred in by the representatives of the members of the league in the council and a majority of the other members of the assembly, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, it shall have the same force as the action of the council.

This most important jurisdiction is conferred upon the assembly at the instance of the council, or of the parties to all disputes likely to lead to a rupture between members of the league, and a majority, with the concurrence of the members of the council, not including parties to the dispute, will control. The decision may affect the whole world and may lead to war.

Will not the fact that five of the self-governing dominions and colonies of Great Britain have votes in the assembly and will be counted in making a majority be of importance to the British Empire in a dispute between it and the United States or any other member of the league? Is it denied that there is force in numbers and votes in political assemblies?

Surely no elaborate argument is necessary to show that membership in the assembly of these dominions and colonies is of material advantage to the parent Government.

The assembly, by section 19, is authorized from time to time to advise the reconsideration by members of the league of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international affairs whose conditions might endanger the peace of the world.

Diplomatic language used between nations is courteous and generally there lurks under the veil of courtesy of such words as "advise" and "recommend," order and command. These words appearing in this treaty must be given such force. It is to be remembered that all these articles are intended to mean something and be operative and "are not subject to narrow or technical construction."

Article 26 provides for amendments of the covenant and that they must be ratified by not only the members of the league whose representatives compose the council but by a majority of the members of the assembly. Here again there is power in the number of votes any one nation can control.

The treaty with Germany contains numerous provisions conferring power and authority on the league of nations, without saying by what body it is to be exercised. The presumption is that the popular body, the body in which all the members of the league have a right to a voice and a vote, is there meant; and here again the number of votes a Government can control is of a great advantage.

The great powers vested in the council are not to be overlooked and disregarded in considering the power of the members of the assembly. That body will practically control the commerce, the armies and navies, and the peace of the world. There never was such vast power for good or evil vested in any nine men before in all history.

It is a political body, and the members are the political representatives of the Governments appointing them and controlling their tenure of office. Can we believe that its deliberations and decisions will be free from barter, bargaining, intrigue, swapping votes, and every other trick and device known to "practical politics," in the light of the methods practiced by European nations in political affairs, as evidenced by the secret treaties between England, Japan, Italy, and France for the disposition of territories and peoples in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and the consummation of them at Paris over the protest, in some instances, of the representatives of the United States?

The members of the assembly, we have seen, elect the four temporary members of this great and powerful council and have the power concurrently with the council to increase the membership of the latter. And yet, in the light of all these things, it is said that the great British Empire has no advantage in having five of its dependencies in the assembly, eligible to membership in the council, to vote for it in these bodies in all these matters. The provision for unanimity of action does not afford the United States any protection, for whenever a member is a party to a dispute such member can not vote.

Mr. President, aside from material advantages or possible prejudice, can the United States consent that in a society of nations an empire, however powerful and however broad its dominions may be, shall take precedence over it and have a greater representation than it?

Can we maintain our national honor and our pride in the sovereignty and independence of our great Government and its glorious history and agree that international law, guaranteeing to all sovereign nations absolute equality, be violated and our country reduced to the equality of colonial dependencies?

I shall never assent by my voice to such a proposition. The American people will never approve a thing so unpatriotic and so degrading and humiliating.

I have great admiration for the English people, but I can not admit that they are superior to Americans and shall have precedence over them even in a matter of form or ceremony.

Mr. President, the very proposition is revolting to the American people, every one of whom is a sovereign in his own right and yields superiority and allegiance to no man. Would you have them admit that they are not equal to the subjects of a king or emperor?

President Cleveland in his message upon the Venezuelan matter well said:

> There is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

Mr. President, there may be some Senators who will hesitate to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to cure this great injustice and indignity to the people of the United States upon the theory that it is an amendment and will cause delay in the final ratification of the treaty and conclusion of peace.

It has been suggested that the same end can be reached by a reservation applicable to disputes which the United States might have with the British Empire or any of its dominions, and I think there is merit in the suggestion. It would be fairer to provide that the British Empire collectively should have but one vote.

These contentions, however, have troubled me but little.

When I became convinced that the treaty allowing this great advantage to the British Empire was a discrimination against the United States and an affront to the honor and dignity of the American people, I resolved to support whatever measure was necessary to remedy the wrong and injustice proposed. I prefer that it be done so as to create as little delay and friction as possible, but it must be done.

The maintenance of national integrity and national honor is infinitely more important to the American people than the inconvenience resulting from a few weeks' or months' delay, which is all that could possibly happen from either an amendment or a reservation.

It would be better to destroy the league of nations than to degrade the United States before the world and humiliate her people for all time.

If it requires an amendment to make the necessary changes, I will vote for it without the slightest hesitation.

The league of nations is not sacred or hedged around with divinity. It was not thundered down from Mount Sinai mid convulsions of nature, like the laws of Moses.

It is not profane for the United States Senate in the discharge of its constitutional duty to consider, dissect, and, if necessary, amend it in the interest of the American Government and the American people.

It is a British document. The original draft or foundation was prepared by Gen. Smuts, a British subject, and the superstructure was largely the work of Lord Robert Cecil, an hereditary aristocrat and adviser of the King of Great Britain.

It must be Americanized and made to conform to American constitutional liberty and free institutions. If this is not done in some proper and effective way, it should not be ratified.

The chief argument advanced against amendments is that the treaty will have to be submitted to the other signatory powers for their acquiescence and thus cause delay in the final conclusion of peace—an argument not against the soundness of the amendments, but one of expedience, which should have no weight when the independence of our country and liberties and safety of our people are concerned.

There will not be, in my opinion, any appreciable or prejudicial delay caused by amendment.

The treaty amended would first be submitted to the other four principal allied and associated powers—the British Empire, Japan, France, and Italy—and to Germany and to whatever they do the other members of the league will readily assent. They will have no alternative. They were not consulted and had no voice in the construction of the league, and why will it be necessary to consult them about amendments?

CONTROLLING NATIONS WILL CONSENT.

The British Empire will unquestionably consent to the amendments. That Empire gets a lion's share of commercial advantages and territorial annexations under the treaty and has the integrity of its territories lying in every quarter of the globe and peculiarly open to foreign aggression guaranteed by the wealth and power of the United States.

The Earl of Curzon, when the treaty was presented to the House of Lords, July 3 last, said:

> "But it is permissible, perhaps, to point out in a sentence that Great Britain has gained in this war all, and, indeed, much more than all, she set out to win. Our navy remains at the end of the war intact and unassailed. The principle of freedom of the seas, which is the basis of our national existence, stands unimpaired and unimpugned. The British protectorate of Egypt is provided for in one of the clauses of this treaty. We are demobilizing our forces, but we can not lay down our arms; we can not disband them altogether. We must still be able to fight for what we have won, and be sure that it is not taken from us after we have won it."

Col. Hilder, in the House of Commons, in discussing the treaty, July 21 last, said:

> "The outstanding feature of the peace treaty is that it puts the British Empire at the highest point that it has ever reached as regards territory and world influence. Largely by force of circumstances and the leading part which our navy and army took in either breaking down or destroying the enemy, we have been left with far greater territory and power than at any other period of our race's history."

And Mr. Bottomley, in the same debate, said:

> "May I compliment the prime minister on the great acumen he showed when he secured Britain as the mandatory of the ex-German colonies, because I believe that before we get on very far with the ex-German colonies the league of nations will come to an untimely end, as every experiment of that kind has done. The same thing was tried in ancient Greece and failed, and what happened then will happen now. No power will enforce their verdict. The noble lord, the member for Hitchin (Lord R. Cecil), says that public opinion will solve it. He said that it is possible that when we have spent a lot of money and had a few little wars we shall come out with the German ex-colonies to our credit. At present we owe America £1,000,000,000. Let her take over some of the obligations of Russia to ourselves. Let us see some sincerity in these high principles enunciated so freely on the other side of the water."

These British statesmen show how highly they value the stipulation in the treaty in favor of the Empire, and is it reasonable to assume—it is hardly conceivable—that they would fail to agree to our reasonable and just amendments in order to preserve and retain those advantages? Indeed, that they would do so seems certain.

Mr. A. G. Gardiner, editor of the London Daily News, referring to the pending amendment, and evidently voicing the apprehension of the British people that the United States might reject the treaty, made certain statements which I ask may be printed as a part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"If asked to accept such an amendment, I am sure the British people willingly would do so," Gardiner said.

"The spirit of the covenant certainly contemplates the British Empire as a unit. But it fails to specify this, probably because the omission never came to the attention of the peace conferees. Now that the issue had been raised, however, it will not be difficult to make the wording conform to the spirit and to eliminate America's cause for fear. Perhaps the wording could be changed without resubmitting the covenant to the nations concerned if Great Britain, as the interested party, would request the change.

"Although the intention of the conferees obviously was not to give the British Empire more votes than the United States, the text of the covenant justifies Senator REED'S assertion. He believes that in case of a dispute between the United States and one section of the empire the other sections would be sitting in judgment on the matter. Personally, I think it is debatable how much the scales would be loaded; it is conceivable that Canada's or South Africa's interests might be opposed to those of the empire or even allied with America's. But I readily understand the American concern in the matter and recognize it as a real objection which should be met. Perhaps the best way would be to insert a ruling in the covenant specifically covering this exigency.

"I am convinced the English sentiment would support such a move, for we do not want an unfair advantage.

"Just now, of course, President Wilson's answer to this criticism may well be that the veto power protects the United States. Undoubtedly this clause has the most practical bearing on the question of power. There exists in the covenant an absolute safeguard, a guarantee that nothing injurious can be done to any power. I don't like the idea of settling affairs on that basis, however; there is a better way out of the dilemma, and I think that eventually the unanimity and veto clause will be modified, anyway."

Mr. SHIELDS. Another Englishman some time since published an article in the Round Table Series, volume 1, which is very informing in this connection; and I ask that an extract from his article be printed as a part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

This is not the place in which to inquire whether the strength derived from the unconscious processes of organic growth is ideally preferable to the conscious forcefulness of organization and discipline. It is sufficient for the moment to notice that in virtue of its very nature our static empire is vitally interested in the maintenance of the status quo of the world. It is not a fighting machine.

It is inconceivable that its powers should ever be used for any aggression except such as is necessary for self-defense. But it is idle to hope that it can continue on its chosen road of peaceful progress and development without making collision with the interests or the pride of other political organizations. So vast a Colossus can not bestride the seas without creating a sense of oppression in those whom it overshadows. Its mere presence on the world's stage, often in apparent inertness, inevitably helps to shape the course and to decide the issue of every diplomatic dispute. There is not a progressive power whose ambition it does not seem to stifle, whose development it does not seem to check. In every quarter of the globe its mere subsistence is a standing challenge to rivalry in the arts of peace or of war. There is hardly a spot on the earth of which it can be said, "Here the British Empire has no interest to further or to protect."

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, France will certainly consent to the amendments. It needs the protection of the United States under the special treaty for that purpose negotiated by the President and now before the Senate for approval.

In the International Trade Conference now in session at Atlantic City the French financial experts estimated that their commodity purchases during 1920 would total between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000.

Julian Potin, of the French mission, stated that France must purchase $145,540,000 worth of foodstuffs from January 1 to October 1, 1920, including 1,000,000 tons of wheat, 2,000,000 tons of oats, 100,000 tons of sugar, 600,000 cases of condensed milk, and 25,000 tons of salted meats.

Italy must have money, coal, food, and other essentials of life from the United States, and will do almost anything to keep on terms of peace and amity.

The Italian mission at the International Trade Conference recommended to the American commission on credit and finance that a long-term credit, at reasonable rates, of $500,000,000 to $600,000,000 be granted to permit purchase in the United States in 1920 of $300,000,000 worth of food and $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 worth of raw materials and machinery.

Japan, gorged with Shantung, with its population of 30,000,000, will undoubtedly accept the amendment when it acts upon the treaty.

Germany is not a party to the league, but there is in my mind no doubt about her acceptance.

The treaty, practically ratified by the British Empire, France, and Italy, will be effective against Germany without our approval, and all the drastic provisions against Germany will be enforced by those nations. That country lies prone in the dust, without an army and without a navy, needing food and raw material, which it can only get from the United States.

Our Navy could at any time, by blockade, compel acceptance on the part of Germany if force were required.

Again, Germany is not very materially interested in the proposed amendments and reservations, and will hardly withhold her assent, considering her necessitous condition.

There is but little trouble with the treaty proper, in so far as the conclusion of peace is concerned, the main objections being found in the proposed league of nations, a distinct, separate, and foreign matter never before attempted to be fastened upon a treaty to conclude peace and restore normal conditions.

I have always favored peace at home and abroad, and I will support any measure reasonably calculated to prevent war in any country in the world, provided it does not involve the surrender of the sovereignty of our country or the safety of our people.

I regret that peace has not long since been concluded and our people allowed to return to their usual vocations and the pursuit of happiness. It would have been well if the effort to create a world government, to abolish war—an iridescent dream of centuries—had been deferred until the great civic convulsions created by the World War had quieted, until nations had once more reasserted conservatism, established organized governments, and arrived at a condition calmly to consider a proposition of such tremendous importance and far-reaching consequences. It would have been well if the attempt to organize a league had been postponed until all the great civilized nations of the world and all civilized peoples could have been consulted and given a voice in its construction and included in a lasting society of nations formed by them.

It requires great faith to believe that peace will be promoted by a supergovernment or league planned by the representatives of the British Empire, the most powerful Empire in the world, the Empire of Japan, the Prussia of the Orient, the King of Italy, and the Republics of France and the United States, five only of the nations of the world, under a constitution which enables them arbitrarily to control it for all time, and which all other nations are arbitrarily commanded to accept. It seems to me that it will be productive of wars.

President Wilson, among other things, in his address on March 3, 1917, said:

The essential of peace is the actual equality of nations in all matters of right or principle.

And in his war message of April 2, 1917, he declared:

A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. * * * It must be a league of honor, a partnership of opinion. Intrigue would eat its vitals away; the plottings of inner circles, who could plan what they would and render account to no one, would be a corruption seated at its very heart.

How does the league covenant square with these sound and just pronouncements?

The nations that conceived and formulated the proposed league and are the permanent dominating members consist of two Empires, a Kingdom, and two Republics, and of the nine members of the council six are monarchies.

The work was done behind closed doors, all other nations of the world being excluded. The representation and power of members was not made equal. There was no previous agreement, no consultation. There was plotting in the inner circle. Only a portion of the nations of the world were admitted to membership, and these were ordered to accept it as presented to them. They were given no choice. Three hundred millions of white people were excluded in the organization and only given a remote chance of membership in the future, a two-thirds vote of the assembly being required to admit them.

This is what is called a partnership of democratic nations.

It is, in fact, an autocratic oligarchy dominated by empires and kingdoms, responsible to no one, and imposed upon the world without consultation or consent and proposing to rule those in and out of the league alike.

It is bound by no code of procedure or laws; it establishes a government of men. There is no semblance of democracy or of the principle of government by the consent of the governed to be found within its four corners.

If this is the promised safe place for democracy, God save the Republic.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Johnson amendment has been heralded throughout the country as a test of Americanism. As such a test, it should hold water. That it does not hold water I think I can show. Perhaps it is fair to state here, even if it did hold water, I should not vote for it. I have already given my reasons for voting for reservations instead of amendments to the treaty.

Under the covenant of the league of nations action may be taken either by the council or by the assembly, or in certain cases by both together.

Article 5 provides:

Except where otherwise expressly provided in this covenant or by the terms of the present treaty, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.

In all cases where the council acts, therefore, such action requires a unanimous vote of the council except under paragraph 6 of article 15, where it is provided that—

If a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

Action by the assembly may be taken only in the following cases:

Article 1, paragraph 2: Where new members of the league are admitted on a two-thirds vote of the assembly.

Article 3, paragraph 3: Where the assembly may deal at its meetings with any matters within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world; a unanimous vote is here required.

Article 4, paragraph 1: Referring to the selection of four permanent members of the council not included in the original five; a unanimous vote is here required.

Article 4, paragraph 2: Referring to the naming of additional members of the league whose representatives shall always be members of the council and to an increase in the size of the council, and here the assembly acts by a majority vote in conjunction with the council, where the vote, of course, must be unanimous.

Article 5, paragraph 2: Referring to the question of procedure at meetings of the assembly; in this case a majority vote decides.

Article 11, paragraph 2: Referring to the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends. I do not think that any action can be taken under the provisions of this article, which, as Senators have said, provides merely a general world debating society. In any event, no action could be taken except by unanimous vote.

Article 15, paragraph 10: Where a dispute has been referred from the council to the assembly. In this case the assembly acts on a majority vote of its members, exclusive of those who are on the council, and must in conjunction have the unanimous vote of those of its members who are on the council, with the exception of the parties to the dispute.

Article 19: Where the assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the league of treaties which have become inapplicable, and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world. Here the action must be unanimous.

In only six cases does the assembly act without the council. In four of these six cases the assembly must act unanimously. In only two cases—article 1, referring to the election of new members of the league, and article 5, referring to the procedure at its own meetings—does the assembly act alone and by less than a unanimous vote.

In only one case—article 15, paragraphs 6 and 10—are the parties to a dispute prevented from voting in the assembly or in the council.

Wherever in the council or in the assembly a unanimous vote is required, or wherever under the provisions of the league joint action is required necessitating a unanimous vote by either the council or the assembly, the interests of the United States are manifestly taken care of, since we must ourselves be a party to any action taken, and on a unanimous vote one vote is as valuable as six.

This narrows the question down to article 1, paragraph 2, where the assembly elects new members by a two-thirds vote; article 5, paragraph 2, where the assembly regulates the procedure at its own meetings; article 15, paragraph 6, where the council acts unanimously on a dispute referred to it, exclusive of one or more of the parties to the dispute; and paragraph 10 of the same article, where a dispute has been referred to the assembly and action can only be taken where the report made by the assembly is concurred in by the representatives of the members of the league represented on the council and a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive, in each case, of the representatives of the parties to the dispute.

The question is, Does the Johnson amendment protect the United States in these particular cases?

In all other cases the vote of the United States could definitely defeat any action to be taken, either by the council or by the assembly, or both jointly, and bring to naught the numerical advantage lying with Great Britain through her colonies having membership in the league.

The Johnson amendment reads as follows:

(1) Provided, That when any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire which are also members of the league, the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league.

With it, although by no means a part of it, should also be associated the so-called Moses amendment to paragraph 9 of article 15:

(2) Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

I shall hereafter refer to the two amendments together as the Johnson amendment. The amendment would undoubtedly apply to article 1, paragraph 2, which provides for the election of new members by a two-thirds vote of the assembly, and in such election we should have the same number of votes in the assembly as Great Britain and her colonies combined. It would also apply to article 5, paragraph 2, which regulates the procedure at meetings of the assembly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator's argument. If he prefers, I will wait until he gets through.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator would wait until I conclude what I have to say.

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Article 15, paragraph 6, provides that if a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendation of the report.

I do not claim, as some of my colleagues have claimed, that the colonies would not have a right to representation upon the council should they be elected so to serve. I believe that as members of the league they have the same privileges and rights as all the other members of the league. They can not, however, be so elected under the first provision of article 4 of the covenant without the unanimous consent of the assembly, which will include ourselves, or, under the second provision, without the unanimous consent of the council, which will also include ourselves. It is inconceivable to me that the United States should ever consent to allow a sovereign State and one or more of its dependencies to serve at the same time on the council. In any event, should it do so, under paragraph 9 of article 15, the dispute may be referred, at the request of either party to the dispute, to the assembly. There are three sorts of disputes under article 15 where the interests of the United States might be affected: First, a dispute between the United States and Great Britain; second, a dispute between the United States and some country other than Great Britain; third, a dispute between two countries other than Great Britain or the United States. I am assuming that we can have no dispute with one of the colonies of Great Britain that would not be a dispute with Great Britain.

In the first case, under paragraphs 6 and 10 of article 15, neither the United States nor Great Britain could take part in the proceedings of the council or assembly because both are parties to the dispute. The British colonies could conceivably take part as outside members not parties to the dispute. The amendment would cure this difficulty.

In the second case, where, for instance, the United States had a dispute with Spain, the United States in any event would be debarred as being a party to the dispute, and no matter how many votes it had in the council or assembly it could not use such votes. The Johnson amendment would not apply. Great Britain, as well as her colonies, could take part.

In the third case a dispute between two members, where the United States and Great Britain were not included, the amendment would give us the same vote in the council as Great Britain, but would not apply to a dispute referred to the assembly, because while the United States could take part as a member of the council, and Great Britain could take part as a member of the council, the additional votes that the United States would have could not be used because of the provisions of paragraph 10, providing for the concurrence by the representatives of those members of the assembly represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the assembly, exclusive in each case of the representatives of countries that are parties to the dispute.

The British colonies could take part as a part of the majority of the other members of the assembly, but the votes of the United States could not be so used, since our only status would be that of a member represented on the council. The Johnson amendment, therefore, would only apply to the election of new members, to the regulation of the procedure of the assembly at its own meetings, and to the participation by the colonies in votes of the council or assembly where the United States and Great Britain were both parties to a dispute.

The following reservation has been drawn by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and is now in the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations:

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate have more than one vote, or in case of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league in which such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire, united with it politically, shall have voted.

The reservation applies to every act in the covenant where Great Britain and its colonies in the aggregate have cast more than one vote. It takes care of paragraph 2 of article 1 and makes void, as far as the United States is concerned, any election of new members where Great Britain and her colonies have in the aggregate cast more than one vote.

In the same way it takes care of the procedure at the meetings of the assembly. It takes care of paragraph 6 of article 15 and of paragraph 10 of article 15, and not only of the case where we have a dispute with Great Britain, but of the two other cases above referred to under this article where we have a dispute with a country other than Great Britain or where a dispute arises in which neither we nor Great Britain are concerned. It renders void, as far as we are concerned, any action taken under the provisions of these paragraphs where Great Britain and her colonies have in the aggregate cast more than one vote. It meets, as the Johnson amendment does not, the objections raised on account of the preponderating British vote, and as a test of Americanism it meets the situation, as I claim the Johnson amendment does not.

Let me say to the Senator from California that I am just as much against the provision in the treaty allowing Great Britain and her dependencies six votes to our one as he is, but I believe in meeting the difficulty with a reservation that will cure it rather than with an amendment that will not.

The Senator has stated that three years ago no Senator in this Chamber would have for a moment considered voting against his amendment. Let me say to the Senator, Mr. President, that my reason, and I believe the reason of most of the Senators in this Chamber who believe as I do in voting against his amendment, aside from the fact that we prefer reservations to amendments, is that his amendment is not a good amendment and does not answer the purposes for which it was drawn. I am very certain that the same fault which we now find with his amendment would have been found by the Senate of three years ago and that his amendment would then have met the same fate which I firmly believe it will meet when we vote upon it to-day or to-morrow.

The motives of the Senators who will vote against the amendment of the Senator from California are every bit as high as the motives of the Senator from California and every bit as pro-American. The only difference is that we believe in a provision that will safeguard the interests of the United States while he believes in his own amendment, which, as has been clearly demonstrated by other Senators in this Chamber, will not have that effect.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, just one word in response to the Senator from Maine.

The Senator from Maine is at some pains to demonstrate that the amendment proposed by me, that is now the subject of discussion, does not meet the situation. He is at pains to indulge in that demonstration in order that, as he says, the situation may be met by a reservation.

Let us assume for the purposes of the argument, Mr. President, that the entire situation is not met by the amendment presented by me. At least, according to what he says, the amendment meets a part of the situation, while, in my opinion, the reservation to which he adverts does not meet the situation at all. Since this amendment meets a part of the situation, if the Senator from Maine has the very great desire which he expresses to accomplish the same purpose as I, at least he might agree to go part of the way with the amendment; and then, if he desires, he can go any other part of the way with the reservation to which he adverts.

My view of the situation is such that I am for the amendment. If the reservation will add to it, I am for the reservation, too; but they are two distinct and different propositions entirely. One seeks, the amendment, as its very language imports, to give to the United States the same voting power that Great Britain has.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] says he wishes to do that very thing. A reservation does not purport in any degree to give the same voting power on any question to the United States that Great Britain has, and if the Senator from Maine has exactly the same purpose that I have, as I understand his language to imply, then the Senator from Maine will give to the United States in those instances where it can be given, even though it may not give it in all instances, as he asserts, the same voting power to the United States that Great Britain is given in this very instrument.

If he believes, as I do, that it is unjust and unfair to America that Britain should be given six votes to the United States one, if he has exactly the same purpose in view that I have in regard to our actions concerning either amendment or reservation, he will go with me in giving where he can by amendment. If this is not wholly appropriate, I will see that the Senator from Maine and the other Senators are furnished with an amendment which will be appropriate before we conclude, and I hope he will go with me just as far as we can by amendment in seeing that the United States has six votes, as well as Great Britain, in this league of nations.

That is the point. The point is not that you may give an option by a reservation to the United States subsequently to disavow some action which may be taken by the league. That is not the idea of the amendment, nor the thought that was in my mind in its original presentation. The idea was to say that my country shall have just exactly what this league covenant gives to Great Britain. If I have not wholly accomplished the purpose, I promise the gentlemen who find fault with the amendment that they will have an opportunity with an amendment which goes the full distance to vote before we conclude this debate and before we conclude action upon this instrument.

The difficulty is that the gentlemen—whose motives, of course, I do not question at all—are endeavoring by a reservation to accomplish a purpose perfectly legitimate in itself, which is their purpose; but it is a purpose which is not my purpose, nor the purpose of this amendment. The purpose of this amendment and its cognate amendment, offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], is to give, as far as we may, equal voting power—ultimately, I hope, equal representation—to the United States of America with Great Britain in this league. That is the idea.

The Senator says frankly that he would not vote for the amendment even if it went the whole way; that he would not stand for this amendment even if it did all that he says it does not do. Then what is the use of arguing the proposition, Mr. President? If no amendment could be drawn which would give America equal representation and equal voting power with Great Britain in this league, why spend our time arguing whether this amendment goes the full distance, or three-fourths or four-fifths or half or a quarter of the distance we are trying to cover by its presentation to this body? Why spend our time arguing that it is not sufficient except in some particulars when, if it were sufficient in all particulars, the Senator from Maine frankly says he would not vote for it anyway?

The difficulty with the amendment, Mr. President, is not that it does not go all the way; the difficulty with the amendment is not that it has not sufficient vitality; the difficulty with the amendment is that it goes part of the way anyway, and that it has any vitality at all. That is the difficulty; and the difference between the Senator from Maine and myself regarding this situation rises from two diverse views, the one being, on my part, that America shall have exactly the same representation as Great Britain in this league, and the Senator's view being that by a reservation he will give us the option to determine after action shall have been taken by the league.

There is the difference in viewpoint. He is against the proposition, by his own statement to-day, that we should have equal representation, by amendment at least, with Great Britain in the league, though he would give us the power to annul action subsequently taken. There is the test. Call it what you will. You may call it of one sort or you may call it of another. It is my test of Americanism. I question no other man's Americanism. That is not the point. I am questioning the Americanism of neither the Senator from Maine nor of any other man. To me the test of Americanism is that my country shall be as great, and as powerful, and as big, and have the same representation exactly in any league that Great Britain has.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. HALE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Maine in view of the course the debate has taken.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am glad to hear that the Senator from California states that his test of Americanism is his amendment to the treaty. I can not, however, accept it as my test of Americanism.

The Senator has said that I am trying to reach the same result that he is, and to give this country the same number of votes in the assembly and council that Great Britain has. I have never tried to reach that result. I do not claim that the reservation reaches that result. I have believed from the first that this treaty could be taken care of, and American interests and rights safeguarded, by reservations instead of by amendments, and I have consistently held to that course.

As far as the pending matter is concerned, I am very certain, in my own mind, that the case is amply taken care of by the reservation of the Senator from Wisconsin, and far better than it is by the amendment of the Senator from California. If the Senator has any question about my patriotism, or the patriotism of anyone else who believes as I do and who will vote as I do, he is welcome to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No, Mr. President, let there be no misunderstanding about this. I said that my test of Americanism, for myself, was that my country should have equal representation in any league, in any body, in any confederation, or in any partnership with any other nation on the face of the earth. I asperse no other man's patriotism or Americanism at all. I have my own test for myself. I have made that test.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is welcome to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. And I am welcome to it, of course, just as the Senator from Maine is welcome to his test, with which I am not quarreling at all. My test is the right of representation and membership and equal power in this or any other league for my country, with any country, I do not care what it is. In this instance it happens to be Great Britain.

Mr. HALE. And I have endeavored, Mr. President, in my humble way, to show that we shall have equal power under the reservation.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I think it is demonstrated quite to the contrary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it was my intention to proceed and discuss a certain feature of the treaty, especially in relation to the address made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] the other day and some of the remarks he made in that address concerning my own position. I sometimes find it a little difficult to obtain the floor in these close times, and therefore I simply desired to obtain it this evening that I might go on in the morning. I will now yield to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who, I understand, desires to move a recess.

ENTRY OF ALIENS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, as in legislative session, laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. McCUMBER, and Mr. HITCHCOCK conferees on the part of the Senate.

VICE PRESIDENT MARSHALL'S VIEW OF INDUSTRIAL UNREST.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD certain remarks of the Vice President concerning the present labor situation, which were published in this morning's Washington Post.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LOVE AND COMPASSION, NOT LAWS, WILL SOLVE INDUSTRIAL UNREST, SAYS VICE PRESIDENT MARSHALL—MANUFACTURERS MUST SEE SOMETHING MORE IN BUSINESS THAN DIVIDENDS AND LOOK UPON EMPLOYEES AS BROTHERS IN THE REPUBLIC AND NOT COGS IN A MACHINE TO PRODUCE PEACE, HE WRITES.

[By Thomas R. Marshall, Vice President of the United States.]

"Just so long as capital and labor stand and glare at each other we may expect everlasting turmoil and a nation-wide cataclysm.

"The Congress of the United States is a kind of doctor that treats symptoms and does not treat disease.

"No legislative remedy that I know of can be found to produce peace and quietude and good order—unless the manufacturers see something more in business than dividends and look upon the employees as brothers in the Republic and not as cogs in the machine or as numbers on a pay roll. It is hopeless from their standpoint; and unless the laboring men have some higher incentive to do their work than the mere wage which comes from the doing of it; if they put in their time finding how little they can do and how much more they can get for the doing of it, it is hopeless from their standpoint.

CAN NOT BOOST ONE, BOOT ANOTHER.

"It is no part of government to boost one man and to boot another.

"It is hopeless if the mad passions of men are to hammer at legislative halls for their final and just settlements. A government of discretion dies.

"The only government in business life that can hope to live is a government of love and compassion.

"What the economic life of America needs is not a lawgiver, but an evangelist.

"The country needs a rebaptism of peace patriotism such as it had of war patriotism.

LAMB AND LION TOGETHER.

"There never will be perfect justice in the world until the lion and the lamb can lie down together, and not as they do now, with the lamb inside of the lion.

"Just now we need a body of citizens who are content to do a day's work for a day's wage; who are willing to pay a day's wage for a day's work; who believe more in the common good than in the larger good.

"Since the world began, business and wealth have had no such opportunity for the angel of the Lord to write their names down beside that of Abou Ben Adhem as they have just now.

"The trumpet call of conscience is not only to the meek and lowly, but to the high and mighty, and when dividends and wages are measurably forgotten in the love of service for our Christian country, if there is any hope at all, passion, personal preferment, and personal success must all be put in the background and the capitalists and the laborers must realize that the consumer is also entitled to admission into the brotherhood and business must be conducted and work must be done primarily for the love of promoting a contented and a happy people.

DIVIDENDS MUST BE SECONDARY.

"Dividends and wages must be secondary. This is a problem for solution by men who believe in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

"It calls on every man of every creed to solve it; not for one person, nor for one class, but in the interests of the whole people.

"Is it not to be hoped that soon again the Nazarene shall walk through field and factory, through palace and hovel, leaving behind Him everywhere the only solution for every great problem, the healing influence of His golden rule.

"I am in favor of any alleviating measure for the time that would adjust these troubles, but I have no confidence in the proposed settlement of these difficulties. This offers no new solution, and I only say it in the hope that men of every creed may realize how futile has been our theology when we have imagined that we could go to church on Sunday and love God whom we have not seen without the rest of the week loving our fellow men whom we have seen."

SUITS FOR SALVAGE SERVICES.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a day or two ago when the calendar was up we reached the bill (S. 3076) authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdiction, and for other purposes. The bill was read at considerable length, although I do not think entirely, and it went over at the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. The Senator from Utah has examined the bill, and I think not only is perfectly satisfied to withdraw his objection but thinks that the bill ought to pass. It is a very urgent matter, and I hope it may be passed. I think there will be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States, and any corporation in which the United States owns not less than a majority of the capital stock, may be sued in personam in the district courts of the United States, in admiralty, for any cause of action of which said courts ordinarily have cognizance in their admiralty and maritime jurisdictions, arising, since April 6, 1917, out of, or in connection with, the possession, operation, or ownership by the United States, or such corporation, of any merchant vessel, or the possession, carriage, or ownership by the United States, or such corporation, of any cargo, in those cases where, if the United States were suable as a private party a suit in personam could be maintained, or where, if the vessel or cargo were privately owned or possessed, a suit in rem could be maintained and the vessel or cargo could be arrested or attached at the time of the commencement of suit. Any such suit shall be brought in the district court of the United States for the district in which the parties so suing, or any of them, reside or have their principal place of business in the United States, or in which the vessel or cargo charged with liability is found, or in the district in or nearest which the cause of action arises, or in any district in which the Attorney General, or other duly authorized law officer, may agree to appear. In case the United States, or such corporation, shall file a libel in rem, or in personam, in any district, a cross libel in personam may be filed, or a set-off claimed against the United States, or such corporation, with the same force and effect as if the libel had been filed by a private party. Such district court is hereby authorized to hear and determine any such suit upon the principles of liability, and in accordance with the practice, obtaining in like cases between private parties in suits in admiralty, and, in a proper case, to enter a decree for or against the United States, or such corporation, with costs, and if for a money judgment, together with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until paid, unless the suit involves a contract stipulating a higher rate of interest, in which event interest shall be allowed in accordance with the contract, and all interest shall run as ordered by the court. Appeal from the decree of the district court in any case brought under this act shall lie to the Circuit Court of Appeals and to the Supreme Court, and the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court, as now provided in other cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. That no suit in rem shall be brought against, nor any warrant of arrest or attachment levied upon, any vessel owned or operated by, or demised to, or in the possession of, the United States, or such aforesaid corporation, nor against nor upon any cargo owned and in the possession of the United States, or of such corporation, but any suit brought hereunder shall, if the libelant so elects in his libel, proceed in accordance with the principles of suits in rem in all cases wherein maritime liens exist and where, if the vessel or cargo with respect to which the action arises were privately owned and possessed a suit in rem could be maintained and the vessel or cargo arrested or attached at the time of the commencement of suit; but election to proceed as aforesaid as in rem shall not preclude the libelant in a proper case from also seeking relief in personam in the same suit.

SEC. 3. That the United States, and such aforesaid corporation, shall be entitled to the benefits of all exemptions from, and all limitations of, liability accorded by the statutes of the United States, and of the several States and Territories, and by the maritime law, to the owners, charterers, operators, and agents of vessels.

SEC. 4. That neither the United States, nor such aforesaid corporation, shall be required to give any bond or admiralty stipulation in any suit brought hereunder, either in the court of original jurisdiction or in any appellate court.

SEC. 5. That in the event of any privately owned vessel, out of the possession of the United States, being arrested in any suit in rem, or attached in any suit in personam, such vessel shall be immediately released without bond or stipulation being required therefor upon the United States, through the Attorney General, or any other officer duly authorized by him intervening and assuming responsibility for all liability arising in such suit, and upon such intervention said cause shall proceed against the United States in accordance with the provisions of section 2.

SEC. 6. That jurisdiction be, and hereby is, conferred upon the several courts of the United States for the purposes herein specified.

SEC. 7. That in any suit brought hereunder, the libelant shall file his libel, duly verified, with the clerk of the district court having jurisdiction of the cause, and shall forthwith serve a copy thereof on the United States attorney for such district, and mail a copy thereof, by registered mail, to the Attorney General of the United States, and shall file with the clerk of said district court an affidavit of such service and mailing. Such service and mailing shall constitute a valid service on the United States.

SEC. 8. That suits herein authorized may be brought within one year after the approval of this act, with respect to any of the aforesaid causes of action arising prior to such approval; and all other suits hereunder shall be brought within two years after the cause of action arises.

SEC. 9. That if any vessel or cargo within the purview of sections 1 and 5 of this act is arrested, attached, or otherwise seized by process of any court in any country other than the United States, or if any suit is brought therein against the master of any such vessel, for any cause of action arising out of, or in connection with, the possession, operation, or ownership of any such vessel, or the possession, carriage, or ownership of any such cargo, the Secretary of State of the United States, in his discretion, upon the request of the Attorney General of the United States, or any other officer duly authorized by him, may, in the event of such arrest, attachment, or seizure of any such vessel, direct the United States consul residing at or nearest the place at which such action is commenced to claim such vessel or cargo and to execute an agreement, undertaking, bond, or stipulation for and on behalf of the United States, or the United States Shipping Board, or such aforesaid corporation, for the release of such vessel or cargo from such arrest, attachment, or seizure, as by said court required, and, if an appeal shall thereafter intervene, to execute such agreement, undertaking, bond, or stipulation as shall be required for the prosecution of said appeal, or may, in the event of such suit against the master of any such vessel, direct the United States consul residing at or nearest the place of such action is commenced to enter the appearance of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such aforesaid corporation, in such action, and to pledge the credit thereof to the payment of any judgment and costs that may be entered in such suit. The Attorney General is hereby vested with power and authority to arrange with any bank, surety company, person, firm, or corporation in the United States, its territories and possessions, or in any foreign country, to execute any such aforesaid bond or stipulation as surety or stipulator thereon, and to pledge the credit of the United States to the indemnification of such surety or stipulator as may be required to secure the execution of such bond or stipulation. The presentation of a copy of the judgment roll in any such suit, certified by the clerk of the court and authenticated by the certificate and seal of the United States consul claiming such vessel or cargo, or his successor, and by the certificate of the Secretary of State as to the official capacity of such consul, shall be sufficient evidence to the proper accounting officers of the United States for the allowance and payment of such judgment: Provided, however, That where the status of any vessel within the purview of this section so warrants, nothing in this act shall be held to prejudice or preclude a claim of the immunity of such vessel from foreign jurisdiction, or prevent a settlement of the case through diplomatic negotiations.

SEC. 10. That any final judgment rendered in any suit herein authorized, and any final judgment within the purview of sections 5 and 9 of this act, and any arbitration award or settlement had and agreed to under the provisions of section 11 of this act, shall, upon the presentation of a duly authenticated copy thereof, be paid by the proper accounting officers of the United States out of any appropriation or insurance fund or other fund especially available therefor; otherwise there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to pay any such judgment, or award, or settlement.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of any department of the Government of the United States, or the United States Shipping Board, or the board of trustees of such aforesaid corporation, having control of the possession or operation of any merchant vessel, are, and each hereby is, authorized to arbitrate, compromise, or settle any claim in which suit will lie under the provisions of sections 1, 5, 9, and 12 of this act.

SEC. 12. That the United States, and the crew of any merchant vessel owned or operated by the United States, shall have the right to collect and sue for salvage services rendered by such vessel and crew, and any moneys recovered therefrom by the United States for its own benefit, and not for the benefit of the crew, shall be covered into the United States Treasury to the credit of the department of the Government of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such aforesaid corporation, having control of the possession or operation of such vessel.

SEC. 13. That all moneys recovered in any suit brought by the United States on any cause of action arising out of, or in connection with, the possession, operation, or ownership of any merchant vessel, or the possession, carriage, or ownership of any cargo, shall be covered into the United States Treasury to the credit of the department of the Government of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such aforesaid corporation, having control of the vessel or cargo with respect to which such cause of action arises, for reimbursement of the appropriation, or insurance fund, or other funds, from which the loss, damage, or compensation for which said judgment was recovered has been or will be paid.

SEC. 14. That the Attorney General shall report to the Congress at each session thereof the suits under this act in which final judgments shall have been rendered against the United States and such aforesaid corporation, and the Secretary of any department of the Government of the United States, and the United States Shipping Board, and the board of trustees of any such aforesaid corporation, shall likewise report the arbitration awards or settlements of claims which shall have been agreed to since the previous session, and in which the time to appeal shall have expired or have been waived.

SEC. 15. That the provisions of all other acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

RECESS.

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, October 25, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate October 24 (legislative day of October 22), 1919.

CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS.

Rear Admiral Robert E. Coontz to be Chief of Naval Operations in the Department of the Navy with the rank of admiral.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 24, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Father, author of life and all that makes it dear to our hearts, we draw near to Thee for inspiration. Illumine our minds, purify our hearts, quicken within every noble impulse, that our service may be acceptable unto Thee and bring peace, joy, and happiness to our souls. This in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By special order, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] has 40 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, that is after the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table, which, of course, includes conference reports. If the gentleman desires to proceed before that, very well.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes that the gentleman from Ohio will prefer to have these matters disposed of first. Does the gentleman from Minnesota wish to call up the conference report on the joint resolution first?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on House joint resolution 151, to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will that interfere with Gen. SHERWOOD making his speech?

Mr. STEENERSON. No. If the general desires, I will yield to him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think we ought to have a quorum here.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to proceed now?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. I would like to have the general have his chance.

Mr. STEENERSON. Very well.

A QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant of Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and eighty-one Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. Without objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa, Judge BOIES, is unavoidably absent on account of the serious illness of his wife. It is entirely possible that he will be unable to attend the sessions for some time. With three exceptions, I have given a general pair to him. It is hoped that he will soon be able to sit with us again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks indefinite leave of absence in behalf of Judge BOIES, of Iowa. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. What was the request, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks indefinite leave for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BOIES].

Mr. SEARS. There was no specific request, Mr. Speaker. I announced that I had a pair with him.

The SPEAKER. Under the order adopted, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] is entitled to 40 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am glad to speak to a full house, but it is much easier to address vacant chairs, because they do not criticize or kick. I am to speak about the world-wide war, with some reference to Gen. Pershing, who has been attacked on this floor by the Member from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL]. I am going to call attention to the fact, however, that our style of fighting, which is entirely different from the fighting in the Civil War of half a century ago, calls for the same presence of the generals at the front as it did during that war.

Quite recently this Congress by official action proclaimed Gen. Pershing the hero of this great World War and endowed him with as high rank as was ever accorded any general in any of our wars. The occasion was marked by earnest enthusiasm, and eloquent and glowing tributes were paid to the general who commanded successfully our victorious armies. I had the pleasure and the honor of quietly participating in these remarkable tributes. Later a capable and honored Member of this body, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], of the same political faith as Gen. Pershing, made a carefully prepared speech on this floor that both surprised and startled me. Let me quote a paragraph:

> This parlor soldier might be asked to point out just one instance where he ever exposed himself to any danger, hardship, or suffering. After the war was over he did see some battle fields and put in a good deal of time laying wreaths on soldiers' graves and visiting hospitals in Paris. He might be requested to reconcile the tears that the ever-faithful and ever-present reporter sees glistening in his eyes at sight of the wounded soldiers with his condoning the barbaric treatment of the wounded boys in prison camps.

In another part of Congressman SCHALL'S speech I find another equally startling statement:

> As a member of the Rules Committee, I voted for the rule to bring the matter before the House, that Members might have opportunity to express themselves. But as a Member of this House, on behalf of the brave officers and men, dead and living, who fought this war, I felt it an obligation to enter their protest. I have talked with men who had intimate chance to observe Pershing in the Philippines; I have talked with officers and men who accompanied him on the ill-conducted fiasco, the trail of the lone bandit in Mexico; I talked with hundreds of soldiers in the recent war, and their opinion, officers and men, was unanimous that he has not the elements so mixed in him to stand before them a man and a soldier in whose elevation they would feel honored.

These charges are very grave, and, if true, I shall regret that I voted to elevate Gen. Pershing to the highest rank in our great patriotic Army. I voted for the bill elevating and glorifying Gen. Pershing because he was the commander in chief of our victorious Army and because the bill was approved by our strong Military Committee, in which I have implicit confidence. And I hope that every Member on this floor will unite in the request to have this important committee tell the House and the country when and where Gen. Pershing was at the front during any of the great conflicts of this World War. I think that is due to the Congress and to the country.

I recently attended a convention of World War soldiers in Ohio, where four posts of the American Legion were organized, and I have talked with a goodly number of these overseas soldiers. Without exception they have declared to me that they never saw or heard of Gen. Pershing at the front. Congressman SCHALL'S remarkable address has gone into the permanent RECORD of Congress. It can not be answered by silence. It may be claimed that since the advent of long-range cannon the style of fighting is entirely different from the Civil War or the Spanish-American War. This is true. But in case of a break in any part of a battle line it is just as necessary now as ever for the near presence of the general in chief to promptly order forward the reserves. If a battle line is broken or the integrity of any part of the line is threatened, all students of military strategy agree that the emergency calls for the immediate presence of the commander in chief. Furthermore, in all wars the men behind the guns are always encouraged and enthused by the presence of their commanding general. Gen. Shafter, of Michigan, was selected as commander in chief of our Army in the war for free Cuba. And he commanded a victorious Army. But Congress did not grant him the supreme rank or hail him as a hero, because when the battle was on he was 6 miles in the rear. Congress and the country made a hero and a President of Theodore Roosevelt, who was only a lieutenant colonel at Santiago, but who was always at the front. [Applause.] Perhaps it is now the prevailing style to adopt the street car motto, "Safety first." But I am a little old-fashioned, and "safety first" for a war hero does not appeal to me. [Applause.]

In Webster's voluminous dictionary, which every Member of Congress should read carefully [laughter], I find the following definition of a hero: "A man of distinguished valor in danger." I have not that subtleness of intellect to recognize a hero, either a physical or moral hero, who shirks danger. Every great cause has had both physical and moral heroes. The courageous men who signed the Declaration of Independence were both moral and physical heroes, because if their new and untried manhood creed had failed their lives would have been imperiled.

Congressman SCHALL also charges that Gen. Pershing was guilty of brutal conduct toward private soldiers. Again I quote:

After the armistice was signed, Gen. Pershing issued the order to the troops on their march into Germany that everyone who fell out should be counted as deserters. Why these strenuous marches, where the officers were ordered not to allow anyone to take care of the boys who fell by the wayside through exhaustion? These courageous young Americans, 16, 17, 18, 19 years old, who would rather die than give up, trudged on under heavy packs until they fell from exhaustion. When doctors loaded them into ambulances orders from headquarters hauled them out and forced them to trudge on or get on as best they could. Many of them, unable to go farther, fell in their tracks, and when doctors, who, after camp had been made for the night, unable to stand for this inhuman régime, had secured ambulances and lanterns and sneaked back to look for the lost of their flock, they found them frozen to the ground, covered with snow, many beyond help, and others dead.

This is a terrible arraignment, but it is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and is from a responsible source. It can not be answered by a sneer.

Mr. SCHALL was one of the visiting Congressmen who went overseas to investigate conditions in our Army. On page 10 of his address he mentions the fact that Gen. Pershing refused to testify before the congressional committee. Here I quote from Mr. SCHALL'S speech:

The news might have got back before his generalship was a reality how he allowed $1,000,000 worth of planes to be burned at Colombe-les-Belles and wholesale destruction by fire of clothes and food, ammunition and equipment, and he might not want to be questioned about the million-dollar dugout it was commonly rumored in Paris he had constructed for his own safety in case the enemy should succeed in breaking through so far to the rear.

The statement made in an address on the floor of the House that Gen. Pershing had constructed a dugout 60 miles in the rear is too much for my credulity; that a million dollars' worth of planes were burned with Gen. Pershing's approval is a very serious and startling charge; and I am unable to comprehend the animus of such ruthless waste and outlawry. I repeat, therefore, that there is due all those who voted for the bill to endow Gen. Pershing as the supreme hero of this great World War that these grave and incriminating charges against him be refuted without delay. The country wants to know the facts.

There is much prejudice among the soldiers who served overseas against their officers. I believe much of this prejudice has been engendered by a too-severe system of training and discipline inaugurated by the War Board, for which the officers were not responsible. I believe we have a splendid body of officers of the line and field. I would be the last man on this floor to discredit their behavior, their patriotism, or their valor. I believe the prejudice of the private soldiers against the officers is principally due to two causes: First, the large number of courts-martial of private soldiers, with severe penalties for trivial offenses, and, second, the creation of a distinct class of officers by drill and military training and placing them in command over the rank and file. This gave the men behind the guns, who do the perilous work of war, no chance to earn a promotion in the crucible of battle.

It comes to me in a way I can not ignore that Gen. Pershing has been guilty of cruelty to the soldiers of the rank and file. In our Civil War, when we had from first to last some 2,212,742 soldiers enlisted, we had only some hundred courts-martial. Now we are told there have been over 350,000. I hear of two soldiers who from sheer exhaustion were found asleep on guard duty, were tried and condemned to die, and their execution was approved by Gen. Pershing. On an appeal to President Wilson their sentence was set aside. Afterwards one was killed in battle and the other wounded in battle. Cruelty and lack of human sympathy are not the shining attributes of a great general.

THE BATTLE OF FRANKLIN.

Now, as to the question of our style of fighting in the Civil War. There stands to-day, as it stood over half a century ago, in front of the town of Franklin, Tenn., on the highest point of the ridge, a large linden tree. It was half past 3 in the afternoon of November 30, 1864, when Gen. Hood, commanding 75,000 veteran soldiers, rode unattended to that tree, threw the stump of the leg that was shot off at Chickamauga over the pommel of the saddle, drew out his field glass, and sat looking across the valley to the position of the Union Army. It was the silence that always precedes a great battle. Presently the silence was broken by the soft strains of music which floated up from the town below. It was the Federal band playing "Just before the battle, mother." The men in gray on the hill and the men in blue in the valley below listened. There were tears in many eyes, as the pathetic words were well remembered—

Just before the battle, mother,
I am thinking most of you.

I was at Franklin, on the Union side, and I saw and heard it all from an advanced position near the center of the Federal line. I saw and heard it all—all that a soldier can see and hear amid the glare, the thunderous roar, the stiffling battle smoke, the yells of the victors, the agonizing groans of the wounded and dying. I remember the scene just before the battle. I see it now, as I saw it then, a lovely valley basking in the mellow glory of November sunshine. I see the little town of Franklin, quiet yet restless, just inside the circle of the Federal lines. These lines extended from river to river. There were patches of woodland in the rich foliage of the autumn leaves, in scarlet, gold, and green, tinged with the early frosts to gladden and glorify their fall.

I was speaking of Gen. Hood, the commanding general, who sat on his horse under the linden tree taking a survey of the Federal lines. Suddenly he closed his field glass, wheeled his horse, and rode back to Gen. Stewart with the command, "General, we will charge the Federal line in front." Stewart formed his corps on the right. Gen. Cheatham formed his corps on the left, and on the extreme right, on the Harpeth River, rested Gen. Forrest's cavalry. A cannon on the ridge sounded the signal for the charge. With bayonets fixed the heavy columns, all veterans, marched with a steady and even tread down the slope. The fiercest and bloodiest battle of the centuries was on. I say that because it is a fact that more men were lost in that battle in proportion to the number of troops engaged than in any battle that was ever fought on either continent. Hood's losses were over 40 per cent.

In 1874 a southern soldier, who was in that battle line with Gen. Cleburne, wrote a valuable article on this marvelous charge in the Southern Magazine, then edited by Gen. Basil Duke, of Louisville. I quote a paragraph:

The hottest part of the line was a black-locust thicket just at the right of the Columbia Pike.

This is correct. I was at that part of the line. I have a distinct recollection of that locust thicket, and I can see now, as I saw then, that waving line of shining bayonets as it rushed to the works with that defiant rebel yell, and the mad and murderous conflict that followed. My horse, Firefly, a coal black that I had ridden in many fierce conflicts from Rocky Face to Atlanta, was shot. He fell with a deadening thud. I never knew how many bullets pierced his quivering body. But I was young and spry then and was at the front to witness the culmination of the charge. [Applause.]

On the left of my command the Federal lines gave way. And this is something historical, on which historians have disagreed. Horace Greeley; the Count de Paris; Gov. Cox, of Ohio; Gen. Banks, of Mississippi; Gen. Basil Duke; and John Trotwood Moore, of Tennessee, have written conflicting accounts. I am going to clear that up. On the left of my command the Federal lines gave way. Gen. Cleburne was abreast of that charging line. He fell just at the left of my brigade. As the Confederates rushed on the Federal line of battle a gray figure on a chestnut horse rode diagonally across the front of the charging column. The horse went down within 50 yards of the breastworks. The rider arose, waved his sword, and led his men on foot to the ramparts; then his brave form staggered and fell against the Federal line, pierced with minie balls. His corps was swept back under a terrific fire of musketry, nearly one-half either killed or wounded. This was Gen. Pat Cleburne. [Applause.]

A few yards on the Confederate right Gen. George W. Gordon, of Tennessee, who was also abreast of the charging line, fell just under the fresh earth of the breastworks. He was wounded and captured, as he refused to fall back. Near this spot Gen. John Adams also fell. He stood upon the parapet and was fatally shot, his horse falling across the breastworks. My old friend, Gen. Jack Casement, of Ohio, was commanding a Union brigade where Gen. Adams fell. Deeply touched with his splendid courage, Gen. Casement had cotton brought from the old ginhouse and placed under the dying soldier's head. "You are too brave a man to die," said Casement, "and I wish I could save you." [Applause.] Gen. Carter fell mortally wounded before reaching the Federal battle line. Gen. Strahl reached the ditch; he stood on the bodies of the dead and gave commands and rallied his men. Just in front of my lines, facing the locust thicket, Gen. Cockrell, of Missouri, was wounded, but not fatally. Not a hundred yards away lay Gen. Granbury dead. He died leading the brave Texans to the works. A minute more and Gen. Strahl fell, mortally wounded. Gen. Walthall, of Mississippi, afterwards United States Senator, had two horses shot under him. Twelve Confederate generals were either dead or wounded. Colonels were commanding divisions, captains were commanding brigades.

I am indebted to John Trotwood Moore, of Nashville, Tenn., the well-known poet, historian, and book writer, and author of that great little book "The Bishop of Cottontown," who visited the battle field the day following the battle, for several interesting incidents which I have quoted. More generals were killed in that eight hours' struggle in front of that little Tennessee town than were killed in the two days' fight at Chickamauga or the three days' fight at Gettysburg, where three times as many soldiers were in battle. And let me emphasize this with the statement that more brigadier and major generals were killed at Franklin in that eight hours' fight than in the whole World War of four years and over where nearly 18,000,000 soldiers were in the hell of battle. [Applause.]

The struggle closed at midnight. Our dead lay across and inside the breastworks from river to river. Outside the breastworks, in a wider and thicker line, lay the Confederate dead. Amid the smoke and grime of battle, the dun clouds hiding the stars, the Blue and the Gray looked alike to me. [Applause.] I stood upon the parapet just before midnight and saw all that could be seen. I saw and heard all that my eyes could see or my rent soul could contemplate in such an awful environment.

It was a spectacle to appall the stoutest heart.

A Nashville poet wrote:

Ten thousand men, when the warfare was o'er,
Lay on the battle field crimsoned in gore.

The wounded, shivering in the chilled November air, the heartrending cries of the desperately wounded, and the prayers of the dying filled me with an anguish that no language can describe. From that hour to this I have hated war. [Applause.]

I was colonel, commanding the One hundred and eleventh Ohio, just to the right of the old cotton gin, and just in front of a grove of black locusts. Early in the fight Col. Lowrey, of the One hundred and seventh Illinois, and Col. Leroy Clark, of the One hundred and eighty-third Ohio, were killed, which left me the ranking officer of the battle line of the brigade, which I commanded to the end of the struggle. My regiment suffered, both in officers and men, the largest casualty list of any regiment in the Union Army. [Applause.] I had only 8 officers alive and not wounded in 10 companies. A half century and five years has elapsed since that battle, but I have never even mentioned in any public address the official order of Gen. Orlando H. Moore, of the Second Brigade, issued in camp at Nashville three days after the Battle of Franklin. As my time on earth is but a span, and over half a century has elapsed since this official war order was issued, I feel I will not be accused of egoism in printing a vital extract:

[Extract.]

SECOND BRIGADE, SECOND DIVISION,
TWENTY-THIRD ARMY CORPS,
Nashville, Tenn., December 3, 1864.

The repeated desperate and determined charges of the enemy were every time successfully met, and with a heroism unsurpassed in the annals of war. They advanced but to be driven back with terrible slaughter—they advanced upon a line of steel. The heroic spirit which inspired the whole command was forcibly illustrated by the gallant One hundred and eleventh Regiment of Ohio Infantry (Col. SHERWOOD commanding) on the left flank of the brigade.

When the enemy carried the works on their left, they stood firm and crossed bayonets with them, holding them in check.

(Signed) ORLANDO H. MOORE,
Commanding General.

[Applause, the Members rising.]

During my four years' service I was compelled to witness the agonizing aftermath of over 40 battle fields. I saw the brave and intrepid Gen. Harker go undaunted to his death in the charge on Kenesaw Mountain. Gen. Harker was the idol of his soldiers. I saw that splendid Ohio soldier, Gen. McPherson, the handsomest mounted general in our Army, brought on a stretcher to the left of my command at the Howard House in the Battle of Atlanta, just as his great soul had departed to the unknown world. These many heartrending sights and environments have saddened my life, and I have never voted to involve my beloved country in war when peace with honor was possible and never will. [Applause.] But when the Congress votes war, I shall always be for war, by word and deed, earnestly and with unflagging zeal to the bitter end. [Applause.]

In any crisis or critical time in a battle I hold it is just as vital now as during any previous war that the commanding general be near the front. Gen. Sherman was the commander in chief of the Union Army in the memorable Atlanta campaign. I commanded the brigade skirmishers the day of the Atlanta battle of July 22, 1864, and established a front skirmish line in easy view of the Confederate breastworks. Gen. Sherman came to my outpost and, standing in front of a tree, took out his field glass to survey the Confederate lines. Just then a sharpshooter concealed in the foliage of a tree made a line shot at Gen. Sherman, the bullet piercing the tree about 2 feet above his head. But he never took down his field glass. [Applause.] I called his attention to the fact that the Confederates who were strengthening the earthworks were evidently militia, as they wore white shirts. Gen. Sherman from that vantage point immediately concluded that Confederate Gen. Hood had vacated the trenches and was contemplating some flank attack. He suddenly mounted his horse and rode way. Only a few minutes later the roar of artillery and infantry was heard on our left. Gen. McPherson was killed; our left flank was doubled up in confusion. Gen. John A. Logan, mounted on his war horse, Black Jack, rode to the front, rallied our staggering battalions, and saved our Army. [Applause.]

Again, at Chicamauga, another gallant and intrepid general saved our Army. Maj. Gen. James B. Steadman, of Ohio, came to the front with a division of volunteers in the most critical period of the conflict. Gen. Steadman rode abreast the front of his charging battalions. He snatched the flag of an Illinois regiment, which was wavering under the tremendous fire, and ordered an about face and "follow your general." His horse was shot dead in that hell of fire, and he was thrown over his head and severely stunned. Binding up his bleeding hands he mounted another horse and saved his battle lines. [Applause.]

It will be remembered that Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, commander in chief of the Confederate Army in the fierce battle of Shiloh April 6, 1862, was shot and mortally wounded riding his war horse and rallying the battle lines.

I commanded the brigade skirmish line the day of the battle of Pine Mountain, at the right of Kenesaw, June 14, 1864. I saw the cannon shot fired that killed Lieut. Gen. Leonidas Polk. He was standing close to the Confederate front.

That great Virginian, Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, the idol of the boys behind the guns, appeared, amid wild applause, along the battle lines just before the final charge December 16, 1864, in the three days' battle of Nashville. Sixty pieces of artillery were thundering on our right for three terrible hours. Just before sunset, with long lines of Infantry in line, with bayonets fixed, the grand charge was ordered. When the brigade bugles sounded the advance I looked back to the hill in easy range of the Confederate cannon and saw the heroic figure of our beloved commander sitting calmly on his war horse. I can see him now as I saw him then. The foam hangs from the lips of his tired horse, and his wet limbs are slashed with the bloody slime of the battle field, but around that brow that the gods must have formed a proud Army were wreathing a chaplet of immortality. [Applause.]

In the Battle of Resaca I saw Gen. Joe Hooker in the full uniform of a major general—yellow sash and all the plumes—riding at the extreme front, almost abreast of our advance line. He was mounted on a powerful high-headed bay stallion, red-nostrilled and furious, the most daring and inspiring figure I ever saw on a battle field. [Applause.]

In the Battle of Burnt Hickory, Ga., I saw Maj. Gen. O. O. Howard, the maimed soldier who lost his good right arm in the Battle of Fair Oaks, ride the battle line in the hottest moment of the conflict, enthusing and encouraging the men behind the guns.

I give these heroic incidents to emphasize the contention that a commanding general should always be in the near presence of his army when a battle is on. [Applause.]

In the Meuse-Argonne Battle, in which 1,250,000 American soldiers were engaged, the greatest battle ever fought on either continent, lasting 47 days, with a casualty list of 120,000 killed, wounded, and missing, we did not lose a single general. We had 478 generals in uniform in this great World War, but a benign Providence saved them all for our home and love without a scratch. [Laughter and applause.]

The theory of this remarkable promotion appears to be that while the private soldiers, who did all the fighting, are to have no recognition, the general officers are to have all the glory.

In the Civil War, from '61 to '65, we lost—killed in battle and died of wounds—129 general officers. Of this number 83 were Confederate generals and 46 were Union generals. We lost 12 major generals and the Confederates lost 7. We lost 34 brigadier generals and the Confederates 72.

Their loss was greater than ours because of this fact, that Secretary of War Stanton, instead of making generals commanders of brigades, took the ranking colonel. This was true in all the campaigns in which I participated; and if you will get the fatality lists of colonels you will find that the losses on both sides were about equal. The Confederates lost one general—Albert Sidney Johnston—and three lieutenant generals—Ambrose P. Hill, Thomas J. Jackson (Stonewall Jackson), and Leonidas Polk. I am indebted to Gen. James D. McBride, a careful student of Civil War history, for a detailed list of fatalities among the generals of our armies, which I ask to print with my remarks. It should prove illuminating and interesting to all students of war history.

[The list appears as an appendix.]

As I read history all the great generals in the past won their stars at the battle front. I have some firm convictions, born in the school of sad experience, as to the shining attributes of a war hero. It would seem, however, that I am out of tone with the times. But I am willing to be judged and shall not quake over captious criticism. I venture the opinion that the successor to such great soldiers and generals as Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, and Nelson A. Miles, our greatest living soldier to-day, should be a general recognized everywhere as a brave leader, a nonexploiting patriot, and a great American. [Applause.]

Napoleon, the greatest conquering general of either Europe or Asia, had 17 horses shot under him in battle—the world's record. His favorite war horse was Marengo, an Arab stallion, captured from a Mameluke chief during Napoleon's Egyptian campaign. He was seven times wounded in battle; at Marengo, Austerlitz, Wagram, Jena, twice in the disastrous Russian campaign, and last at Waterloo, when he was wounded in the left hip.

The Duke of Wellington rode his famous war horse Copenhagen in winning Waterloo. The Iron Duke was in the saddle riding the battle lines for 18 hours. At 4 o'clock on June 18, 1815, the Iron Duke dismounted and held his historic interview with the Prussian field marshal, Blucher.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his colleague be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERWOOD. We have made 11 soldiers and generals President of the United States; all generals but two, McKinley and Roosevelt.

George Washington, the first President, was our first commanding general. He had four horses shot under him, always at the front of battles, with many bullet holes in his uniform—four in one battle. [Applause.] When he left Mount Vernon June 30, 1775, to take command of the Continental Army at Cambridge, Mass., he took with him five horses of his own breeding. Afterwards he acquired by gift or purchase seven other war horses. When Gen. Washington first appeared before the ragged Continentals at Cambridge, splendidly mounted, he rode his favorite charger, Fairfax, a 16-hands Virginia thoroughbred, that both enthused the Army and the motley throng of Revolutionary patriots gathered there to see for the first time the hero of the epoch. Fairfax was shot in the Battle of Trenton. Blue Skin, a pure white horse presented to Gen. Washington by Gov. Livingston, of New Jersey, died from exhaustion as Washington rode the battle lines on June 28, 1778, in the Battle of Monmouth.

Our soldier Presidents all had solid battle records—Gen. Washington elected in 1788, Gen. Jackson in 1828, Gen. William H. Harrison in 1840, Gen. Zachary Taylor in 1848, Gen. Franklin Pierce in 1852 (who was twice wounded in the Mexican War), Gen. U. S. Grant in 1868, Gen. Rutherford B. Hayes in 1876, Gen. James A. Garfield in 1880, Gen. Benjamin Harrison in 1888, Maj. William McKinley in 1896, and Col. Theodore Roosevelt in 1900—all had war records—all had served in the battle's front. [Applause.]

I venture the opinion that it would have been more satisfactory to the great body of our overseas soldiers, and to all justice-loving and patriotic American citizens, if the Congress had waited for a calmer period than the present, when public opinion is everywhere in agitation and discussion, before creating a hero and a war idol by national law.

It may be developed later, when the prevailing animosities have calmed and the sunlight of an uncensored publicity illumines those gory battle fields of France, that other heroes may be seen who are entitled to share with Gen. Pershing the tributes of a grateful Nation, even if they did not wear stars. [Applause.] I believe that Congress should, before creating an idol, see to it that this idol is endowed with that democratic spirit of fraternity; of humane comradeship; of that love of equality of manhood, which are the shining qualities in a victorious democracy. [Applause.]

I know the times are full of trouble, that a dominating element in our Government is predicting revolution and havoc. I know there are dun clouds deepening to crimson athwart the sky. I know that the map of the world has been changed, and that we are in the midst of the most momentous epoch of all history. But I believe the future is safe; that democracy under our flag is safe. I believe in the great, brave, patient people. But we need no military idols to make liberty a vibrant quality or democracy a vitalizing force in our national life. [Prolonged applause, the Members rising.]

APPENDIX.

GENERAL OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY KILLED OR DIED OF WOUNDS RECEIVED IN ACTION DURING THE CIVIL WAR BETWEEN APRIL 15, 1861, AND JUNE 1, 1865.

This list of fatalities was obtained from official records by Gen. James D. McBride. It is valuable as an aid in the study of war history.

The Confederate Army lost thirty-eight brigadier generals more than the Union Army, which was due to the policy of Secretary of War Stanton making the ranking colonels commanders of brigades.

[This (*) indicates that the officer graduated at the United States Military Academy.]

The roll of fatalities—46.

Killed in action: Eight major generals, 19 brigadier generals.

LOAN OF MACHINE TOOLS, ETC., TO SCHOOLS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by requiring the War Department to loan certain machine tools and scientific instruments not in use for Government purposes to trade and technical schools and universities, and for other purposes, to disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks to take from the Speaker's table a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to disagree to the Senate amendment and asks for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state whether the Senate amendment was one striking out all after the enacting clause?

Mr. KAHN. It was.

Mr. WALSH. One amendment?

Mr. KAHN. One amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KAHN, Mr. MCKENZIE, and Mr. CALDWELL.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION FOR POSTAL EMPLOYEES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on House joint resolution 151, to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the conference report on House joint resolution 151, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to have the report read?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think the Clerk had better read both the report and the statement. They are short.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report and statement of the House conferees, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making appropriations therefor having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That because of the unusual conditions which now exist, the compensation provided for in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920,' approved February 28, 1919, the following classes of employees shall be increased as follows for such fiscal year only:

"(a) Postmasters at offices of the third class; assistant postmasters and clerks, including clerks at division headquarters of post-office inspectors, special clerks, finance clerks, bookkeepers, printers, mechanics, skilled laborers, watchmen, messengers, laborers, and other employees of offices of the first and second class; letter carriers in the City Delivery Service; employees in Government-owned automobile service; supervisory officials, inspectors, railway postal clerks, including substitutes, superintendents, requisition fillers, packers, and laborers; the agent in charge, clerks, and messengers at the United States Stamped Envelope Agency, Dayton, Ohio; and employees of the mail equipment shop who receive compensation at the rate per annum of—

"(1) Not less than $1,000 nor more than $1,200, to be increased $200.

"(2) More than $1,200 and not more than $1,600, to be increased $150.

"(3) More than $1,600 and not more than $2,000, to be increased $125.

"(4) More than $2,000 and not more than $2,500, to be increased $100.

"Provided, That no third-class postmaster shall receive more than $2,000 per annum.

"(b) Carriers in the village delivery service, and other employees paid from lump-sum appropriations, receiving compensation at the rate of less than $1,000 per annum, to be increased 20 per centum of their present compensation.

"(c) Rural letter carriers on daily routes and rural letter carriers on two triweekly routes whose routes are—

"(1) Eleven miles or less in length, to be increased $75.

"(2) Over 11 miles and under 20 miles in length, to be increased $100.

"(3) Twenty miles and under 24 miles in length, to be increased $150.

"(4) Twenty-four miles or over in length, to be increased $200.

"(d) Rural letter carriers on triweekly routes of—

"(1) Eleven miles or less in length, to be increased $37.50.

"(2) Over 11 miles and under 20 miles in length, to be increased $50.

"(3) Twenty miles and under 24 miles in length, to be increased $75.

"(4) Twenty-four miles or over in length, to be increased $100.

"(e) Postmasters at offices of the fourth class to be increased by an amount equal to 15 per cent of their present compensation.

"(f) Substitute, temporary, and auxiliary clerks at first and second class post offices, and substitute, temporary, and auxiliary letter carriers in the City Delivery Service, shall receive after the passage of this act, for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, in lieu of their present compensation, a compensation of 60 cents per hour for each hour of service performed.

"SEC. 2. That the above-mentioned increases in compensation shall apply to officers and employees in the Postal Service at the time of the passage of this act, and be effective as of July 1, 1919, or as of such subsequent date when such officers or employees entered the Postal Service: Provided, That as to substitute, temporary, and auxiliary employees, and employees paid from lump-sum appropriations, the increases shall be effective from and after the date of the passage of this act: And provided further, That none of the increases provided herein shall be applicable to officers and employees who have received an increase in their compensation of more than $300 per annum during the current fiscal year.

"SEC. 3. That no post office shall be advanced to the next higher class as a result of the increases in compensation of postmasters herein provided.

"SEC. 4. That in order to provide for the increased compensation herein authorized, so much as is necessary is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supplement the amounts appropriated for the various classes of employees herein mentioned, in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920,' approved February 28, 1919."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreement of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) entitled "Joint resolution to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service, and making an appropriation therefor," submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees as to said amendment:

The Senate amendment struck out all of the original resolution after the resolving clause and inserted new matter, entirely rewriting the bill. This included the same employees as covered by the original resolution, and in addition thereto enumerated employees in the Government-owned automobile service, railway substitute clerks, the assistant agent and clerks at the postal stamp agency, Dayton, Ohio, and employees of the mail-equipment shop. The House made a flat increase of $150 for all. The Senate amendment divided the employees into those receiving $1,000 or less per annum, who were increased $240; second, those receiving $1,100 or $1,200, who were increased $200; third, those receiving $1,300, $1,400, $1,500, or $1,600, who were increased $150, the same increase as provided in the House bill; and those receiving $1,700 to $2,500, who were increased $100, reducing the House figure by $50; and those receiving more than $2,500 per annum, who receive no increase.

The House receded from its disagreement to the $240 increase with an amendment making an increase of $200 to employees receiving $1,000, $1,100, and $1,200. The Senate agreed to the House provision of $150 increase as to employees of $1,300, $1,400, $1,500, and $1,600. As to employees receiving more than $1,600 and not more than $2,000, the House accepted the $125 increase proposed by the Senate, and likewise the House accepted $100 increase for employees receiving more than $2,000 and not more than $2,500, proposed by the Senate.

Village delivery carriers and other employees paid out of lump-sum appropriations receiving compensation of less than $1,000 per annum are given 20 per cent increase, instead of the $150 provided in the House bill.

Rural carriers on routes 11 miles or less in length under the conference measure are to be increased $75; on routes over 11 miles and under 20 miles, $100 increase; on routes of 20 miles and under 24 miles, $150 increase; on routes 24 miles and over, $200 increase; and carriers on triweekly routes are increased one-half of these amounts. This is an increase on all routes of 24 miles and over of $50.

Fourth-class postmasters, who under the House bill were to receive 10 per cent, are increased 15 per cent under the present measure.

The compensation of substitute, temporary, and auxiliary clerks and carriers was increased from 40 cents to 60 cents an hour in the House bill and remains so in the present measure.

In section 2 of the Senate amendment the increases were made retroactive, so as to take effect as of July 1, 1919. As agreed to in conference this provision is modified by a proviso that, as to substitute, temporary, and auxiliary clerks at first and second class post offices, and substitute, temporary, and auxiliary letter carriers in the City Delivery Service, and other employees paid from lump-sum appropriations, the increases shall be effective from and after the date of the passage of the act. There is also a further proviso that none of the increases provided for shall be applicable to officers or employees who have received an increase in their compensation of more than $300 during the current fiscal year.

Section 3 provides that no post office shall be advanced to the next higher class as a result of increases in compensation to postmasters herein provided for.

Section 4 makes the appropriation required to meet the increases.

H. STEENERSON,
MARTIN B. MADDEN,
W. W. GRIEST,
JOHN A. MOON,
THOS. M. BELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think this report and statement include everything that needs to be said. I want to add, however, that the bill as passed by the House, giving an increase of $150 to each employee, was estimated to carry about $40,000,000. I stated in my report, I believe, that I thought it would be about $38,000,000. The Senate proposition was estimated to carry a little over $41,000,000. The conferees, after considering these two propositions, succeeded in reducing the amount required for these increases by a considerable sum, so that the present bill as recommended by the conferees carries, it is estimated, only about $35,500,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I notice that the House provision with regard to fourth-class postmasters was changed by the Senate, the Senate proposing, in addition to the 15 per cent increase to be allowed to fourth-class postmasters, that where the office was situated in a separate, distinct building not used for any other purpose, such fourth-class postmaster should be allowed $50 a quarter to pay for rent, light, and fuel; in other words, $12.50 a month to cover rent, light, and fuel for a building used for no other purpose than post-office business.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman's statement is not quite correct.

Mr. BLANTON. I notice that the conferees have taken that provision out of the bill. Why was that done?

Mr. RUCKER. Before the gentleman from Minnesota answers the question, will he yield to me for one moment?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from Texas is slightly in error. The amendment put on the House bill in the Senate provided that in all cases where the post office is kept in a room or building in which no other business is conducted, a reasonable sum shall be allowed for rent, light, and fuel.

Mr. BLANTON. Not to exceed $50 a quarter.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, that is practically the same thing; it was not exceeding $12.50 a month, and it occurred to me that that was as little as Congress could allow a postmaster for furnishing a separate building, which could not be used for anything else, and even that little stipend was taken away by the conferees, as shown by the conference report.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say that the conferees went carefully over that proposition, and they concluded it would be practically impossible to administer the provision referred to, and besides, the fourth-class postmasters are well taken care of already.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman let me call his attention to another case?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am trying to answer the gentleman's question. The postmasters of the fourth class are now receiving—those that receive $75 a quarter, or $300 a year, are by law given the first 100 per cent of that amount; that is, they are getting it all. The last appropriation bill gave them 20 per cent in addition. So that fourth-class postmasters who receive $300 a year get $60 more than the total receipts of the office. In addition to that we have now increased the allowance 15 per cent. So that the conferees thought there should be no further increase by allowance for rent in these small offices which are mostly in residences. I, perhaps, have as many in my district as has the gentleman from Texas. Some receive, perhaps, $20 a quarter in revenue. They are kept in the man's house. Of course, if they had an inducement like this they could easily put a lean-to on the house and get up to $50 additional for that.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a more serious case which I wish to call the gentleman's attention to for a moment.

Mr. STEENERSON. The fact is the conferees agreed that it was not wise to give them this allowance.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman let me call attention to a very serious case that has occurred in my district? A post office there which less than a year ago had about 400 people or less, to-day, by reason of large oil wells which have developed there, now has a population of about 25,000 people. Now——

Mr. STEENERSON. I decline to yield further. That is taken care of in another appropriation in an item for unusual conditions. The gentleman can get the allowance now from the department.

Mr. BLANTON. But the department says that this man has no remedy whatever.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is an appropriation for unusual conditions, and that is a case of that kind. I should be very glad if large oil wells developed in my district.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman give me two minutes to call attention to something he does not know about?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The department told me that they had called the attention of the Post Office Committee to the fact that the present law and regulations for postmasters required that this postmaster, until recently of the fourth class, should continue to work in a town of 25,000 inhabitants for $1,000 a year for a whole year and until the year expired before they could increase his salary a single cent.

That is something the Post Office Committee does not seem to know, and the gentleman does not seem to realize the fact that the department has compelled that postmaster to work a whole year in a town of 25,000 people, to furnish service to that whole population, at a salary of only $1,000, and that postmasters have resigned three different times. They have had three different men in charge and can not get a man now to take the position.

Mr. STEENERSON. In reply to the gentleman, the gentleman seems to know about this extraordinary case, but takes no note of the good fortune to have oil wells developed——

Mr. BLANTON. But it is not the good fortune of the postmaster who has to run a first-class post office a whole year for $1,000 salary.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman let me have a minute? It is not every locality that has the good fortune to have an oil well. We did not know anything about that. We went on the assumption that every locality in the United States had a Congressman, and if he had a grievance like this he should come before the committee and present his case. The gentleman from Texas has never appeared before the Post Office Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. I have worn out three pairs of shoes going to the department about it, and Mr. Elsworth advised me that he had requested such emergency authorization from your committee.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. MOON. I ask the gentleman to yield in order to ask the gentleman from Texas what are the receipts of that office?

Mr. BLANTON. The receipts show for the last quarter that it is a first-class office, and the postmaster is now receiving a salary of only $1,000 a year to handle this mail for 25,000 people, and there is no law to give him more.

Mr. MOON. It will ripen into a first-class office and he will get the salary.

Mr. BLANTON. Maybe he will get it if he lives long enough.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Texas knows very well that the talk he is making has no place in this bill and that the condition he speaks of can not be remedied in this report.

Mr. BLANTON. The Post Office Department told me that it had called the attention of the committee to this emergency and asked for an increased appropriation, and the committee would not give it to them.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman is stating the facts.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a fact, the Post Office Department told me, and if I am not mistaken the gentleman over there was present.

Mr. MADDEN. The Post Office Department already has all the appropriation it needs for these emergency cases.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further. The House included, as we believe, all employees in the Postal Service who are entitled to consideration, but upon reflection we agreed with the Senate to add the employees in the Government automobile service, substitute clerks, assistant agents and clerks at the postal stamp agency, Dayton, Ohio, and the employees of the mail-equipment shop. All of these employees were not included in the House bill; for one reason, they are lump-sum employees, paid a salary fixed by the department, and not by Congress, but we agreed and they are included in this bill.

As I said, the conference measure here recommended reduced the appropriation required to make these increases, and we have estimated the amount at $35,500,000. We have increased those who are paid the smallest salaries the most. Those receiving $1,000 and $1,100 and $1,200 have been increased by $200 instead of $150, as proposed by the House bill. All those receiving more than $1,200 and up to $1,600 under this bill will receive $150, the same as carried in the bill as it passed the House. Those who receive more than $1,600 and up to $2,000 are given $125 increase, and those receiving between $2,000 and up to $2,500, $100 increase. All of those above $2,500 are omitted from the bill.

I want to say a word about that omission. The conferees yielded to the Senate on that point, because it was contended that this is an emergency measure, and that we should not include those whose salaries were as high as $2,500 and more, because it could not be claimed that it was necessary to increase their compensation on account of the cost of living. I want to say, however, that there is no class of employees that has borne the heavy strain of recent times in the Postal Service more worthily or well than the supervisory employees. The testimony before the Joint Commission to Investigate Postal Salaries has been that the eligible lists in all of the large cities have been exhausted, that they have been compelled to take in substitute, temporary, and auxiliary carriers and clerks, without any examination by the Civil Service Commission. Necessarily they have brought in thousands of men who were hardly prepared for this skilled service, and the burden of training and putting them in shape to do efficient work has fallen upon the supervisory officials. However, they have made no complaint about that, and, as I say, we yielded to the Senate provision in that regard. These increases are simply for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. As to those employees who are on the statutory roll, whose compensation has been fixed by Congress, it is retroactive to the 1st day of July, but as to all those paid out of the lump-sum appropriations, whose compensation is determined in the discretion of the department, the compensation is not retroactive.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman is now speaking of employees paid out of a lump sum?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Like the village delivery carriers?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Receiving a compensation at the rate of less than $1,000 per annum?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. To be increased 20 per cent?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. As I recall, the village delivery carriers who are paid less than $1,000 a year have had, under some other legislation, a bonus allowed to them. What I want to know is this: Is the 20 per cent increase computed upon the salary and bonus together?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, yes; according to the bill reported by the conferees, this is in addition to the compensation that these employees are now receiving.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me present it in this way: A village delivery carrier is getting $60 a month salary and $10 a month bonus. Is the 20 per cent increase computed upon the $60 or upon the $70?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will answer in this way: I have here the official circular of the department with reference to village delivery, and they say that the annual salary of the carriers during the present fiscal year—that is, the village carriers—will be as follows: Where the salary is $600, with a 20 per increase, it will be $720; during the second year, where it is $690, with a 20 per cent increase, it will amount to $828; and the third year, with $780, with a 20 per cent increase, it makes $936 compensation, which they are now receiving. Here is what it will be under the conference bill. Is that what the gentleman wants?

Mr. RUCKER. Take the last salary which is mentioned, that of a man who has been in the service for three years, whose salary plus the bonus or increase is $936. Will the 20 per cent allowed in this bill be computed on the $936 or on the $780?

Mr. STEENERSON. It is based on the total compensation.

Mr. RUCKER. On the $936?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; and I have here a computation that gives the salary of each as it will be under the conference report: Present salary $936, 20 per cent increase, $1,123.20.

Mr. RUCKER. That answers the question.

Mr. STEENERSON. I might say further to the gentleman that there is a limitation, as he will notice in the bill, that no employee's salary shall be increased if he has already received an increase of $300 during the year; but I do not think that applies to village delivery carriers.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Did not the original bill as it passed the House provide for a straight $150 increase in the salaries of the rural carriers?

Mr. STEENERSON. It did.

Mr. BRIGGS. What was the reason for the committee cutting that down as it appears to have done in the conference report?

Mr. STEENERSON. The reason is that there are two classes of rural carriers. There are carriers who have a standard route of 24 miles, and there are carriers who have a route of a less number of miles. The statutory compensation of all these carriers who have less than 24 miles is graded down in the original compensation act, so that if a man has only 11 miles, he is paid about half what he would be paid if he had 24. There is another class of carriers that carry only triweekly, and, of course, it would not be right to pay a man the same who did that as one who carried daily.

Mr. BRIGGS. Did not the House in its action on this matter make a straight, horizontal increase of $150?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is true; but the conferees agreed to change it.

Mr. BRIGGS. Was it not due to the fact that the high cost of living was so great that that increase they thought was justified by the demands and the necessities which fell on these rural carriers, in view of the small amounts they receive under existing law?

Mr. STEENERSON. The reason was because of the rise in the cost of living, and in addition to that was the extraordinary increase in the cost of maintenance of equipment of rural carriers. But it would not be fair to give the same increase. The man who carries 12 miles should not have the same as a man who carries 24 miles, and should not have the same increase, so we suggested what we thought was equitable and just.

Mr. BRIGGS. This condition, of course, obtains in a great many country districts where roads are not frequently good, and it frequently takes longer to go 12 miles than it does to go 24. In my district in many parts where the roads are very difficult of travel it takes a great deal of time and effort to get over those roads and carry the mail. And in other cases where the roads are very much better the person makes, perhaps, even longer distance in a shorter time, and yet he gets much more increase under this conference report.

Mr. STEENERSON. As a matter of public policy I do not think the United States Government has ever undertaken to reward a community for its poor roads, but we treat them alike and pay them the same.

Mr. BRIGGS. But I am speaking about the fact that if a man's time is all taken up, not on a mileage basis, but if his time is all taken up in carrying the mails, the increase, of course, ought to be the same as for the other man, as in cities there is no discrimination against a man who traverses the route of a city carrier of 12 blocks and a man who traverses 30 or 40 blocks.

Mr. STEENERSON. We contend that we have adjusted it fairly for the amount of service they perform, and the gentleman, I think, upon reflection will agree with us.

So many questions have been asked me recently about the compensation of postal employees and postmasters that I have thought it useful to compile the information in a series of statements and tables, which I will insert in the RECORD.

First, there is a statement showing the number of employees. Next, a statement in regard to third-class postmasters and their compensation and allowances; then fourth-class postmasters and their compensation, with illustrations. Then there is a memorandum from the First Assistant Postmaster General showing a computation by the department of the increased cost to the service of the increases provided for in the conference bill and a recapitulation thereof. Then follows a memorandum showing the number of officials and employees who are not included in the bill, whose salaries exceed $2,500 per annum. Then there are the official rules of the department covering the compensation of village delivery carriers; then a computation of the proposed increases of these village delivery carriers. Then follows a computation of the amount of the increases under the plan first proposed by the Senate.

From an examination of the department figures in the above statements it will be noted that the increases provided for in the conference measure amount to $35,698,400, as against $41,528,509 under the first proposition of the Senate, a saving of nearly $6,000,000.

	Approximately.
Total number of employees in the Postal Service	300,000
Number of employees included in the conference measure, including substitute clerks and carriers	185,400
Balance	114,600
Of this remainder of postal employees, there are:
First-class postmasters	665
Second-class postmasters	2,539
(The others are persons employed by third and fourth class postmasters, but of whom the department has no record, and contractors, etc.)
The number of persons employed in the Postal Service who are paid from lump-sum appropriations is	130,962
The number of statutory employees is	54,438

THIRD-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

The present compensation of third-class postmasters is determined under section 270 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, being from $1,000 per annum, where the gross receipts are $1,900 and not exceeding $2,100, increasing in even hundreds of dollars up to where the gross receipts are $7,000 and not exceeding $8,000, the salary in such case being $1,900.

In addition to this compensation, the third-class postmasters are allowed 3 cents each for the issuance of money orders, and there are several other minor allowances for the performance of extra duties, and in addition to this there is an allowance to cover the cost of clerical service based on the salary of the postmaster, as follows:

Postmaster's salary:	Allowance.
$1,000, $1,100, $1,200	$450
$1,300, $1,400, $1,500	600
$1,600, $1,700	750
$1,800, $1,900	1,200

The clerk-hire allowances above, contained in the act approved February 28, 1919, are 50 per cent higher than any previous allowances; and also that act provides for assistant postmasters to be paid a maximum salary of $900 in offices of the third class, where the postmasters' salaries are $1,800 or $1,900 per annum. Note: Such assistant postmasters are probably included in the class of lump-sum employees who are to receive 20 per cent increase. There is a lump-sum appropriation of $600,000 for their basic pay.

FOURTH-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

Postmasters of the fourth class embrace all those whose annual compensation, exclusive of their commissions on money orders, amounts to less than $1,000.

Their compensation is fixed upon the basis of the whole of the box rents collected and commissions upon canceled postage-due stamps and on postage stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards canceled, on matter actually mailed at their offices, and on amounts received from waste paper, dead newspapers, printed matter, and twine sold.

By the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 602), this compensation was fixed at 100 per cent of the first $50 or less per quarter, 60 per cent of the next $100 per quarter, 50 per cent of the next $200 per quarter, and 40 per cent of the balance for that quarter.

By the act of July 2, 1918, this was changed, as follows: 100 per cent of the first $80 or less per quarter (the other percentages remaining the same as above).

By the act of February 28, 1919, this was again changed, as follows: 100 per cent of the first $100 or less per quarter (the other percentages remaining the same as above).

And in addition to this the last-mentioned act provides that where the compensation of a fourth-class postmaster does not exceed $75 per quarter for any one quarter he shall receive an increase of 20 per cent of the compensation allowed under existing law. Now, the conference measure provides for an increase in the salaries of fourth-class postmasters by an amount equal to 15 per cent of their present compensation, which will be 10 per cent of such compensation for the present or current year, because as lump-sum employees their pay increase will date from the date of the passage of the act, which will probably be about November 1, leaving eight months for which they will receive an increase of 15 per cent.

Attached hereto are four examples of increases in pay of fourth-class postmasters.

VILLAGE DELIVERY SERVICE,
POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington.

POSTMASTER: The basic entrance salary of village carriers is at the rate of $600 per annum, and after one year's satisfactory service an increase of $90, making $690 per annum, is allowed. After two years' satisfactory service, $90 additional, making $780 per annum, is granted. In addition to the foregoing, during the current fiscal year, which ends June 30, 1920, an increase of 20 per cent is provided for the salary of village carriers by the terms of an act of Congress.

Accordingly, the annual salary of carriers during the present fiscal year is as follows:

$720 ($600 and 20 per cent) to those serving their first year.

$828 ($690 and 20 per cent) to those who have completed one year's service.

$936 ($780 and 20 per cent) to those who have completed two years' service.

The increase of $90, above mentioned, is allowed at the beginning of the first quarter after the completion of service of one or two years, as the case may be.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman has finished, I would like to discuss this proposition.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman desire that I yield him some time; if so, how much?

Mr. BLACK. About 10 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield the gentleman from Texas 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I think the House would naturally be interested in considering what relations the expenditures of the Post Office Department for the present fiscal year will bear to the estimated receipts. The appropriation bill which we passed in February of this year, and which is for the fiscal year 1920, carried an aggregate appropriation of something more than $400,000,000. Those figures did not include the $200,000,000 which we appropriated for the building of good roads and which, of course, has no connection with the Post Office Department. Now, the adoption of the present conference report and the resolution to which it relates will undoubtedly entail an additional appropriation, and does make an additional appropriation of something over $35,000,000, anywhere from that amount to about $38,000,000. Therefore the expenditures for the Post Office Department for the present fiscal year will be around $440,000,000. Now, the inquiry naturally arises, or ought to arise, in the minds of Members of Congress, What relation will the receipts of the Post Office Department for this fiscal year bear to the total amount of expenditure? In December, 1918, when we had up our appropriation bill for the present fiscal year in the House, I made a speech in which, in discussing the salary increase which it carried, I estimated that the total amount of the deficit for this year would be $25,000,000. That prediction was made upon the basis that for the last several years our increased postal receipts have been around 5 per cent each year. Now, if that calculation of mine that the percentage increase in postal receipts for the fiscal year of 1920 would be the usual average of 5 per cent over the year before had been correct, $25,000,000 or thereabouts would have been the deficit, not counting the $38,000,000 carried in this resolution, and we would have a prospective deficit around $60,000,000 for the present fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Let me complete the statement and then I will yield. I am glad to state, however, that the present rate of increase in postal receipts over the normal average is much higher than the average, and since the beginning of the fiscal year the receipts have been around 12 or 15 per cent higher than the normal average, and I think we can safely estimate and safely count that they will be at least 10 per cent higher for this year and probably as high as 12 per cent. And if this is true, then, basing the estimate of increase over last year's receipts, we ought to have total receipts this year of $413,000,000, and that would leave us a deficit, a prospective deficit, of about $25,000,000. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has answered the question I had in mind.

Mr. BLACK. I thought probably I would, and that was the reason I asked to complete the statement. Therefore we can expect that this year the Post Office Department, instead of having a surplus, as has been the case during most of the years of Postmaster General Burleson's administration, will have a deficit of $25,000,000. Now, I am one of those——

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. The evidence before the joint postal commission from postmasters was that in the large cities, notably New York, the receipts during the late months have been practically the same as they were when the letter postage was 3 cents, and they figure that the amount of that increased postage for war purposes amounted to 17 per cent, possibly. Now, if their testimony is true, then the increase during the last four or five months must have been about 17 per cent, which would not give a deficit at all.

Mr. BLACK. I will state that the figures I have reviewed—and I reviewed them in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster General—do not indicate that the increase will be as high as 17 per cent, but that the increase will be at least 12 per cent and possibly higher, and that, of course, reduces the prospective deficit to where it will surely be not more than $25,000,000, and probably not so much. No one is more pleased than I that the pendulum is swinging toward a smaller deficit than at first seemed possible. But what I was about to say when I yielded to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] was this, that while I do not advocate that the Post Office Department should be a profit-making institution, I have always advocated that it be made self-sustaining, as near as possible, and I think we might well consider the fact of the impending deficit in connection with some of the demands which are being made upon us for postal expenditures. And in this connection I want to make mention of the agitation that is now going on for the repeal of the zone postage law. We are all receiving propaganda every day about that matter. I received a marked editorial yesterday headed, in bold outlines, "Repeal the infamous zone postage law." Well, now, I contend that any law that simply seeks to collect for a service from the one who uses such service a fair proportion of the cost of that service is neither wrong nor infamous, and I further contend that any man who now advocates a repeal of the zone postage law, in the face of the fact that no one will contend that it anything like pays the cost of handling such mail matter, is either selfishly interested or is indifferent to the question of our public expenditures, because even with the collection of the new rates provided by the war-revenue law it amounted to an increase last year of only about $5,000,000, will make an increase this year of about $10,000,000, will make an increase next year of about $15,000,000, and a final increase in the fourth year of about $20,000,000, and even with these increases the receipts from that class of mail matter will be far short of paying for the service rendered. No one that is halfway posted on postal affairs will contend that the Post Office Department is self-sustaining, so far as second-class mail matter is concerned, even with the zone postage rates in full force.

And in the face of the certain deficit that now confronts us Congress should turn a deaf ear, and I believe it will turn a deaf ear, to all of this propaganda and agitation that is being carried on by certain newspapers and magazines for the repeal of the zone postage law. I predict that the law is here to stay, for the very sufficient reason that it is right and just.

Now, another thing that we might well consider at this time in connection with a discussion of postal matters is the cost of the transportation of the mails. I call your attention to the fact that the rates that we are now operating on, known as the space-basis rates, were made by Congress before the war, and the law in which these rates were carried gave the railroads the right to appeal the question to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they have carried it there and it is now pending before that commission. And while I would not venture a prediction as to what that body will decide as to the merits of the question, yet I do say that in the face of an increase of 25 per cent in the freight rates of the country, and of 50 per cent in the passenger rates, and still a deficit in the operation of the transportation systems, we can hardly expect the mail service to be operated on the present basis for very long.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman from Minnesota allow me two minutes to complete my statement?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 23 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. Now, if the Interstate Commerce Commission should grant an increase in the charges for transporting mail equal to that which has been made for transporting the freight of the country, that would entail an additional expenditure on the Postal Service of at least $15,000,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the case pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission not only involves the amount of pay that will be just under the space plan but involves the whole space plan, and whether we should pay on the weight basis as the old law provided, and that involves back pay as far as 1916, involving perhaps thirty or forty or fifty million dollars?

Mr. BLACK. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that fact, because it is a matter which should not be left out of consideration in discussing these matters.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact, because it might reduce some of the surplus we have been boasting of heretofore.

Mr. BLACK. Well, I am glad that we have had the surpluses and congratulate the country on having a Postmaster General that believes in economy and evidences his belief by running his department within the limits of its receipts whenever that is possible. The reason I am discussing these matters, which might for the moment appear irrelevant to this conference report, is because of the fact that we now have a commission from the House and the Senate investigating the question of postal salaries with a view to reporting recommendations at the December session looking to permanent readjustments. And I have the utmost confidence in that commission. But the reason I am calling attention to these things is that demands are being made of that commission which, if they are acceded to in their full measure, why, even postage at 3 cents for first-class mail will not begin to take care of the deficit. And that is why I think we might well consider these facts at this time.

I believe that the Government should be a fair and just employer but not an extravagant one. I believe that the increases which we are providing in this present resolution meet the measure of this test, at least as a temporary measure. What the commission of which I have spoken will recommend in its report to the Congress I do not know, but I have confidence to believe that it will keep in mind a well-balanced regard for both the Government and the employees who are to be affected. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not ordinarily take up the time of the House in the discussion of matters not before us for consideration. I should not do so now except for some statements of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] relative to the zone postal system. As a Member of the Congress that provided for the zone system for periodicals and newspapers, I should not be justified perhaps in referring to it as infamous, but if I were not a Member of the body that passed the act and were expressing my opinion relative to it, I should be tempted to say emphatically that it was infamous; and not only infamous, but in its effect, if it should remain on the statute books in the running of the years, harmful to a degree that we can not now realize.

If there is any one tendency that above all others we must constantly combat it is the tendency to provincialism. If there is any one sentiment above all others that it is our duty to encourage it is that of nationalism. If we do not maintain here under our flag a homogeneous people, actuated in the main by the same sentiments, holding in the main to the same views, guided by sound principles, we can not maintain a free government; we can not maintain here institutions of freedom and justice and liberty. And anything that tends to make us provincial, any legislation that has that effect, is a crime against the Republic and against the liberties of the world, as the hope of the world lies in the Republic.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment.

And I know of nothing, I can think of nothing, that would have so harmful an effect in the running of the years toward making us a provincial people as the building up of provincial and limited centers and circles of thought and view here, there, and elsewhere in the Republic.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. And the gentleman who views this matter from the standpoint of revenue has lost sight of the tremendously important fundamental propositions that lie at the base of it. If the postal rate is not high enough, make it high enough. If it is the proper thing to have newspapers and magazines pay their way, and the rate is not high enough, let us raise the rate. But let us avoid, as we would avoid the plague, the policy under which a man in Texas receives his information, his news, gets his ideas, largely from the immediately surrounding section, under which a man in Wyoming has to pay an extra tax, for if he secures the views of the east or west coast, a system under which, in the course of time, we will build up in various portions of the Republic local provincial centers of idea, view, and fashion.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Limited local centers of sentiment, of information, and of view.

I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Is the gentleman aware that the majority of the newspapers in his own State have indorsed this law, and does he call that provincial?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I do think it provincial, and I have so advised them.

Mr. RANDALL of California. The gentleman is aware that the National Editorial Association has indorsed it?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not care who has indorsed it or whence the indorsement came. I know some gentlemen who run local papers imagine that it is to their advantage to have a policy established and maintained under which local people must read their papers, and can not read papers published elsewhere, because they cost too much. But I can not base my views, I can not hold views from the viewpoint of selfish interest. And I care not who holds to the contrary.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I hold it is a matter of tremendously important national policy, not to be determined from the standpoint of individual interest——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). Not to be determined from the standpoint of revenues, but to be determined from the standpoint of the good of the American people.

I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman, of course, knows that there is no zone postage rate on the reading matter in the magazines?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no. There is a complicated system under which the reading matter falls under one classification and the advertisements under another.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think that the advertising matter is a commercial proposition or an educational one?

Mr. MONDELL. I am rather inclined to think that good advertising, well displayed, has an educational value; that while the reading matter is more important, there is some value in a nation-wide circulation of good advertisements——

Mr. MADDEN. Drawn by an artist.

Mr. MONDELL. But that is not the proposition. By placing an additional rate on advertising it is hoped and expected by certain gentlemen that zones will be built up in which they may make money by increasing the circulation of their local newspapers. I have no quarrel with that view from their personal pecuniary standpoint, but from the standpoint of the Nation and its interests we should have a flat rate. It should be possible to secure in any part of this Nation as freely and cheaply as in any other part of the Nation the journals that inform and instruct the people of the country.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is nothing in this conference report that needs very much discussion. A motion for the previous question on agreeing to the conference report might very well be made now.

But I want to suggest that I think my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who has spoken on the question of the zone system, is not, to say the least of it, in accord with his brethren in the House on that question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And he is in error as to the character of the bill that we passed. That bill, providing for a zone system, was practically passed unanimously in this House. The gentleman from Wyoming voted for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now he says that that was an "infamous bill," that he would say so if Congress had not passed it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman say that I voted for the zone postal law?

Mr. MOON. It is my understanding that the gentleman did. If he did not, I will correct my statement.

Mr. MONDELL. That is a mistake. I opposed it, and I have always talked against it.

Mr. MOON. Very well. I will withdraw that statement. The gentleman did not vote on the bill, he says. Did he vote on the conference report on the bill? Did he vote on the conference report in favor of that bill?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has been here long, and he knows that is pure rot.

Mr. MOON. Oh, the gentleman can not dodge that question. I say he voted for the conference report on the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I am opposed to the zone system.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman has denounced a measure passed by this House as "infamous," and says that but for the fact that he is a Member of the House he would say that the bill is "infamous" now. Let the gentleman take the position that he wants to. If he wants to place himself in the class of infamous legislators on public questions, it is his privilege to do it. But I deny that it is his right to place the whole membership of this House in that class of infamy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But aside from that, Mr. Speaker, the objection that the gentleman makes to the zone system is that it is parochial; that it is provincial; that it does not build up nationality. Mr. Speaker, is it parochial or provincial for a man who hauls a load for a thousand miles to charge more for it than is charged by a man who hauls the same load 1 mile? That is the issue in this zone system. Can this Government carry 100 tons of mail across the continent as cheaply as it can carry it 150 miles, or can carry it 300 miles as cheaply as 150 miles, or 600 miles as cheaply as 300 miles? That is the issue in this zone question. It is compensation for service performed. The railroads charge the Government full pay. Why should the Government of the United States carry the mails for these publishers at less than the railroads carry them for? Why should that bounty be given to the publishers? There is no reason for it. There is no sense in it. Take, for example, a certain publication: This Government pays $49,000 a year for its transportation and receives in revenue from it less than $5,000. Is the gentleman willing to appropriate $44,000 for them from his Government?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Why does he not raise the flat rate on these publications?

Mr. MOON. The flat rate is not the proper thing to raise on these publications. The zone rate is the scientific way of doing it, and to say that the zone rate is evidence of provincialism as distinguished from nationalism is the purest nonsense.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Government of the United States a few years ago carried ever-increasing weights of this second-class matter, 2,450,000,000 pounds, at a loss of $85,000,000 to the Government of the United States, and that with respect to publications which in many instances were clearing as profits from $100,000 to millions of dollars; and yet the gentleman from Wyoming, professing to talk in the interests of the people, professing to speak in the interest of nationality, comes here and tells us that this subsidy should be continued to these publishers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We ought to raise the zone rate. That is the only mistake we have made. We ought to put it at the cost of transportation. We do not desire to make any money on the publications, but the reason for the policy of ever allowing a lower rate to newspapers and magazines was the supposed educational benefit to be derived from the circulation of these publications. That is not affected by the zone system, so far as the reading matter is concerned, but the purely commercial feature of the proposition, the advertisements, out of which they get money and derive great profits, are the things that are taxed, and that is the thing that the gentleman from Wyoming proposes to protect—the commercial interests of these publishers against the educational interest and the material interest of the people of this Government. We can not continue this policy with justice to the people. If second-class mail matter is made to pay approximately within 20 per cent of what it costs to carry it, you may pass this bill, you may meet the oncoming deficiency in the Treasury which has been spoken of and still have a surplus of money that belongs to the people, or that by justice and right ought to be theirs by law, of more than $20,000,000 in the next fiscal year.

Passing away from this question, which, of course, I can not fully discuss in 10 minutes, I want to say in reference to the measure before the House, the conference report, that it is not an effort to fix accurately or scientifically the salaries of these officers. It is only an emergency proposition to meet the present conditions. The bill that will come in later from the commission on the subject of salaries will be the result of a long-extended hearing upon this question. This is a measure intended to bridge over and give relief only temporarily. We have taken the lowest salaried people and given them an increase of $200. As the salaries rise we have reduced the amount of increase, the amounts being $150, $125, and $100 for the men drawing regular salaries. For the men working as substitutes and on lump-sum appropriations there has been an increase of about 20 per cent and on fourth-class postmasters about 15 per cent. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from Tennessee yielded back some time.

The SPEAKER. He yielded back three minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. That makes seven minutes.

The SPEAKER. That makes four minutes. The gentleman had one minute remaining.

Mr. STEENERSON. I understand the gentleman charged me with five minutes. I only yielded two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. I yielded five minutes first and then two minutes.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Post Office Committee has inadvertently forgotten his promise to yield five minutes to me. I am forced to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman of the Post Office Committee promised me five minutes, but has forgotten it.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would yield it if I had any time to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I think these promises ought to be kept.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will withdraw that point I will yield to him the time that has been allotted to me.

Mr. BLANTON. All right, I will withdraw it. All I want is the time that is coming to me.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I also have been promised five minutes, which I am not going to get. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, not long ago, in company with Mr. Johnson, who is chief clerk in Mr. Koons's office, we went to the office of Mr. Ellsworth, who has charge of the post office service, and Mr. Ellsworth stated to me that where through receipts a fourth-class post office suddenly increased to an amount authorizing it to be raised to a first-class office, the postmaster was required to continue working for a salary of $1,000 per annum for a whole year before his salary could be raised. I told him of a situation where a village of about 400 people in my district had suddenly grown to a city of 25,000 people. The post office there was in the hands of a man under the fourth-class status, who was being forced to hold that office with a salary of only $1,000 a year, notwithstanding the fact that the receipts of the office showed that it was a first-class office. Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Johnson stated to me that under the law and under the regulations of the department based upon that law it would be necessary for that postmaster to continue to perform the service of a first-class office for 25,000 people for a whole year before his salary could be raised above $1,000 per annum. I will ask the chairman of the committee if that is not the law? I ask the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the next ranking member on the committee, to state if that is not the law. They are silent. That is a condition that ought not to exist. Mr. Ellsworth stated to me that he had called the attention of our Post Office Committee to this emergency; and even though he had been granted an emergency fund, he could not pay that postmaster one single cent out of the emergency fund over and above his maximum of $1,000 a year for a fourth-class post office. Consequently you can hardly get a man to think of holding the office of postmaster in that thriving city. Postmaster after postmaster has tried it and resigned, and the citizens in that district to-day are standing in line two, three, and four hours, and some of them are paying $2 to get a place up at the front of the line near the window, in order to get their mail. The distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HARDY] stated to me a few minutes ago that this very condition existed at Cripple Creek years ago, and at other places in the mining districts of Colorado. Is it possible that this kind of an emergency has appeared in the past history of this country and that this splendid, efficient Post Office Committee has not taken some steps up to this time to remedy that situation?

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman will yield, I will say to him that neither the Postmaster General nor anybody else in the Post Office Department has ever notified the Post Office Committee of the condition the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Ellsworth stated to me that he had called on Congress repeatedly for a larger emergency fund, and that he could not get it, and that several times his department had called attention to these emergency situations without avail.

Mr. BLACK. If my colleague will yield, I think what he has in mind is that he came before the Committee on Appropriations for a deficiency. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads does not deal with deficiencies, so I am sure it has not been before our committee.

Mr. BLANTON. However uninformed the committee may have been heretofore, with regard to the emergency situations I have mentioned, they can not state that they are uninformed now, because I have brought it to their attention, and I hope they will remedy the situation, so that the people in a city of 25,000 population can get their mail without standing in line three, four, and five hours and paying $2 for a place every day or two in order to get their mail. Some of my constituents who are business men have been forced to order their mail sent to another post office 25 miles away, and to send their automobiles for it every day. This is an emergency that could happen in any part of the country. Five years ago it was never dreamed that oil was in this section, and to-day in two counties in my district there are 200,000 barrels of oil flowing out of the ground every day.

Mr. PARRISH. Can the gentleman suggest any way by which we can run the post offices in our section of the country so that the postmasters can get this increased compensation without having to wait for a year?

Mr. BLANTON. There is no way to do it until we change the existing law. My colleague who has just interrogated me represents another district in the same fix. The wonderful oil fields have been developed at Burkburnett and other places in his district, and he has postmasters doing service for a first-class office with first-class receipts, but still receiving a fourth-class postmaster's salary. It is simply outrageous and should be remedied immediately.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent Mr. STEENERSON and Mr. NOLAN were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the bridge bills about to be considered are disposed of, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON] may be given leave to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that after the disposition of the bridge bills the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON] address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEARL RIVER, LA.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9697) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Pearl River, between Pearl River County, Miss., and Washington Parish, La.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, there are seven bridge bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. Unless there is some urgency in connection with this particular measure, it seems to me that the bridge bills ought not to be taken up in this way. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is in this case some particular emergency?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. The right to begin the construction of this bridge expires on the 7th of November. The advertisements are now out for the construction of the bridge, and it is impossible to begin work by November 7.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge, authorized by act of Congress approved February 27, 1917, to be built across the Pearl River, at or near the fourth ward of the parish of Washington, State of Louisiana, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS POCOMOKE RIVER, MD.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3190) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pocomoke River, at Pocomoke City, Md.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3190, a bridge bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, why should this be taken from the calendar at this time?

Mr. COADY. This bill authorizes the State roads commission of Maryland to build this bridge. The commission has now built the roads on each side of the river, and they want to build the bridge to connect them up. The material is on the ground, and the contract has been let, and they are ready to go ahead.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State roads commission of the State of Maryland, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pocomoke River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation and at or near Pocomoke City, in Worcester County, State of Maryland, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COADY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER, LA.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3096, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River at or near Moncla, La.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3096. Is there objection.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is there some emergency which requires this bill to be now taken up?

Mr. ASWELL. The county authorities are very urgent in their appeal to begin the erection of this bridge across the river. It is very important, for they want to begin the construction of the bridge right away.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the parish of Avoyelles, in the State of Louisiana, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Moncla, in said parish and State, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ASWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON], by order of the House, is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the Republican leaders in Congress and throughout the country seem to have a concerted plan to criticize the Democratic administration for extravagance, high taxes, and high cost of living. You have been in control for five months—what, let me ask, have you done to remedy conditions?

In the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress we passed through the House the general appropriation bills in ample time, but they failed to pass the Senate. In order to force the President to call an early session of this Congress certain Republican Senators—among whom, I regret to say, the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] was the most conspicuous—conducted a filibuster that prevented the passage of these necessary bills. By so doing you delayed the payment of allotments to the dependent relatives of our soldiers, sailors, and marines, and deprived the various Government departments of the necessary funds to conduct the Government. This was done under the pretense that it was necessary to have Congress in session in order that you might pass much needed constructive legislation for the benefit of the people. This Congress was called in extra session on May 19, more than five months ago. What has become of your promised legislation for relief to the people? [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have criticized the Democratic administration so persistently as to cause some of the people to feel that the Democrats are in power, whereas, as a matter of fact, you have control of the House by 50 majority and a workable majority in the Senate. You charge the Democratic Party with extravagance and incapacity, but with what justification? The Democratic Party was in full power for six years. During that period we passed the following laws: An income-tax law; a law providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people; corrupt-practice law, providing for the publication of campaign expenses; war-insurance law; ship-purchase law; Clayton antitrust law; Underwood tariff law; Federal reserve bank law; child-labor law; workmen's-compensation law; law providing for the safety of railroad employees; anti-injunction law; Sherwood pension law, which increased the average yearly pension paid the Union soldiers from $183.73 under President Roosevelt to $226.63 under President Wilson; rural-credits law, which gives the farmer an opportunity to borrow money on easier terms for a longer period and at a lower rate of interest; the Lever agricultural-extension law; good-roads law; and many other progressive and constructive laws in the interest of all the people and for the welfare of the Nation.

Which of these laws that were passed by the Democratic Congress and signed by a Democratic President have you repealed?

We conducted our part of the World War on a scale so great, so rapid, and so efficient as to have been largely instrumental in bringing the war to a successful termination more than a year ahead of the time when it was thought to be possible.

Our Army, which consisted at the beginning of the war of 82,000 regulars and about 220,000 State militia, making a total of approximately 300,000 men, was increased to 5,000,000 men—2,000,000 of whom were across the seas and most of whom are now back home, having accomplished one of the most glorious and wonderful performances in the history of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Our Navy was advanced from fourth place among the nations of the world to second place, and a close second at that. The work of our Navy in transporting and convoying our troops and supplies across the sea in the face of the submarine terror was simply superb, but no language of mine can do justice to the work of our Army and Navy.

That the Democratic Party did not play politics in the Army and Navy is shown by the fact that few, if any, to-day know the politics of Gen. Pershing or Admiral Benson.

This is a partial summary of the record of the Democratic Party before and during the war. Our friends on the Republican side have found nothing to complain of specifically, but in general terms are accusing us of extravagance—they are blaming us with the high cost of living, and because of the high Federal taxes.

I shall not attempt to say that there was no extravagance or waste in the conduct of this war. But let us consider what we did: We paid our soldiers more than any other nation, with the exception of Canada, where it was practically the same. English soldiers received from 36 to 50 cents per day, the French soldier from 5 to 8½ cents, the Italian soldier from 1 to 5 cents, while the minimum pay of the American soldier was $1 per day. The American soldiers were well paid, well fed, and well clothed—they had a right to be, and they have shown by their valiant service the wisdom of our methods.

We spent large sums of money in this country in building ships; in the manufacture of ammunition and ordnance, autotrucks, and airplanes; and large sums of money in France in constructing piers and docks and railroads from the seaports to the trenches. The amount of this money was large, and by some might be called extravagance, but let me ask you to pause and consider and answer fairly whether or not the money spent in this way was not the means of saving many lives and largely instrumental in bringing the war to an early and successful termination.

Let me contrast the ability of a Republican administration and a Republican Congress to handle the affairs of the Nation in an emergency.

A Republican investigation commission appointed by a Republican President, after being in session for more than 15 weeks, reported that during the War with Spain there was lacking in the general administration of the War Department that capacity to grasp the situation which was essential to high efficiency. This report of your own party's investigation commission shows the almost criminally inefficient and incompetent manner in which that war was conducted by a Republican administration, and brands your party as utterly incapable and incompetent to properly conduct a war even on a small scale. Among other things the report shows that operating tables, surgical instruments, beds, blankets—an entire hospital outfit, several carloads of supplies—were shipped to one of the camps here in the United States and were lost and not found until after the war. During this time Gen. Shafter was sending imploring telegrams to the War Department here in Washington for medicine and hospital supplies.

Large quantities of medicines and supplies were found in the holds of transports under heavy freight where they had been for many months, while our sick and wounded soldiers were dying because of the lack of medicine and other supplies. Camp Thomas, at Chickamauga, where we had 60,000 soldiers, was allowed to become infected with disease, and according to the testimony under oath of Maj. Helborn, of Kentucky, the Quartermaster Department failed to furnish tents, and the men, on rainy nights, having fever, measles, and other diseases, were exposed to the rain. These conditions were allowed to exist for weeks, although at the time there were immense stores piled up at St. Louis, only a few hundred miles away, and all the while Gen. Brooke, in command at this camp, was clamoring for tents, supplies, and medicines. The chief surgeon was obliged to wire Washington repeatedly for medical supplies. At one time he did not even have enough blanks on hand for keeping a record of the sick. The lack of these much-needed medicines and other supplies at Camp Thomas was due to the failure of the War Department to give Surg. Gen. Wrights, whose headquarters were at St. Louis, the necessary authority or orders to provide them.

The report further shows many guns were fitted to improper carriages and sent useless into the fields; it shows that small packages of medicine were shipped from one point to another in the United States by freight instead of express, and did not reach their destination for months, often too late to be of any use to many of the brave men. Incompetency and inefficiency existed everywhere. After the war was over it was discovered that many troops who were in the field since the beginning of the war had never been supplied with sufficient clothing or camp and garrison equipage.

Belts furnished the soldiers were a burden rather than a convenience on account of their poor quality, poor finish, and lack of room for cartridges. In the base hospitals, months after we entered the war, the only medicine on hand was a supply of salts, castor oil, and quinine. The report shows that months after we had entered the war, and after they had been mobilized here in our own country, soldiers died by the hundreds from lack of proper medicine which should have been furnished them.

The Democratic administration has been charged with the deliberate destruction of food, which upon investigation was shown to have been spoiled. But what, let me ask, can be done with spoiled food? Gen. Miles said that the beef furnished some of the soldiers in the Spanish-American War would not be good in any country in the stomach of any man. We are criticized for burning a few carloads of spoiled food, while the Republican administration fed it to our soldiers.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to accuse our Republican friends of being inhuman; I do not believe they are inhuman or that their political ancestors were inhuman. The Republican investigating commission excused the greater part of the inefficiency and incompetency of the Republican administration's conduct of the Spanish-American War because of the stupendous task of raising an army of 250,000 men and sending nearly 20,000 of them a few hundred miles to Cuba. We concur in the opinion of the investigating commission; it was too much to expect a Republican administration to do. [Laughter and applause on Democratic side.]

What would you have done had you been called upon to raise an army of 5,000,000 men and send 2,000,000 of them 3,000 miles, over seas infested with submarines, for the purpose of humiliating the proudest military machine that ever existed? What would have happened if the American Army in France had been in command of a general of the Shafter type instead of Gen. Pershing? Compare the result accomplished by Gen. Pershing under a Democratic adminstration with the fiasco, the round robin, and the embalmed beef scandal under a Republican administration with Gen. Shafter in command. Compare the record of Secretary of War Baker in the World War with that of Republican Secretary of War Alger in the Spanish-American War. The people have a right to judge us, and will judge us by our records, and the memories of the people are not short, and if your memories are not short you will come to the conclusion that the less you attempt to criticize our conduct of the recent war the better it will be for you. We are not ashamed of our record; we are proud of it. We recognize that Republican boys as well as Democrat boys and the boys of all other political faiths fought his war, and they have every right to be proud of the result of their efforts; but the Democratic administration is proud of the fact that your boys and our boys were placed under efficient and capable leadership, well fed, well clothed and well paid—paid as much as any other soldiers in the World War and twice as much as our Regular Army men received prior to the war, and they were worth it and more; we never can pay them for their services and sacrifices.

Everyone recognizes that there is a spirit of unrest throughout the world, fortunately less so in the United States than elsewhere. We all recognize that the cost of living has increased, and that taxes have greatly increased as a result of the war. This has been so after every great war in the history of the world. We can not destroy man power, foodstuffs, fuel, steel, and other necessities of industry without creating a shortage in these essentials to normal activities. But in an attempt to take advantage of this spirit of unrest and put the blame upon our shoulders, you are constantly faultfinding, and criticizing the present administration, seemingly failing to realize that in doing so you are criticizing yourselves, and that no change can be made in the laws of the land except by an act of Congress, and that you are in control of the House and Senate. Do not try to fool the people into believing that you are in the minority in Congress. You criticize the President for his recent trip, stating that there are many domestic things to attend to here. The President upon two different occasions made certain specific recommendations to Congress relative to the high cost of living and to Federal taxation. What have you done about this, and what have you done of your own initiative to relieve the present high cost of living or toward simplifying and modifying or reducing Federal taxes?

The President recommended the following legislation:

First, to extend the life of the food-control act, and for the extension of same as to many other commodities, including food, foodstuffs, fuel, and clothing, and other necessities of life. It took you five months to pass this act, which was agreed to, finally, on the 11th of October, 1919.

The President also recommended certain cold-storage legislation, limiting the time during which goods may be kept in storage, prescribing the method of disposing of them if kept beyond the prescribed period, and requiring that goods released from storage shall in all cases bear the date of their receipt; that all goods released from storage for interstate shipment be plainly marked, upon each package, with the selling or market price at which they went into storage.

A bill, partially complying with the President's suggestion, passed the House on September 30. There has been no further action on it.

On May 20, 1919, the President recommended, with reference to Federal taxes, that our taxation be made to rest as lightly as possible on the productive resources of the country; that its rates be stable, and that it be constant in its revenue-yielding power. You have to date ignored this recommendation.

You have absolutely failed to pass any remedial legislation suggested in this recommendation of the President. You have failed to allow to come out of your committee a bill to repeal the luxury tax, or retail-dealers' tax, or to in any way modify the income or excess-profits tax as recommended by the President, and you have not initiated any constructive legislation in lieu thereof.

The President recommended tariff legislation in order to provide a weapon of retaliation in case other Governments should enact legislation unequal in its bearing on our products as compared with the products of other countries. You have taken no action upon this phase of the tariff question whatsoever, and the tariff bills that have been passed in the House are being held up by the Republican leader in the Senate, with no present prospect of any of them passing.

The President recommended legislation with regard to the return of telephone and telegraph lines, so as to make these systems uniform and a coordinated system which would afford those who use them as complete and certain means of communication with all parts of the country as has so long been afforded by the Postal System of the Government, and at rates as uniform and intelligible. You simply returned the telegraph and telephone lines to their owners without passing such legislation as was suggested by the President and without any of your own making.

What standing have your Republican orators for criticizing the President directly or indirectly because of the high cost of living and high taxes and blaming the Democratic administration because of them? We have been in session for more than five months, with your party in control of the House and Senate, and you have carried out only a small and insignificant part of the recommendations of the President and have passed no constructive legislation to remedy conditions you pretend to complain about. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Republican Party, chafing to again take hold of the reins of the Government, forced this extra session of Congress. What has been accomplished during the five months you have been in control here? Have you carried out any of the recommendations of the President to pass legislation to place the taxes where they least hamper the life and industry of the people? Have you attempted to repeal any of the minor taxes, retail taxes, or luxury taxes? Have you attempted to repeal or reduce the excess-profits tax or simplify the method of collection of the income or excess-profits tax?

I respectfully suggest that instead of criticizing us the public would like to know why you have not acted on these excellent suggestions of the President.

You spent four days in passing the budget bill—a bill that only two Members voted against, a wise regulation that was first adopted in this country by a Democratic governor and a Democratic legislature in the State of Maryland. Does it never occur to you when criticizing the extravagance of the Democratic administration that such waste of time is a waste of money and therefore extravagance?

Some of your orators have attempted in our State to criticize the administration because a large number of automobiles and automobile trucks at Camp Holabird are not being sold, and without knowledge of facts are charging the administration with allowing them to deteriorate. We know, or can easily learn if we care to make inquiry, that these machines are being kept well oiled and greased by engineers and mechanics who go over them each week and keep them in good order; far better care is taken of them than the average privately owned car when not in use, and the reason for their not being disposed of is that you have failed to pass appropriate legislation authorizing them to be turned over to the Agricultural Department for use upon the post roads of the various States, and to the Post Office Department for use in the delivery of mails. If we were to force these automobiles and autotrucks upon the market at public sale, then you would criticize us for selling these trucks at a sacrifice when they should have been transferred to these departments of the Government.

Gentlemen, you have your own responsibilities, and when you criticize the present administration you must realize that you are criticizing yourselves. You are now in the majority in the House and Senate. The President can not pass laws; he can only sign those that are passed here and presented to him. If you have the capacity, industry, and desire to pass any legislation for the benefit of the people of this country, you will find a most loyal support from those upon this side of the aisle. You will find that we are ready, and more than ready, to cooperate with you in any effort that you may show in the future, looking to the welfare of the country and placing the welfare of the country above partisan politics. And let me predict that unless you stop your rôle of critic and follow the advice of the President by passing the laws that he has suggested, or initiate laws of your own construction that will help stabilize conditions in this country and let business go back to its normal condition, you will be very much in the position of a distinguished gentleman who was candidate for judge in our county many years ago on the Republican ticket, who, although a very prominent gentleman, had never tried a case in court. He came to the polls, and my predecessor, the late Mr. Talbott, told a Mr. Bagley that that was Mr. Jones, candidate for judge, standing over there, and for him to go over and entertain him; whereupon Mr. Bagley went over to where Mr. Jones was, and the following dialogue ensued:

Mr. BAGLEY. Good morning, Mr. Jones. My name is Bagley.
Mr. JONES. I am very glad to know you, Mr. Bagley.
Mr. BAGLEY. Mr. Jones, they tell me you are candidate for judge.
Mr. JONES. Yes, Mr. Bagley; I am a candidate for judge.
Mr. BAGLEY. Mr. Jones, would you mind telling these gentlemen around here what important cases you ever tried? These people would like to hear—it won't take you long.

[Laughter on Democratic side.]

If you don't stop the filibustering in the Senate that you are conducting on the peace treaty and pass needed legislation for the solution of the railroad question, if you do not simplify and reduce the burden of taxation, if you do not cut out every unnecessary expense, you may find next fall your constituents entertaining you as Mr. Bagley entertained Mr. Jones, by saying, "You have had control of Congress for two years. Won't you kindly tell us what you did in those two years? The people would like to know—it won't take you long."

Gentlemen, I have tried to be fair in summarizing the record of the Democratic Party, and comparing it with the present Republican Congress, and I fervently hope that you may realize that little, if anything, is ever gained by abuse and unfair criticism. The people are going to judge the Republican Party by the record they make here in Congress, and for the good of the country, placing my country above partisan politics, I hope that you may see the necessities of your country first, and will so proceed with some real legislation for the benefit of the people without regard to partisan advantage, and that you may follow President Wilson's advice and readjust and reduce the most burdensome and annoying of our Federal taxes, and carry out his many other sensible recommendations to place the country upon a normal basis of peace and prosperity such as we enjoyed before the war, under a Democratic President with a Democratic Congress to help him. [Applause on Democratic side.]

PENSIONS.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 9448, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a pension bill, H. R. 9448, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws—

The name of Jesse B Connelly, late second lieutenant of Company I, Thirty-first Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Edward P. Carman, late of Company F, First Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Lillie C. Marvin, former widow of Edward O. Crossman, late of Company E, First Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Henry Jones, late of Companies D and B, Forty-third Regiment, Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The name of Joseph Ford, late of Company G, Third Regiment Potomac Home Brigade Maryland Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The name of Louisana Thompson, widow of Cyrus B. Thompson, late of Company F, Fortieth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Jourdan B. Roberts, late of Company I, Seventy-second Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of James T. Kent, ordinary seaman, U. S. S. Huntress and Great Western, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Matilda J. Haines, former widow of Samuel G. Mock, late of Company I, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of having read to the House a letter which I have received from the president of the Federal Land Bank of Omaha, Nebr., which shows the condition of these banks, which I think will be of interest and value to the House and to the country. I ask to have the letter read in my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). Without objection the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF OMAHA,
Omaha, Nebr., October 20, 1919.

Hon. H. M. TOWNER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE TOWNER: I am sure that you will be interested in knowing the progress of the farmers' cooperative Federal land banks authorized by Congress a few years ago. If those banks have furnished a valuable service to the farmers, Congress will no doubt enlarge their opportunities. If they have not served a useful purpose, they should be abolished. I will give you a short history of the operations of our bank up to the present time.

The Federal Land Bank of Omaha has been in operation a little over two years, having been chartered March 8, 1917. It is not at all a Government bank, as many people think, but is owned by its farmer borrowers, under Government supervision. Every borrower is required to take 5 per cent of his loan in stock, and all net earnings belong to borrowing stockholders. True, the Government furnished the initial capital, but that is being rapidly repaid, and could have been entirely repaid without greatly affecting the figures that follow. Practically all the expense connected with the $35,000,000 loans now on our books has been incurred and paid the first year. The net profit on those loans hereafter will, in our opinion, offset the retirement of the Government capital.

Our books show that the average borrowers' stock in this bank for the year 1919, estimating the last three months of the year, will be $1,502,488. Our total net earnings for the same period, estimating the last three months, will be $226,613.72, which makes a net profit on borrowers' stock for the year 1919 of a little over 15 per cent per annum. The law at present requires us to place 25 per cent of our net earnings semiannually to reserve account, which would leave 11¼ per cent to be paid in dividends. This reserve account is, however, loaned out and its earnings are added to stockholders' profits. If our net earnings of a little more than 15 per cent could all be distributed in dividends, it would reduce the net interest paid by borrowers to 5 per cent per annum. Our borrowers' mortgages call for 5½ per cent per annum.

This remarkable showing is all the more gratifying as we are working side by side with joint-stock land banks authorized by the Federal farm-loan act, which are operated by private capital for profit. Joint-stock land banks charge farmers 6 per cent per annum, with no share in the profits, which is practically a difference of 1 per cent per annum in favor of our borrowers. Joint-stock land banks solicit only large loans and operate only in territory where expenses are low. This is a very large item, when it is taken into consideration that there are probably $800,000,000 of mortgage loans outstanding in the Omaha Land Bank district. One per cent per annum on that amount would save our farmers $8,000,000 annually.

There is one serious defect in the Federal farm-loan act, however. Federal land banks are limited to a loan of $10,000 to one person, while joint-stock land banks are allowed to loan any amount to any person for any purpose. This gives the joint-stock land banks a monopoly on all loans above $10,000. We think that farmers who are operating their own land should be allowed to obtain their loans from us and thus save this 1 per cent per annum.

The ordinary farm unit in our district is from 160 to 240 acres and is worth from $30,000 to $50,000. We are allowed by law to loan one-half of the value of the land, but this $10,000 limitation prevents us from serving the needs of a very large majority of the farmers in our district. You will, therefore, perform a great and lasting service to the farmers in our district if you will support the amendment increasing our maixmum loan limit to $25,000, so that we can serve farmers operating standard farm units and save them this 1 per cent per annum. We believe a conscientious study of this important matter can only result in your earnest desire to see that this serious defect in the Federal farm-loan act is remedied without delay.

Furthermore, while there has been much profiteering in many lines of business, we are glad to be able to say that the Federal Land Bank of Omaha has been able to reduce the interest rate for the farmers below any rate heretofore in general effect. We are also proud to be able to say that in our monthly statement to Washington September 30 not a single instaliment of interest remained unpaid. The Federal Land Bank of Omaha operates in four States, with loans in each State as follows:

Iowa	$17,479,850
Nebraska	10,538,190
South Dakota	6,507,550
Wyoming	974,600
Total	35,500,190

I shall be glad to have you use the figures that I have given you in any way that you may wish. Our sole purpose is to serve the farmers of our district at the lowest rate of interest with such funds as they need to develop and operate their farms. We believe that by furnishing farmers with funds at a low rate of interest and on good terms we enable them to make greater production at a lower cost and thereby help to reduce the cost of living.

Yours, very truly,

D. H. HOGAN, President.

During the reading of the foregoing bill, the following amendments were severally offered by Mr. FULLER of Illinois, severally reported, and severally agreed to:

Page 5, strike out lines 9, 10, 11, and 12, being the case of Joshua Griffith.

Page 7, strike out lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, being the case of William H. Crane.

Page 15, line 23, strike out the word "she" and insert the word "he."

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on page 6, line 1, I move to amend by striking out "$30" and insert "$35."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 1, strike out "$30" and insert in lieu thereof "$35."

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Speaker, I regret to announce that in the last few days I have received notice that Mr. Louis Sickenberger, for whom the committee has recommended a pension of $72, has passed away after a very long, honorable, and very useful life up to within the last few years, since which time he has been wholly incapacitated on account of weight of years. I had intended to notify the gentleman from Illinois of that fact, but I overlooked it. I suggest to the gentleman that he move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Which paragraph?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The paragraph containing the pension for Mr. Louis Sickenberger.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on page 6, I move to strike out lines 15, 16, 17, and 18.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, amend by striking out lines 15 to 18, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FULLER of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, three weeks ago when the bills on the Private Calendar were before the House there were three bills left over for a third reading and are now the unfinished business before the House, and I would like to have them called up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up certain bills on the Private Calendar, which are the unfinished business.

HEIRS OF ROBERT LAIRD M'CORMICK.

Mr. EDMONDS. I call up the bill H. R. 6289, Private Calendar No. 20.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6289) for the relief of the heirs of Robert Laird McCormick, deceased.

The amendments were read.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PERRY E. BORCHERS.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 646.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 646) for the relief of Perry E. Borchers because of losses suffered, due to destruction of property and termination of contract for services because of smallpox, while in the employ of the Navy Department in Cuba.

The amendment was read.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes none.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMHERST W. BARBER.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 1377.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1377) for the relief of Amherst W. Barber.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will this motion carry all bills that are objected to as well as those unobjected to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands it takes the consideration of all bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, is it proper at this time for such a motion to be made, or should it rather be by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the motion is in order to-day for bills upon the Private Calendar. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 46, noes 5.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think in the consideration of some of these bills there should be a quorum, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present. The question is upon resolving the House into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 255, nays 1, answered "present" 2, not voting 173, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. REAVIS in the chair.

WILLIAM E. JOHNSON.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, the first of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 683) for the relief of William E. Johnson.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania intend to take up the bills as they appear in order on the calendar?

Mr. EDMONDS. This bill is not from our committee. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs not being present, I would ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be passed without prejudice.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, which bill is that? You can not pass it without prejudice until it is called up.

Mr. GARD. Do I understand we are taking up bills only from the Committee on Claims or are we calling the Private Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised with reference to what is being called up.

Mr. EDMONDS. We are going to take up the bills in order on the Private Calendar. I suggest that the next bill, No. 23, on the calendar be taken up. Whenever it happens to be a bill from another committee, the chairman of the committee will be here to take care of it.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the House is in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The calendar number of this bill is No. 6. It should be reported to the House, and if they want to lay it aside and pass it over, that is the way to do it. What is the use of starting in the middle of the calendar?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it not in order for the chairman of the committee to take up any bill he pleases without reference to its order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would so hold.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I call up for consideration No. 12 on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if there was no proposition that hedges this proposition to go into Committee of the Whole, then unanimous-consent bills are called up in the order in which they stand on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what is being done.

Mr. EDMONDS. As I understand, No. 6 has been called up.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, No. 6 on the Private Calendar is my bill, and I would appreciate the opportunity to have it considered at the present time. I shall be glad again to explain the provisions of the bill, as I did when it was called up some weeks ago. The Private Calendar was then considered by unanimous consent, and the bill was fully discussed at that time, but a request was made that it be temporarily passed over. I shall be pleased to answer questions, if any Member desires further information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 683) for the relief of William E. Johnson.

Be it enacted, etc., That to reimburse William E. Johnson, former chief special officer and special disbursing agent, for the expenditure made by him under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the defense of Juan Cruz, a noncommissioned officer engaged in the suppression of the liquor traffic among Indians, for the payment of which no appropriation was available, there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,853.95.

With a committee amendment as follows:

In line 10, on page 1, strike out the figures "$1,853.95" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,839.95."

Mr. HAYDEN. Does any Member desire to ask questions about this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Well, I would like to ask the gentleman some questions about the bill. Is there any appropriation in the Indian Bureau for the payment of officers employed to transact the business that this officer did?

Mr. HAYDEN. There was an appropriation available at that time of $50,000 for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians. A posse man named Juan Cruz, who was employed and paid out of that appropriation, was charged with murder by reason of the fact that he was compelled to kill a man in enforcing the law. The chief special officer of the Indian Service, William E. Johnson, deemed it his duty to assist in the defense of this posse man, who he believed had acted lawfully and properly on that occasion. Mr. Johnson therefore went out to New Mexico to assist in his defense, and thought that he had a perfect right to pay the expenses incident thereto out of the fund for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians. The Auditor for the Interior Department held that that appropriation was not available for the defense of the posse man and disallowed the account. The account was carefully examined and approved by the Department of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior in the report on this bill recommends that the amount be paid to Mr. Johnson.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman misunderstood me. My question was, Is there no fund in the Department of the Interior or in the Bureau of Indian Affairs out of which an official of that department detailed on the duty on which he was engaged can be paid for the services he rendered?

Mr. HAYDEN. There was no appropriation of any kind available for this purpose, and it was so held by the Auditor for the Interior Department.

Mr. WALSH. Did not the officials of the Bureau of Indian Affairs know that when they sent this man out there?

Mr. HAYDEN. The officials of the Indian Bureau thought such expenses could be paid out of the appropriation for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians, and so approved Mr. Johnson's accounts, but when the claim reached the auditor he said, "No; that was not the purpose contemplated by Congress when the appropriation for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians was made."

Mr. WALSH. Why did this gentleman employ 12 or 15 posse men in the defense of one Juan Cruz?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Johnson was at the head of the law-enforcement division in the Indian Bureau. These posse men were acting under him and were paid by the day. They may have been witnesses for the defense in the case against Juan Cruz, but he paid them for their time as posse men.

Mr. WALSH. If they were under summons as witnesses, they did not lose their salary, did they, as United States employees?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is what Mr. Johnson tried to do. He thought they were under salary, but the auditor held they could not be paid out of the appropriation that I have mentioned.

Mr. WALSH. What were they doing?

Mr. HAYDEN. They were assisting in the defense of the posse man, Juan Cruz.

Mr. WALSH. In court?

Mr. HAYDEN. In court and out of court.

Mr. WALSH. What sort of defense were these posse men conducting out of court?

Mr. HAYDEN. It was necessary to gather testimony for the defense.

Mr. WALSH. Well, they have got a lot of men running here from $42 down to $2 or $3. They were posse men. If they were summoned as witnesses in court, certainly the Department of Justice would pay the witness fees. If they were employees of the United States under the jurisdiction of this special agent of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the mere fact that they are summoned to court does not cut them off the salary roll, and if it does there is no reason why an extra appropriation should be asked for to pay them compensation when summoned to testify in a court when they are getting paid for their services as witnesses.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no duplication of pay in this bill whatsoever.

Mr. WALSH. Well, do I understand that the Department of Justice has not paid these witness fees?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Department of Justice had nothing to do with preparing the defense of Juan Cruz. Of course, for the day that a man appeared as a witness in court he probably received his pay.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the pay is not confined simply to the day he is called to testify. He waits around two or three days, probably, until he is examined as a witness. I can not understand why they had these 15 or 20 posse men, paying them these various amounts here under the supervision of this special officer in connection with the defense of this posse man who was charged with murder and who went out and tried to round up somebody for illegal sales of liquor. Why did he have to call in the rest of the posse men in that district down there?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman will understand that Mr. Johnson had authority as chief special officer to deputize anybody he pleased as a posse man. That is how the names of these men appear on the list as posse men.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me a moment, I want to say that this man Johnson was at that time chief enforcement officer over all the Indian territory. His range went from the State of the gentleman from Minnesota down to southern California and Arizona on the southwest and included Oklahoma, and it was necessary, of course, for him to have a great many posse men covering all those territories. I do not recall, because it is some time since we reported this bill, but I take it that these amounts here evidently were incurred in getting up the evidence necessary for the defense of this fellow who had this difficulty over the enforcement of the liquor laws—Juan Cruz, I believe his name was—and it was doubtless necessary to go about in communities somewhat antagonistic to the enforcement of this law in a great many instances and therefore very difficult to obtain testimony, and I have no doubt it took every man and every dollar that is set forth here to carry out that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that it would take a special agent of the bureau from 1911 to May 23, 1914, to settle up this case and prepare the defense?

Mr. CARTER. Well, that might depend on the action of the court. The case might have been continued; and if it was not brought for trial and new things developed, perhaps they had to come back at the instance of the defense in the case.

Mr. WALSH. Where was the trial held?

Mr. CARTER. I do not recall. I think my friend from Arizona can give you that information.

Mr. HAYDEN. The trial was held in the State of New Mexico.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Does the gentleman from Arizona know whether Mr. Johnson paid out the money now contained in the bill, and whether the effect of the appropriation here would be a reimbursement to Mr. Johnson?

Mr. HAYDEN. The fact of the matter is that Mr. Johnson issued the warrants listed in the report to various people for their expenses in connection with the defense of Juan Cruz. All of such payments were disallowed by the Auditor for the Interior Department, and Mr. Johnson is out the amount due for their salary and expenses which he paid to them.

Mr. BEE. How much is that amount that is due to Mr. Johnson?

Mr. HAYDEN. I understand that about $600 is due to him for his personal expenses.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, this bill was up a month or six weeks ago, and the committee gave it investigation at that time. Since that time additional investigation has been made concerning it. The question in my mind was as to whether Mr. William E. Johnson, in presenting this bill as he has presented it, was asking for financial relief which in effect would be a double payment for his services, he at that time being an employee of the United States engaged in the suppression of the alcoholic liquor traffic among the Indians. It is possibly interesting to the members of the committee to know that this is the same William E. Johnson who is now in London under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. CARTER. Does this Mr. Johnson in London go under the name of Pussyfoot Johnson?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. It is the same man?

Mr. GARD. Yes. The name "Pussyfoot Johnson" is possibly better known in London than in New Mexico. I have made an investigation to find out whether this man is entitled to the money he claims or whether he was rendering services and had been paid as a marshal or something of that kind, and whether this would be double pay. Within the last hour and a half I have called up the office of the Secretary of the Interior and have had a conversation with Mr. Vogelsang, First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and he informs me that this compensation should be paid to Mr. William E. Johnson, that the service which he rendered was outside of the scope of his employment, that it was necessary to be done and immediately done in the protection of his assistant, who was charged with murder; that the work was done; that the money was either paid out or obligated to be paid; that the claim has been very carefully audited; in fact, audited under three different assistant secretaries. Therefore I can advise the committee from my own private and personal investigation, made as lately as an hour and a half ago, that the bill is correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am very grateful to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] for the statement that he has just made in support of this bill. With his usual care he has investigated the merits of the pending claim and I am sure that the committee will concur in the conclusion that he has reached.

Reference has been made to the fact that Mr. Johnson is now in England. The committee will be interested in the following newspaper account of his activities on that side of the Atlantic:

EXCITEMENT IN BRITAIN OVER "PERNICIOUS GOODNESS" FROM AMERICA.

Down in Fleet Street, London, the greatest newspaper center of the world, Mr. W. E. Johnson, of America, has recently opened a suite of offices, full of books and literature of various kinds, as well as posters and other typical American propaganda material. W. E. Johnson is no other than our old friend "Pussyfoot," one-time chief special officer of the United States Indian Service for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians.

* * * * * * *

Finally the British press broke loose and said that Johnson was in Great Britain to put on a "pussyfoot" campaign for the American prohibitionists; that his office was importation headquarters for American campaign methods; that Johnson, himself, was actuated by the laudable, though immodest, intention of "gitting behind" the British people and dragooning them into prohibition whether or no. As a matter of fact, the whole scare was moonshine, as no American prohibition organization is putting up money for any British organization.

* * * * * * *

The scare, however, such as it was, still is. The newspapers are full of such headlines as "The Trail of Pussyfoot," "Pussyfoot: Pounds, Shillings, Pence," "The Pussyfoot Peril," etc. Everything unfavorable to the liquor trade is being credited to "American advertising." The Americans are called "blatant Yankee boomsters." Correspondence from America has heaped ridicule and contempt upon the ultra-goodness of the Americans, and the British people are being warned in an almost frantic way against invasion by this pernicious goodness.

Unless some other gentleman desires to ask a question, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF CALLING UP BILLS.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, with regard to the order in which these bills shall be taken up, I call the attention of the Chair to paragraph 4 of Rule XXIII, which provides that—

In Committees of the Whole House business on their calendars may be taken up in regular order, or in such order as the committee may determine.

I submit that it is for the committee to decide in what order these bills shall be taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been of the opinion that the order in which the bills were to be taken up was entirely in the control of the committee.

Mr. EDMONDS. Then I move that the bills be taken up in their regular order on the calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the bills be taken up in the order in which they appear on the calendar.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection at all to the motion of the gentleman, but I would like to have the Chair look into the matter a little bit before he makes any decision as to the method of calling up these bills. I think if the Chair will investigate he will find that when the House goes into the Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar they are called in the order in which they appear on the calendar, giving preference under the rule on certain Fridays to war claims and on other Fridays to bills reported from other committees of the House. As I said, I have no objection whatever to the gentleman's motion, but in the interest of maintaining orderly procedure I make this suggestion to the Chair.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is no question of war claims in this connection. These bills are almost all from the Committee on Claims, and a few from the Committee on Indian Affairs, but mainly from the Committee on Claims. The rule is very well settled, as I understand it, that the Committee of the Whole determines in what order the bills shall be taken up.

Mr. CRISP. I should like to see that rule. That is the very proposition in controversy. If the gentleman from Ohio will look at the rule, he will find that on two Fridays in each month preferential consideration shall be given to pension claims, that on one of the two remaining Fridays preference shall be given to war claims, and on the other Friday to claims.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not see how that affects the present situation. The rule is very well settled. I read it, and here are some citations. I will read one:

The power of the committee to determine the order of considering bills on its calendars is construed to authorize a motion to establish an order or a motion to take up a specified bill out of its order.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] moves in effect that it be the sense of the committee that bills shall be taken up in their regular order on the calendar.

Mr. CRISP. Under the precedent cited by the gentleman it looks as though it is in order to move to adopt a different procedure from what would be followed if no motion were made. What I was contending was that under the ordinary practice when the House goes into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, the bills are called in the order in which they appear on the calendar. It seems, under the citation the gentleman has made that the committee can do away with that and provide for a different order of calling up the bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] that the bills be considered in the order in which they appear on the calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLEVELAND TRINIDAD PAVING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5238) for the relief of the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, this bill was laid aside once before.

Mr. EDMONDS. It was laid aside once before on account of the absence of the gentleman who introduced it. Somebody in the House asked for an explanation.

Mr. MADDEN. Who introduced the bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. BEE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR] made the report from the committee on the bill.

Mr. GARD. I ask that the bill be laid aside.

Mr. MACGREGOR. The bill is a perfectly simple one. I do not see why it should be laid aside simply because the Member who introduced it is not here. I can explain it.

Mr. MADDEN. Go ahead and explain it.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield to the gentleman from New York sufficient time to explain the bill.

Mr. WALSH. What becomes of the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GARD. I asked that the bill be temporarily laid aside because of the absence of the gentleman from Ohio. It is immaterial to me. If gentlemen want to proceed with it I will withdraw my suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside temporarily. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JAMES A. SHOWEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 946) for the relief of James A. Showen.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to James A. Showen, of Spencer, Roane County, W. Va., out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $144, being six months' gratuity pay under the provision of the act of May 13, 1908, of Arthur J. Showen, late corporal of Company F, Second Regiment United States Infantry, who died in service on the 27th of July, 1908, from disease contracted in line of duty, leaving no widow, and without having designated a beneficiary under the said act.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a bill to pay to the parent of a man who was in the military service of the United States the amount of money that would come to him had he when he entered into the Army nominated this party as beneficiary. The amount to be paid is $144, which is the amount that he would have gotten if he had made out the application correctly when he entered the military service.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 13, after the word "act" insert "the said James A. Showen being the father of said Arthur J. Showen, late corporal of Company F, Second Regiment United States Infantry"

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the bill is for the relief of James A. Showen, and is founded on the statute of May 11, 1908, which provides for payment to some one designated by the soldier. There was no designation by the soldier, and I think that inasmuch as there was no designation it should at least appear that it was some one of interest to the soldier. The report says that he was contributing to the support of his father. The bill in no place contains the averment that James A. Showen was the father of Arthur J. Showen. I think that should appear.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

OSCAR SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 644) for the relief of Oscar Smith.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Oscar Smith the sum of $108.04 for service performed by him in carrying the mail between the post office and railroad station at Pactola, S. Dak., messenger route No. 259020, from March 16, 1915, to September 29, 1915.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to reimburse Oscar Smith for carrying the mails between the railroad station and a post office in South Dakota. It appears that when the bill was sent to the Post Office Department the auditor refused to pay this man because Oscar Smith was the father of the postmaster, and it is against the law to employ a relative of the postmaster to handle the mail. As the service was performed, the committee does not see why we should not pay the amount. It was unfortunate that the postmaster did not seem to understand the regulations which forbade any relative being employed in doing the work.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and insert the following: "That no claim for said sum or any other sum be made on the Post Office Department by said Oscar Smith."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment because it appears in the report, page 2, that the department detailed an inspector for the purpose of advising the postmaster what course to pursue in regard to the payment of the man who was carrying the mail and happened to be a relative of his. The report says the inspector said he was of the opinion that the matter could be arranged so that the claimant would receive compensation heretofore paid to the messenger, and he would attend to the matter. There being nothing further done by the Post Office Department, it seems to me that if this appropriation is authorized from the general source, the post-office appropriation should be protected.

Mr. EDMONDS. The committee will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

ELLEN AGNES MONOGUE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 909) for the relief of Ellen Agnes Monogue.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,500 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to Ellen Agnes Monogue, widow of Joseph P. Monogue, a police officer who lost his life at Newport, Vt., on September 6, 1917, while rendering assistance to United States immigration officers in removing an insane alien from the United States, without fault or negligence of said Joseph P. Monogue.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to pay to the widow of a police officer in Newport, Vt., a sum of money to partially reimburse her for the loss of her husband, who happened to be a local policeman and who was asked by the United States immigration inspectors to assist them in deporting an insane alien. He left no money except $500, which was pretty well used up for his burial expenses. It seemed to the committee that the beneficiary of an outsider who was called in to assist the United States authorities and who lost his life should receive this reimbursement. There are a number of precedents for this. Men have been killed in rendering assistance in the matter of illicit whisky investigations in Kentucky, and we have paid this sum of money several times to their beneficiaries since I have been on the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the bill. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how the committee arrived at this amount?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is the same amount of money that we have paid under similar circumstances in other cases.

Mr. WALSH. It is interesting to know that here is a man who was rendering a service to the Government in assisting the apprehension of an insane alien. He was killed by the very man whom they were attempting to take into custody. His widow and two children are to be given out of the bounty of the Congress $2,500. The other day we had a case where a soldier ran down an innocent bystander in the city of Omaha, a man who was rendering no service to the Government but who got in the way of an automobile driven by one of the soldiers of the Republic upon official business, while the country was at war during 1917. That man in Omaha left a widow and nine children. In his case the beneficiaries were paid out of the bounty of Congress $5,000. It would seem to me that in this case the widow and two children would be entitled to receive more than the $2,500.

Mr. EDMONDS. Is the gentleman asking me a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I did not understand that he was. I will say to the gentleman that if the amount is too small I will be very glad to agree to an amendment.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that in the Omaha case there were nine children while in this case there are only two, that may account for the difference in the amount of money.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the distinguished expert upon the bounties of Congress, who comes from the Tombigbee section, what schedule he would recommend in a case where the deceased leaves only a widow?

Mr. CANDLER. According to the idea of the gentleman expressed a moment ago, I presume it would be reduced very much. I simply referred to the fact that in the Omaha case there were nine and in this case there were two.

Mr. WALSH. It does not make any difference, of course, in any of these cases whether there is any duty resting upon the Government to make these payments. They are just gratuities, pure and simple, paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and if there is any merit in any of them, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], or ask him whether he does not think that there should be a distinction made in a case where a man is killed who is called upon by the United States officials to perform some work or duty which would warrant an award as great as that in the case of where a man is killed who is an innocent bystander.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I grant that there is a distinction, and I think this beneficiary is entitled to as much as the other beneficiary. I am frank to say that we established a new precedent in the House in connection with the other case, and it was left to the House and the House decided upon $5,000. We have a precedent in this case. In the case of moonshine-whisky making in Kentucky we have paid the beneficiaries of deputy marshals killed $2,500. This is exactly a similar case. If the gentleman cares to offer an amendment to make it $5,000, I would not oppose it.

Mr. WALSH. I do not imagine the gentleman would oppose it, nor would any other member of the committee.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], who asked that the sum of $2,500 be appropriated.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I would say that I fixed that amount after consultation with the Labor Department. That was the amount that they recommended. They had made very careful investigation in the case all the way through. That was their recommendation, and that was the reason I fixed that amount.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state whether the Labor Department has any precedents for this? Of course, moonshiners come under the Department of Justice and the Treasury Department. I wondered whether the Labor Department directed the gentleman's attention to other cases where men have been killed in an effort to enforce the immigration laws?

Mr. SNELL. No; they did not. They said that that was a sum that had been agreed upon, and that is all that I know about it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I know it is useless to oppose bills of this sort, particularly after the precedent established the other day in the Omaha case. Nevertheless when the gentleman makes the motion to lay the bill aside with a favorable recommendation, and also when he attempts to secure its passage through the House, I intend to oppose it. I know how futile it is, in view of the sentiment expressed here on the Nebraska case the other day, to attempt to defeat this measure unless parliamentary obstructive tactics are resorted to, and I do not care to do that. I trust that the bill will be defeated.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether he has received any information from the State Department. I note that the report he has is from the Labor Department. Has he any information from the State Department as to whether the United States, because it pays compensation to the widow of an American citizen whose death was caused by a citizen of Canada, can be recompensed for the money paid out.

Mr. EDMONDS. I have made no inquiry of the State Department. The inquiries were made through the Department of Labor.

Mr. GARD. Would it not be well to have that sort of an inquiry made? Here is a proposition where an American citizen is killed by an insane person who was a resident of Canada, as I understand, Robert J. Priddey, who came to the United States by train, and so far as I understand from the bill Priddey was a Canadian subject. Now, if he be a Canadian subject, would there not be some difference, at least in so far as the final responsibility in payment of the United States was concerned?

Mr. EDMONDS. I am not an attorney and the gentleman is. The gentleman knows full well, in the first place, the Government of Canada did not send this man across the border. He was deported under the laws of the United States, and if there is any claim against the Government of Canada the passage of this bill does not remove it.

Mr. GARD. I understand that full well. Possibly the passage of this bill would be a precedent to a claim for some one to show something had been paid, but what I am interested in is to know whether or not the State Department has reported or if this committee has endeavored to ascertain whether this man's country, Canada, will be liable for his act in killing an American citizen?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; we have not made any inquiry along that line at all. The question never came up.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that such an inquiry should be made?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not think, in connection with the preparation of this bill, it should. I do not know why.

Mr. GARD. I certainly think it should.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 3.

So the motion to lay aside with a favorable recommendation was agreed to.

EDITH CAROW ROOSEVELT.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 7138.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill which the gentleman calls up.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7138) granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt.

Be it enacted, etc., That all mail matter sent by the post by Edith Carow Roosevelt, widow of the late Theodore Roosevelt, under her written autograph signature, be conveyed free of postage during her natural life.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion which I would like to have considered.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a preferential motion, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the enacting clause be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not privileged.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a preferential motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the Chair hold that to strike out the enacting clause is not privileged? Why, it has been so held many times, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for debate.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the bill be read for amendment later—the second time?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Mr. BLANTON. It will be read a second time for amendment?

Mr. GARD. Has the bill been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has not been read.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; it was read once; it has been reported once.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is in the usual form and is approved by the Postmaster General. He says:

I have to say that this bill is in line with the policy heretofore followed granting the franking privilege to widows of Presidents, and therefore has the approval of this department. (A. S. Burleson.)

It seems to me that this is——

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Just in a minute. I would like to say a word——

Mr. JUUL. I would just like to ask the gentleman if the franking privilege was granted to Mrs. Cleveland?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. That is what I wanted to know. I am in favor of granting it, then, to Mrs. Roosevelt.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman will excuse me, I would like to say just a word or two. The author of the bill, Mr. HICKS, is not here, but as this is Roosevelt week, in which his name is on every tongue in the United States and honored in every heart, I think it a very exceptional thing if this bill should not be approved unanimously. There is no argument necessary, because it is simply in line with the precedents that have been established heretofore.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield for me to make a suggestion?

Mr. STEENERSON. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL].

Mr. CANDLER. Is it not a fact that the franking privilege has been granted to Mrs. Cleveland, Mrs. Harrison, Mrs. McKinley, and to all the widows of our Presidents in all the times past? If so, certainly it ought to be granted to Mrs. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the amendment is not in order. The bill has been read for debate only.

Mr. BELL. I understood he was through with debate.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would be willing to have the amendment read for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks that the amendment be read for information. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BELL: Page 1, line 3, after the word "all," insert the word "first-class."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. STEENERSON. For a question.

Mr. BEE. I wanted to rise in order to oppose the amendment; that is all.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, was that reservation put in the other permits that have been granted?

Mr. BELL. No; it was not. The object of my amendment is to confine it to first-class mail matter, for the reason that the last bill of this nature which passed Congress was approved February 1, 1909. The parcels post was inaugurated on January 1, 1913, and it seems that it would be sufficient to grant this privilege as restricted to first-class mail matter.

Mr. SNELL. These other franking privileges were granted to any matter that went through the United States mail?

Mr. BELL. Apparently so; yes.

Mr. SNELL. Why should not this be exactly the same?

Mr. BELL. For the reason that the parcel post was not inaugurated at that time.

Mr. SNELL. They could send through parcel post by franking privileges. It should be granted to Mrs. Roosevelt, the same as it was granted to the widows of other Presidents.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a thing that ought to be done and done with grace, this is the one. There never was a man in America's life that did so much for America as Roosevelt, and surely his widow is entitled to respect and consideration. [Applause.] I do not think we ought to consider this question on the basis of cheeseparing. There ought not to be any doubt about what Congress will do. The widow of this great man ought to be given every privilege that the franking rights carry. [Applause.] It ought not to be a question of whether the privilege should apply to the first-class mail or any other class of mail, but it should be granted to its full limit, and there ought not to be any delay or any doubt about it. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the House I desire to say that there is a slight inaccuracy in the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] that the parcel post was inaugurated since 1909. There always has been some parcel post in the United States. It was limited to 4 pounds. The only thing we did in 1913 was to increase the size of the package and provide for a heavier weight. And I think we ought to pass this bill in the form it has always been passed in heretofore.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am the only one that seems to be opposed to the bill. I ask for a little time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that by precedent, long established, the privilege provided for in this bill has been granted to the widows of Presidents of the United States, this same privilege proposed to be granted to Mrs. Roosevelt ought to be enthusiastically and unanimously accorded to her as the widow of our distinguished ex-President who has recently departed this life. It should be granted without limitation, just exactly as all other franking privileges were granted to the widows of our other Presidents.

Therefore I am opposed to the amendment suggested and offered by the gentleman from Georgia, my good friend, Mr. BELL. This privilege, unlimited, was granted by Congress to Mrs. Cleveland, Mrs. Harrison, Mrs. McKinley, and other widows of Presidents. To deny it to Mrs. Roosevelt would be resented by millions of American citizens. I met Mrs. Roosevelt while she was in the White House and feel proud that I had the opportunity to do so. She is a lovely woman and was greatly admired as the "First lady of the land" during President Roosevelt's administration. She gave her four boys to help fight the battles of our country. She richly deserves all this Government has done or may do for her. [Applause.] All over this Republic there is or soon will be a campaign to secure a voluntary fund to erect a memorial to that great and distinguished American ex-President, Col. Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.] He had a warm place in the hearts of millions of Americans—men, women, boys, and girls. The fund will be promptly given and the memorial will be erected. As the people all over the land, in my State and in the State of every Member on this floor, will contribute to this fund and thus honor him, certainly this House will promptly pass this bill giving this small privilege to his widow, Mrs. Roosevelt. If left to the people, yes, if left to the old boys in "blue" or the old boys in "gray" or the younger generation in "khaki," all with unanimous acclaim would, I believe, say "Pass the bill." [Applause.] In my judgment this House ought to pass it by unanimous consent and without the semblance of opposition of any kind from any source. To do so will be in complete accord with every precedent, and I am sure will receive the full approval of the great and patriotic American people. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. LONGWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2250) providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam.

EDITH CAROW ROOSEVELT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to detain the committee except to say that I am opposed to the amendment offered by my friend from Georgia [Mr. BELL]. Col. Roosevelt organized the regiment of Rough Riders at San Antonio, my home. We may not have agreed with him politically in Texas, but we hold him in high admiration. I think that to put any limitation on this legislation and say to this splendid woman, "The United States will limit your use of the franking privilege to this and you shall not use it for that," would simply amount to an insult to her, and would justify her in refusing to avail herself of it. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Would not every Democrat in Texas be in favor of this?

Mr. BEE. Yes. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there is not a man in this House on either side of the aisle who loved Theodore Roosevelt more than I did, and there is not a man on either side of the aisle who more highly reveres his memory than I do. There was a time when this Congress and the membership of it had a chance to do justice to Theodore Roosevelt. What was your record at that time, I will ask some of my Democratic colleagues? I am one of the few Democrats in this House who, when the great Theodore Roosevelt, who had been the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy of the United States, asked permission to fight for his country in our hour of necessity, I am one of the few Democrats who then stood upon this floor and said, "If Theodore Roosevelt wants to go to France, let him go," and I voted to send him to France. [Applause.] And I want to say here that I believe it was a little petty act of jealousy on the part of the War Department that kept him from going. I am that kind of a Democrat. [Applause.] But I do not want to see this paternalism carried any further.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I was one of the few who——

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret that I can not yield. The gentleman from Minnesota has an hour. I have but five minutes. The gentleman can use his own time.

I want to say that I am one of the few men loving Theodore Roosevelt and his memory who voted against giving his widow $5,000, not because of any partisan spirit, because I had none, but because I would have voted just the same way if, unfortunately, it were Mrs. Wilson who was involved. I would have voted against a similar proposition to give any widow of a President, Democrat or Republican, a special gratuity unless she needed it and was in dire necessity.

I want to say that the time has come in the history of this country when we should pay attention to such splendid speeches as the one which was made upon the floor of this House this morning by the distinguished ex-general of the United States Army from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD. We should quit making idols of a special prominent few and let the many other deserving go without a thought.

One of the brave young men from my district went over to France, entering the service from Ballinger, Tex., as a private, but, because of special merit, bravery, and efficiency, returned to his native land, though maimed and crippled, as Maj. Ewing Taylor, who in France offered the sacrifice of everything he had on God's earth, including his life. He came back here maimed and crippled, a major in the service, if you please, he having worked his way up from the rank of a private. He lay at the point of death at Walter Reed Hospital for three long months, and then was sent home to die, and not even a monument has been placed upon his grave. What has been done for his family? Not one single thing. And thousands of our brave men are still in unmarked graves in France, and 75,000 sad, anxious mothers and fathers are still yearning for the return of their son's remains to his native land. I want to say that I am in favor of meting out equal justice to everybody in this land. I want to say it is not merely a little franking privilege; although it has been the precedent heretofore, it is a wrong precedent, and a bad precedent; and if it is in the face and in the teeth of our Constitution, if it is against the fundamental principles for which that flag stands, it is time that such a precedent should be departed from and the practice stopped. You gentlemen know you have not the right to do this, however much it has been done in the past. You gentlemen know you ought to stop and think and ponder on this subject. You gentlemen know that you ought to stop this favoritism toward a few of a favored class. This great man's beloved widow is well fixed financially. She has a splendid home, with a retinue of servants. She did not need this $5,000 a year of the people's money. She probably did not want it. She does not need this franking privilege. She has plenty of money with which to pay for her own postage stamps. I say unless you can do this for every brave soldier's mother and for every brave soldier's widow, you ought not to pick out one leading woman in the United States, however much beloved, and do it. I am against it, if I stand alone in this House. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that the legislative branch of this Government——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman desire to ask a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. I thought the Chair recognized me. If he did not, then the gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. GARD. Gentlemen of the committee, the United States of America, Theodore Roosevelt's own United States of America, is to-day honoring itself by voluntary contributions to make a national monument to his memory. This is unnecessary in a way, because the great monument to Theodore Roosevelt will be neither of bronze nor granite, but the enduring estimate of the men and women and children of the United States of America. [Applause.] While he was always a partisan in politics and therefore stoutly met with divergent opinions among others, there never has been any divergent opinion as to the Americanism of Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.] So his country will honor him, and now the Congress of the United States, or this branch of it, by a resolution seeks to provide a simple honor to his widow. One of the things which really endeared Theodore Roosevelt to the American people, the one thing which chains him to their hearts, is the fact of his great love and affection for his wife and for his children, four of whom went into the service of the United States, and one of whom died the death of a hero on the fields of France. This small tribute to this great, whole-hearted, home-loving family man, Theodore Roosevelt, is as little as we can do. It is true that Mrs. Roosevelt does not need the money. She does not need the pitiful franking privilege, but we are following legislative precedent, and it is a small and deserved recognition to the beloved wife of this beloved American. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from Texas says that Congress was blameworthy for not giving ex-President Roosevelt a chance to go to France, and I say that that point is not well taken because Congress did pass the act authorizing Mr. Roosevelt to go abroad to fight the battles of the country in France.

Mr. BLANTON. I was talking about the Democrats who voted against it.

Mr. CANDLER. I voted for it.

Mr. STEENERSON. The blame does not rest with the legislative branch but with the executive branch, if there is any blame anywhere. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, it will always be one of my regrets that I had never the privilege of meeting the late President Theodore Roosevelt. While we differed politically, I always admired him very much as an American citizen and as a great man. He was intensely devoted to our country and ready at all times to make any sacrifice for it. He plead for the privilege of fighting in France for the land he loved, but was not permitted to do so, though I voted to permit him to go. The citizens in my State to-day, and they are nearly all Democrats, are contributing to raise a fund to honor this great patriot. The most prominent men in the various communities of my district are in charge of the plans to raise money to erect a memorial to the late President Roosevelt. Our people are happy in having the privilege to contribute to this noble cause. It is customary for this honor to be conferred upon the widow of the President of the United States, and as a Georgian, as a Democrat, it will afford me very great pleasure to vote for the resolution to give Mrs. Roosevelt this franking privilege without any limitation, and in so doing I know I voice the sentiment of my district. [Applause.]

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7138) granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt.

Be it enacted, etc., That all mail matter sent by the post by Edith Carow Roosevelt, widow of the late Theodore Roosevelt, under her written autograph signature, be conveyed free of postage during her natural life.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following preferential amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am ready to go as far as any man in this House to do honor to our great ex-President Theodore Roosevelt. I am willing, when it comes to giving proper credit to this great American citizen, to go down into my own pocket as far as any man of my means will go and take my own money that belongs to me, to dispose of as I have a right, to control absolutely—I am willing to go as far as any of you of similar financial means in building a proper memorial to this great man's memory, but when it comes to taking something out of the Treasury of the United States, whether it is a gift of $5,000 per annum or a special franking privilege, I am opposed to it, when in doing so we are singling out one prominent citizen to make public gifts to and forgetting many others who have given their all for their country.

As I say, there will be no man in this House of equal financial ability with myself who will give more than I will out of his own pocket to the Roosevelt memorial fund. But that is not the question. I am afraid that there are some gentlemen here in this Hall who are a little careful of their own funds but who are less careful when they are voting public funds out of the Treasury, with respect to bills that we are continually passing here on the floor of the House with 35 or 40 Members present when they are voted on in the committee and when the roll is first called for in the House. That is the point I am making. I want to say that Mrs. Roosevelt did not need the $5,000 per annum. She probably did not want it. She does not need this franking privilege. I dare say she does not want it, and I say that instead of picking out one person here and there among the great individuals of this Nation and making special gifts out of the Public Treasury to them, let us do honor first to the men who have come back from France, who risked everything over there, who risked their lives on the firing line, who gave everything on God's earth to the cause of our country. We have not done anything for them. We have not yet even had a bill presented to this House for consideration to do justice to the men in khaki who have fought and bled and died for that flag, and I say we ought to consider them first.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

I have had occasion to admire the sturdy character of the gentleman from Texas during his career in this House, and I know he is not afraid to stand up for his convictions.

The idea of extending this franking privilege to the widow of the deceased former President is not that the privilege is something that is needed, but it is a courtesy in the nature of a tribute, and I think the gentleman from Texas will conclude that it would be in rather poor taste for the Congress of the United States at this particular time, having extended this courtesy to the widows of other distinguished Presidents, suddenly to refuse to do so in this case. It is a privilege that will not cost the Government very much, no matter how extensive may be the correspondence of the person to whom the privilege is given, nor will it make very much difference in the receipts of the Post Office Department, if one wishes to consider it upon such sordid grounds. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if the boys who went to France, who have returned here either maimed and wounded or free from wounds, were asked what they thought of the Congress of the United States extending this privilege to the widow of one of the greatest Americans who have adorned the pages of our history during their lifetime, they would say with one accord, "Grant the privilege!" [Applause.] I do not believe that we can afford to refuse to grant it.

I am a little bit sorry that the gentleman from Texas, in this particular instance, has expressed himself just as he has, because I know the gentleman to have a generous heart, and I know him to have a sense of righteousness, and usually he has excellent judgment.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to state, as a man born and raised in Texas, and who has held office in that State for 20 years, that I believe 99 per cent of the people of Texas would be opposed to the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. BLANTON]. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. I believe that, and I think very likely the gentleman from Texas himself, upon calm reflection and further sober consideration, will perhaps agree that it would be unwise for the House at this time, and that we would be lacking in good taste to withhold this courtesy, particularly now, when on next Monday, throughout the length and breadth of this land, in the schools and pulpits and market places and homes of this country, the name and memory of this great American will be revered by all our people.

So I hope the gentleman will ask unanimous consent to withdraw his motion and let us pass this bill by a unanimous vote and say to the people of the land that we are glad in their name to extend this courtesy to Mrs. Roosevelt, and pay this humble tribute in so doing to the memory of our former President, that brilliant, courageous, and true American citizen. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

There was no objection; and the Clerk again reported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has forgotten to some extent his own duties and the duties of this House when he offers the amendment which is now before us. Ever since this Congress was created it has exercised this power, and often found it proper to reward great men of the Nation and commemorate their memory in the manner which is now being done. If this were not the duty of Congress, if it were not one of its privileges, we would not have recently erected that great memorial which has been constructed to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. We do this not with our money but with the money of the people of the United States, and for and in their behalf. So now, when this Nation will soon be paying its tribute to the memory of this great American, we here in Congress on behalf of the Nation should express the sentiments which show how highly his memory is regarded by our people. This is but a little thing, and yet it goes far to show the world that Congress and the people of this country have not forgotten this great man—author, scientist, soldier, statesman, and, above all, an American. Whatever may have been his faults, and, like all great men, he had them, no man of this age has been more distinguished, and few, if any, have left such an impress upon social conditions. He numbered among his friends the great men of his day, and at the same time no man ever had a larger following among the masses of the people. To his other qualities he united that of a leader, whose voice and pen commanded hosts of devoted adherents. His restless and determined energy kindled a fire in his soul which all too soon consumed his strength, and the great man is gone. We know not who can fill his place, but we should at least make some public acknowledgment on behalf of the Nation. The bill as it stands is the very least that we ought to do, and the Nation will approve it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FERRIS) there were—ayes 1, noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills with the amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills amended and unamended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. REAVIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report back to the House the bills H. R. 683, 946, 644, with amendments, and the bills H. R. 909 and 7138, without amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills amended and unamended do pass.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 683, for the relief of William E. Johnson, with an amendment, and move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up out of order the bill H. R. 7138, granting the franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take up out of order the bill H. R. 7138. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and Mr. BLANTON demanded a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, at the request of our leader, I withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the point of order that there is no quorum present. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the bill H. R. 946.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 946) for the relief of James A. Showen.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the bill H. R. 644.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 644) for the relief of Oscar Smith.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 909.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 909) for the relief of Ellen Agnes Monogue.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 51, noes 5.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the title of the bill H. R. 6289, acted upon favorably a short time ago by the House, be changed so as to conform to the text, the text having been amended in the committee and adopted in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the title of the bill referred to be amended to conform to the text. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the conference report on the Post Office increase bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks made on the bill just passed, granting the franking privilege to Mrs. Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CASE OF VICTOR L. BERGER, OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. DALLINGER, by direction of the special committee appointed under the authority of House resolution 6, concerning the right of Victor L. Berger, Representative elect from the State of Wisconsin, to be sworn in as a Member of the Sixty-sixth Congress, submitted a privileged report, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF CARNEY AGAINST BERGER.

Mr. DALLINGER, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted a privileged report in the contested-election case of Joseph P. Carney v. Victor L. Berger, from the fifth congressional district of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, October 25, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting preliminary examination of Bayou Texar, Fla. (H. Doc. No. 271); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill to promote the efficiency of the United States Navy (H. Doc. No. 272); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting estimate of appropriation required for the drainage of Margarita Island Swamp (H. Doc. No. 273); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of a bill regarding the Naval Reserve Force of the United States Navy (H. Doc. No. 274); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 358) for the immediate consideration of the House committee substitute for S. 2775, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 409), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOULD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10137) to amend an act entitled "An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1906, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 410), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. NOLAN, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 411), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MORIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2494) to transfer the tract of land known as the Lighthouse Reservation at North Point, Md., from the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce to the jurisdiction of the War Department, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 412), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DALLINGER, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, to which was referred the contested-election case of Carney against Berger, submitted a report (No. 413) thereon, which said report was referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the select committee on the right of seat of Victor L. Berger, submitted a report (No. 414) thereon, which said report was referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9903) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Bryant; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 5886) granting an increase of pension to Jacob W. Cline; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CRISP: A bill (H. R. 10155) to deport from the United States certain aliens who withdrew their declaration of intention to become citizens to evade military service, and to suspend all immigration to the United States until January 1, 1930; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. NOLAN: A bill (H. R. 10156) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MASON: Resolution (H. Res. 359) expressing the sympathy of the House of Representatives for the Korean people; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: Resolution (H. Res. 360) for appointment of a special committee to consider and report on the various bills pending in the House providing for benefits to ex-service men of the late World War; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MONTAGUE: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 240) to provide for the return of the dead bodies of soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces buried in France; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 10157) granting an increase of pension to Michael Young; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 10158) granting a pension to Addison Inman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COOPER: A bill (H. R. 10159) granting a pension to Harriet E. Ritter; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CROWTHER: A bill (H. R. 10160) granting an increase of pension to John W. Lane; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 10161) granting an increase of pension to James M. Turley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ELLIOTT: A bill (H. R. 10162) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin T. Pool; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.
